208. Proceedings at the CONFERENCE in the SAVOY, respecting a Review of the Liturgy : 13 CHARLES II. A.D. 1661. [2 Collier's Eccles. Hist. 871. 4 Neal's Puritans, 233. 3 Kennett, 225.]

AT the Restoration, the Church recovered with the Crown ; though this ground was not gained without some contest with the dissenting party. Neither is this struggle much surprising, if we consider, that for 14 or 15 years last past the hierarchy had been broken, the liturgy laid aside, and a new form both as to worship and government, publicly prevailed. The Presbyterians had several circumstances of advantage to support their hopes. Possession of the chair, the inclination of no small numbers of the people, the countenance of great men, and the king's declaration at Breda, gave this party no uncomfortable prospect. To keep them somewhat sanguine in their expectations, Dr. Reynolds, Dr. Spurstow, Dr. Wallis, Dr. Bates, Dr. Manton, Mr. Calamy, Mr. Ask, Mr. Baxter, Mr. Case, and two or three more, were made the king's chaplains in ordinary ; though none of them ever preached before his majesty excepting Calamy, Reynolds, Baxter, Spurstow, and Woodbridge ; and none of these but once. However, this appearing in the chapel, made their access to his majesty the more easy. To pursue their interest therefore they waited on his majesty soon after the restoration, being introduced by the earl of Manchester. In their address, " They recommended the uniting the kingdom in matters of religion ; that if his majesty would please to contribute his assistance nothing could be more promising than the present juncture : they intreated that the terms of Union might include nothing but necessary things : that the true exercise of church discipline might be allowed : that those ministers who were most serviceable for this branch of the function might not be laid aside, nor unworthy unqualified men, put upon the people."

The king declared himself much pleased with their reconciling temper, and resolved to do his part for promoting what was suggested : but told them withal, " That this agreement could not be expected without something of cession and abatement on both sides : that if the issue did not answer, it should not be his fault but their own : that he was resolved to leave no proper methods unattempted, for procuring a harmony, and drawing the distant persuasions to a good understanding. To this end he desired them to lay some proposals before him touching church government. That this main difference being once settled, other matters would be easily accommodated." And here his majesty ordered them to set down the full length of their concessions. They told the king they were but a small number, and had no commission from their brethren to declare themselves upon this head. They desired therefore they might have leave to acquaint their brethren in the country with his majesty's commands, and receive their sentiments upon this argument. The king replied, that method would be dilatory, and make too much noise : that therefore he had rather the proposals should come from themselves, and that for fuller information, they might communicate this affair with their friends in the city. To this their answer was : " They were in no condition either to speak for, or oblige other people : and therefore what they offered his majesty could only be taken for their own sense." The king let them know they should be construed no otherwise, and that he did not design to convene a Synod or Assembly of the other party, but only make use of a few for adjusting this matter." Upon this, these divines begged the king that when they laid their concessions before him, his majesty would order their brethren of the Church of England, might deliver in a paper of the utmost they could yield: that when the relaxations of both sides were compared, the success might the better be conjectured. The king, thinking this reasonable, promised their request.

Upon this they summoned the city ministers to meet and consult at Sion college, not excluding such of their country brethren as would attend, that it might not be said afterwards they took upon themselves the concluding so weighty an affair. After two or three weeks consultation they agreed upon a paper to the following purpose, drawn up chiefly by Dr. Reynolds, Dr. Worth, and Mr. Calamy, which, together with archbishop Usher's reduction of Episcopacy, they offered to the king; with the following Address:*

"May it please your most excellent majesty; We your majesty's most loyal subjects cannot but acknowledge it as a very great

* This Primate's scheme was necessary to avoid the corruptions, partiality, and tyranny incident to the administration of a single person. The things which they chiefly blamed in the English hierarchy were; the great extent of the bishop's diocese; their deputing commissaries; chancellors, and officials to act in their stead; their assuming the sole power of ordination and jurisdiction; and acting so arbitrarily in visitation articles. Besides this, they objected their bringing in new ceremonies, and suspending ministers at pleasure: for reforming these evils, as they called them, they proposed that bishop Usher's notion of episcopal government might be received as the groundwork of an accommodation. This Primate's scheme is couched under the four following propositions.

I. "Usher would have it, that in every parish the rector, or the incumbent pastor, together with the church-warden and side-man, may every week take notice of such as live scandalously in the congregation; who are to receive such several admonitions and reproofs as the quality of their offence shall deserve; and if by this means they cannot be reclaimed they may be presented unto the next monthly Synod, and in the mean time, be debarred by the Pastor from access unto the Lord's table.

II. "Whereas by a statute in the 26 of Hen. 3 (revived in the 1st of Q. Eliz.) Suffragans are appointed to be erected in 26 several places of this Kingdom, the number of them might be very well conformed unto the several rural deaneries, into which every diocese is subdivided; which being done, the Suffragan (supplying the place of these who in the ancient church were called Chorepiscopi) might every month assemble a Synod of all the rectors or incumbent pastors, within the precinct, and according to the major part of their voices, conclude all matters that should be brought into debate before them. To this Synod the rector and churchwardens might present such unpenitent persons, as by admonition and sus-mercy of God, that immediately after so wonderful and peaceable restoration to your throne and government (for which we bless his name) he has stired up your royal heart, as to a zealous testimony against prophaneness, so to endeavour an happy composing of the differences and healing the said breaches which are in the church. And we shall according to our bounden duty, become humble suitors to the throne of grace, that the God of peace, who has put such a thing as this into your majesty's heart, will, by his heavenly wisdom and holy spirit assist you herein, that you may bring your Resolutions to a perfect effect and issue—pension from the sacrament, would not be reformed, who, if they would still remain consumacious and incorrigible, the sentence of excommunication might be decreed against them by the Synod, and accordingly be executed in the parish wherethey lived. Hitherto also all things that concerned the parochial ministers might be referred, whether they did touch their doctrine or their conversation: as also the censure of all new opinions, heresies, and schisms, which did arise within that circuit, with liberty of appeal if need so require, unto the Diocesan Synod.

III. "The Diocesan Synod might be held once or twice in the year, as it should be thought most convenient; therein all the Suffragans, and the rest of the rectors or incumbent pastors, or a certain select number out of every deanery within that diocese might meet; with whose consent or the major part of them, all things might be concluded by the bishop or superintendent (call him which you will) or in his absence by one of the Suffragans, whom he should depute in his stead, to be moderator of that assembly. Here all matters of great moment might be taken into consideration, and the orders of the monthly Synods revised, and, if need be, reformed. And if here also any matter of difficulty could not receive a full determination it might be referred to the next provincial, or nation Synod.

IV. "The provincial Synod might consist of all the Bishops and Suffragans and such of the clergy as should be elected out of every diocese within the province. The primate of either province, might be the moderator of this meeting (or in his room some one of the bishops appointed by him) and all matters be ordered therein by common consent, as in the former assemblies. This Synod might be held every third year, and if the parliament do then sit, both the primates and provincial Synods of the land might join together and make up a national council; wherein all appeals from inferior Synods might be received, all their acts examined, and all ecclesiastical constitutions which concern the state of the church of the whole nation established." and us, in the doctrinal truths of the reformed religion, and in the substantial parts of divine worship, humbly desire,

"First that we may be secured of those things in practice of which we seem to be agreed in principle; as,

"1. That those of our flocks that are serious in matters of their salvation may not be reproachfully handled by words of scorn or any abusive language, but may be encouraged in their duties of exhorting and provoking one another in their most holy faith, and of furthering one another in the ways of eternal life.

"2. That each congregation may have a learned, orthodox, and godly pastor; that the people may be publicly instructed by preaching every Lord's day, by catechising, by frequent administering the Lord's Supper and Baptism; and that effectual provision by law may be made, that such as are insufficient, negligent, or scandalous, may not officiate.

"3. That none may be admitted to the Lord's Supper till they personally own their baptismal covenant by a credible profession of faith and holiness, not contradicted by a scandalous life. That to such only Confirmation may be administered; and that the approbation of the pastor to whom the instructing those under his charge doth appertain, may be produced before any person receive's confirmation.

"4. That an effectual course be taken for the sanctification of the Lord's day, appropriating the same to holy exercises both in public and private, without any unnecessary divertisements."

"Then for matters in difference (viz.) Church government, Liturgy, and Ceremonies, we humbly represent,

"That we do not renounce the true antient primitive episcopacy or presidency as it was balanced with a due communion of Presbyters. If therefore your majesty, in your grave wisdom and moderation, shall constitute such an episcopacy we shall humbly submit thereunto. And in order to an accommodation in this weighty affair, we desire humbly to offer some particulars which we conceive were amiss in the episcopal government as it was practised before the year 1640.

"1. The great extent of the bishops diocese, which we apprehend too large for his personal inspection.

"2. That by reason of this disability the bishops did depute the administration in matters of spiritual cognizance, to commissaries chancellors, officials, whereof some are secular persons and could not administer that power that originally belongs to the officers of the church.

"3. That the bishops did assume the sole power of ordination and jurisdiction to themselves.

"4. That some of the bishops exercised an arbitrary power, by sending forth articles of visitation, enquiring unwarrantably into several things; and swearing church wardens to present accordingly. Also many innovations and ceremonies were imposed upon ministers and people not required by law.

"For remedy of these evils we crave leave to offer,

"1. The late most reverend Primate of Ireland, his Reduction of Episcopacy into the form of Synodical Government.

"2. We humbly desire, that the Suffragans or Chorepiscopi, may be chosen by the respective synods.

"3. That no oaths or promises of obedience to the bishops, nor any unnecessary subscriptions or engagements be made necessary to ordination, institution, or induction, ministration, communion or immunities of ministers, they being responsible for any transgression of the law. And that no bishops or ecclesiastical governors may exercise their government, by their private will, or pleasure, but only by such rules, canons, and constitutions, as shall be established by parliament."

"Secondly, concerning Liturgy.

"1. We are satisfied in our judgments concerning the lawfulness of a liturgy, or form of worship, provided it be for matter agreeable to the word of God, and suited to the nature of the several ordinances and necessities of the church, neither too tedious, nor composed of too short prayers or responsals, nor dissonant from the liturgies of other reformed churches, nor too rigorously imposed, nor the minister confined thereunto, but that he may also make use of his gifts for prayer and exhortation.

"2. Forasmuch as the book of common-prayer is in some things justly offensive, and needs amendment, we most humbly pray, that some learned, godly, and moderate divines of both persuasions, may be employed to compile such a form as is before described as much as may be in scripture words; or at least to revise, and reform the old; together with an addition of other various forms in Scripture phrase, to be used at the minister's choice."

"Thirdly, concerning Ceremonies.

"We hold ourselves obliged in every part of divine worship, to do all things decently and in order, and to edification; and are willing to be determined by authority in such things, as being merely circumstantial, are common to human actions and societies and are to be ordered by the light of nature, and human prudence.

"As to divers ceremonies formerly retained in the church of England, we do, in all humility, offer to your majesty the following considerations.

"That the worship of God is in itself pure and perfect, and decent without any such ceremonies. That it is then most pure and acceptable when it has least of human mixtures. That these ceremonies have been imposed and advanced by some, so as to draw near to the significancy and moral efficacy of sacraments. That they have been rejected by many of the reformed churches abroad, and have been ever the subject of contention and endless disputes in this church; and therefore being in their own nature indifferent and mutable, they ought to be changed, lest in time they should be apprehended as necessary as the substantial of worship themselves.

"May it therefore please your majesty graciously to grant, that kneeling at the Lord's Supper, and such holy days as are but of human institution, may not be imposed on such as scruple them. That the use of the surplice and cross in baptism, and bowing at the name of Jesus, may be abolished. And forasmuch as erecting altars and bowing towards them, and such like (having no foundation in the law of the land) have been introduced and imposed, we humbly beseech your majesty, that such innovations may not be used or imposed for the future."

When the Presbyterian divines came to court with these proposals the king received them favourably, and promised to bring both parties together. His majesty told them, he was glad to hear that they were for a liturgy, and forms of prayer, and that they were willing to yield to the essence of episcopacy, and therefore he doubted not of procuring an accommodation. The ministers expected to have met the bishops with their papers of proposals, but none of them appeared, having been better instructed in a private conference with the lord chancellor Hyde, who told them, it was not their business to bring proposals, because they were in possession of the laws of the land; that the hierarchy and service book being the only legal establishment ought to be the standard of agreement; and therefore they had nothing to do but to answer the exceptions of the ministers against it. Accordingly instead of a Conference, or Paper of Proposals which the ministers expected, the bishops having obtained a copy of the Paper of the Presbyterians, drew up an Answer in writing which was communicated to their ministers, July 8.

In this Answer the bishops take notice of the ministers' concessions in their preamble, "as that they agree with them in the substantial of doctrine and worship;" and infer from thence, that their particular exceptions are of less importance and ought not to be stood upon to the disturbance of the peace of the church.

As to their preliminary requests, they conceive the laws of the realm have made a sufficient provision, and that no further security can be given. As for liberty of conscience they are willing to comply, provided a passage may not be opened for private conventicles: for should such an indulgence be granted, the consequences might prove very unserviceable to the state. That they approve the fixing a godly minister in each parish, but do not understand what is meant by residing on his cure, nor how far those words may be stretched; nor what farther provision can be made upon that head. As for Confirmation, and the barring scandalous persons from the Communion, they thought the church had taken sufficient care of that matter. And touching the observation of the Lord's day: They reply, the laws of the kingdom were stricter than those of any foreign reformed Communion whatsoever.

To the particulars they answer,

1. Concerning church-government, "That they never heard any just reasons for a dissent from the Ecclesiastical hierarchy of this kingdom, which they believe in the main to be the true primitive episcopacy, which was more than a mere presidency of order. Nor do they find that it was balanced by any authoritative commixtion of Presbyters, though it has been in all times exercised with the assistance and counsel of Presbyters, in subordination to Bishops. They wonder that they should except against the government by one single person, which, if applied to the civil magistrate, is a most dangerous insinuation."

As to the four particular instances of things amiss.

1. "We cannot grant the extent of any diocese is so great, but that a bishop may well perform his duty, which is not a personal inspection of every man's soul, but the pastoral charge, or taking care that the ministers, and other ecclesiastical officers within their diocese, do their duties: and if some diocesses should be too large, the law allows suffragans.

2. "Concerning Lay-Chancellors, &c. we confess the Bishops did depute part of their ecclesiastical jurisdiction to Chancellors, Commissaries, Officials, &c. as men better skilled in the civil and canon laws; but as for matters of mere spiritual concernment, as excommunication, absolution, and other censures of the church, we conceive they belong properly to the Bishop himself, or his surrogate, whercin if any thing has been done amiss, we are willing it should be reformed.

3. "Whether Bishops are a distinct order from Presbyters, or not? or, whether they have the sole power of ordination; is not now the question; but, we affirm, that the Bishops of this realm have constantly ordained with the assistance of Presbyters, and the imposition of their hands together with the Bishops, and for this purpose the colleges of Deans and Chapters are instituted.

4. "As to Archbishop Usher's model of church government, we decline it, as not consistent with his other learned discourses on the original of Episcopacy, and of Metropolitans; nor with the king's supremacy in causes ecclesiastical."

II. Concerning Liturgy.

"We esteem the Liturgy of the church of England, contained in the book of common-prayer, and by law established, to be such an one as is by them desired, according to the qualifications which they mention; the disuse of which has been the cause of the sad divisions of the church, and the restoring it may be, by God's blessing, a special means of making up the breach. Nor can the imposition of it be called rigorous, as long as clergymen have the liberty of using their gifts before and after sermon. Nevertheless we are not against revising the Liturgy by such discreet persons as his majesty shall think fit to employ therein."

III. Of Ceremonies.

"Lawful authority has already determined the ceremonies in question to be decent and orderly, and for edification, and consequently to be agreeable to the general rules of the word. We allow the worship of God is in itself perfect in essentials, but still the church is at liberty to improve it with circumstantial for decency and order. Ceremonies were never esteemed to be sacraments, nor imposed as such; they are retained by most Protestant churches; and that they have been the subject of contention is owing to mens weakness, and their unwillingness to submit their private opinions to the public judgment of the church. We acknowledge, that these things are in their nature mutable, but we can by no means think it expedient to remove them. However, as we are no way against such a tender and religious compassion in things of this nature, as his majesty's piety and wisdom shall think fit to extend: so we cannot think that the satisfaction of some private persons is to be laid in the balance against the public peace and uniformity of the church.

"As for kneeling at the Lord's Supper, it is a gesture of the greatest reverence and devotion, and so most agreeable to that holy service.

"Holy days of human institution having been observed by the people of God in the Old Testament, and by our blessed Saviour himself in the gospel, and by all the churches of Christ in the primitive and following times, as apt means to preserve the memorials of the chief mysteries of the Christian religion: and such holy days also being fit times for the honest recreation of the meaner sort of people; for these reasons we humbly desire they may be continued in the church.

"As for the three other Ceremonies, the Surplice, the Cross after Baptism, and bowing at the Name of Jesus, though we see not any sufficient reason why they should be utterly abolished, nevertheless, how far forth, in regard of tender consciences, a liberty may be thought fit to be indulged to any, his majesty is best able to judge.

They conclude thus, "We are so far from believing that his majesty's condescending to the ministers demands will take away not only our differences, but the roots and causes of them, that we are confident it will prove the seminary of new differences, both by giving dissatisfaction to those that are well pleased with what is already established, who are much the greatest part of his majesty's subjects: and by encouraging unquiet spirits, when these things shall be granted, to make further demands; there being no assurance by them given, what will content all dissenters, than which nothing is more necessary for settling a firm peace in the church."

About a week after, the Presbyterian divines sent the Bishops a warm Remonstrance, and Defence of their Proposals, drawn up chiefly by Mr. Baxter, to the following purpose.

Concerning the Preamble.

"We are not insensible of the great danger of the church, through the doctrinal errors of those with whom we differ also about points of government and worship; but we choose to say nothing of the party that we are agreed with in doctrinals, because we both subscribe the same holy scriptures, articles of religion, and books of homilies; and the contradictions to their own confessions which too many are guilty of, we did not think just to charge upon the whole."

Concerning Church-government.

"Had you read Gerson, Bucer, Parker, Raynes, Salmasius, Blondel, &c. you would have seen just reason given for our dissent from the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy as stated in England."

Instances of Things amiss.

"You would easily grant that dioceses are too great, if you had ever conscientiously tried the task which Dr. Hammond describeth as the Bishop's work; or had ever believed Ignatius, and other antient descriptions of a Bishop's church. You cannot be ignorant, that our Bishops have the sole government of pastors and people; that the whole power of the keys is in their hands, and that their Presbyters are but Cyphers."

Concerning Ceremonies.

"These divines argue for leaving them indifferent for the peace of the church, as being not essential to the perfection of Christian worship, especially when so many looked upon them as sinful."

They conclude thus, "We perceive your counsels against peace are not likely to be frustrated. Your desires concerning us are likely to be accomplished. You are like to be gratified with our silence and ejection; and yet we will believe, that blessed are the peace-makers; and though we are prevented by you in our pursuits of peace, and are never like thus publicly to seek it more, yet are we resolved, as much as possible, to live peaceably with all men."

The laws were now put in execution against such as did not make use of the old liturgy. Many were suspended and turned out of their livings, on this account; upon which the leading Presbyterians applied to the king, and humbly requested,

1. "That they might with all convenient speed see his majesty's conclusions upon the proposals of mutual condescensions, before they pass into resolves.

2. "That his majesty would publicly declare his pleasure for the suspension of all proceedings upon the Act of Uniformity, against non-conformists to the liturgy and ceremonies, till they saw the issue of their hoped-for agreement.

3. "That until the said settlement there may be no oath of canonical obedience, nor subscription to the liturgy and ceremonies required, nor renunciation of their ordination by mere Presbyters, imposed as necessary to institution, induction, or confirmation.

4. "That his majesty would cause the broad seal to be revoked, where persons had been put into the possession of the livings of others not void by sequestration, but by the death of the former incumbents.

5. "That a remedy may be provided against the return of scandalous ministers into the places from whence they had been ejected."

His majesty gave them a civil audience, and told them, he would put what he thought fit to grant them into the form of a Declaration, which they should have the liberty of perusing before it was made public. A copy of this was accordingly delivered by the chancellor to Mr. Baxter, and other Presbyterian divines, Sept. 4, with liberty to make exceptions, and give notice of what they disliked. These divines petitioned for some further amendments and alterations; upon which the king appointed a day to hear what could be said on both sides, and came to the chancellor's house, October 22, attended by the dukes of Albemarle and Ormond, the earls of Manchester, Anglesea, and lord Hollis.

On the part of the Bishops were, Dr. Sheldon, bishop of London; Dr. Morley, bishop of Worcester; Dr. Henchman, bishop of Salisbury; Dr. Cosins, bishop of Durham; Dr. Gauden, bishop of Exeter; Dr. Hacket, bishop of Litchfield and Coventry; Dr. Barwick, dean of St. Paul's; Dr. Gunning; &c.

On the side of the Presbyterians were, Dr. Reynolds, Mr. Calamy, Dr. Spurstow, Mr. Ashe, Dr. Manton, Mr. Baxter, Dr. Wallis.

As the chancellor read over the Declaration each party were to make their exceptions, and the king to determine. The chief debates were on the high power of the Bishops, and the necessity of re-ordination. Bishop Morley and Doctor Gunning spoke most on one side; and Mr. Calamy and Baxter on the other. Upon hearing the whole his majesty told them what he thought proper should stand in the declaration; and appointed bishop Morley and Henchman, doctor Reynolds and Mr. Calamy to determine upon proper words; and if they disagreed the earl of Anglesea and lord Hollis to decide.

At length the Declaration, with such amendments as the king would admit, was published under the following title:

"His Majesty's DECLARATION to all his loving subjects of his kingdom of England and dominion of Wales, concerning Ecclesiastical Affairs. Given at our Court at Whitehall, October 25, 1660, in the twelfth year of our reign.

"C. R.

"How much the peace of the state is concerned in the peace of the church, and how difficult a thing it is to preserve order and government in civil, whilst there is no order or government in Ecclesiastical affairs, is evident to the world: and this little part of the world, our own dominions, hath had so late experience of it, that we may very well acquiesce in the conclusion, without enlarging myself in discourse upon it, it being a subject we have had frequent occasion to contemplate upon, and to lament abroad as well as at home.

"In our Letter to the Speaker of the House of Commons from Breda, we declared how much we desired the advancement and propagation of the Protestant religion; that neither the unkindness of those of the same faith towards us, nor the civilities and obligations from those of a contrary profession (of both which we have had abundant evidence) could in the least degree startle us or make us swerve from it: and that nothing can be proposed to manifest our zeal and affection for it, to which we will not readily consent. And we said then, that we did hope in due time, ourselves to propose somewhat for the propagation of it, that will satisfy the world that we have always made it both our care and our study, and have enough observed what is most like to bring disadvantage to it. And the truth is, we do think ourselves more competent to propose, and with God's assistance to determine many things now in difference, from the time we have spent, and the experience we have had, in most of the reformed churches abroad, in France, in the Low Countries, and in Germany, where we have had frequent conferences with the most learned men, who have unanimously lamented the great reproach the Protestant religion undergoes from the distempers and too notorious schisms in matters of religion in England. And as the most learned amongst them have always with great submission and reverence acknowledged and magnified the established government of the Church of England, and the great countenance and shelter the Protestant religion received from it before these unhappy times: so many of them have with great ingenuity and sorrow confest, that they were too easily misled by misinformation and prejudice into some disesteem of it, as if it had too much complied with the church of Rome; whereas they now acknowledge it to be the best fence God hath yet raised against popery in the world; and we are persuaded they do with great zeal wish it restored to its old dignity and veneration.

"When we were in Holland, we were attended by many grave and learned ministers from hence, who were looked upon as the most able and principal assertors of the Presbyterian opinions; with whom we had as much conference as the multitude of affairs which were then upon us would permit us to have; and, to our great satisfaction and comfort, found them persons full of affection to us, of zeal for the peace of the church and state, and neither enemies (as they have been given out to be) to episcopacy or liturgy, but modestly to desire such alterations in either, as, without shaking foundations, might best allay the present distempers which the indisposition of the time and the tenderness of some mens consciences had contracted. For the better doing whereof, we did intend, upon our first arrival in this kingdom, to call a Synod of divines, as the most proper expedient to provide a proper remedy for all those differences and dissatisfactions which had or should arise in matters of religion. And in the mean time, we published in our Declaration from Breda, a liberty to tender consciences, and that no man should be disquieted, or called in question for differences of opinion in matters of religion, which do not disturb the peace of the kingdom, and that we shall be ready to consent to such an act of parliament as upon mature deliberation shall be offered to us, for the full granting that indulgence.

“Whilst we continued in this temper of mind, and resolution, and have so far complied with the persuasions of particular persons, and the distemper of the time, as to be contented with the exercise of our religion in our own chapel, according to the constant practice and laws established, without enjoining that practice, and the observation of those laws in the churches of the kingdom; in which we have undergone the censure of many, as if we were without that zeal for the church which we ought to have, and which, by God’s grace, we shall always retain: we have found ourself not so candidly dealt with as we have deserved, and that there are unquiet and restless spirits, who, without abating any of their own distemper in recompence of the inoderation they find in us, continue their bitterness against the church, and endeavour to raise jealousies of us, and to lessen our reputation by their reproaches, as if we were not true to the professions we have made: and in order thereunto, they have very unreasonably caused to be printed, published, and dispersed, throughout the kingdom, a Declaration heretofore printed in our name in Scotland, of which we shall say no more, than that the circumstances by which we were enforced to sign that Declaration, are enough known to the world; and that the worthiest and greatest part of that nation did even then detest and abhor the ill usage of us in that particular, when the same tyranny was exercised there by the power of a few ill men, which at that time had spread itself over this kingdom, and therefore we had no reason to expect that we should at this season, when we are doing all we can to wipe out the memory of all that hath been done amiss by other men, and we thank God have wiped it out of our own remembrance, have been ourself assaulted with those reproaches, which we will likewise forget.

“Since the printing this Declaration, several seditious pamphlets and queries have been published and scattered abroad to infuse dislike and jealousies into the hearts of the people, and of the army: and some, who ought rather to have repented the former mischief they have wrought, than to have endeavoured to improve it, have had the hardiness to publish, That the doctrine of the church, against which no man with whom we have conferred hath excepted, ought to be reformed as well as the discipline.

“This over-passionate and turbulent way of proceeding, and the impatience we find in many for some speedy determination in these matters, whereby the minds of men may be composed, and the peace of the church established, hath prevailed with us to invert the method we had proposed to ourself, and even in order to the better calling and composing a Synod (which the present jealousies will hardly agree upon) by the assistance of God’s blessed spirit, which we daily invoke and supplicate, to give some determination ourself to the matters in difference, until such a synod may be called, as may without passion or prejudice give us such farther assistance towards a perfect Union of affections as well as submission to authority, as is necessary. And we are the rather induced to take this upon us, by finding upon the full conference we have had with the learned men of several persuasions, that the mischiefs under which the church and state do at present suffer, do not result from any formed doctrine or conclusion which either party maintains or avows; but from the passion and appetite, and interest of particular persons, who contract greater prejudice to each other from those affections, than would naturally rise from their opinions; and those distempers must be in some degree allayed, before the meeting in a synod can be attended with better success than their meeting in other places, and their discourses in pulpits, have hitherto been: and till all thoughts of victory are laid aside, the humble and necessary thoughts for the vindication of truth cannot be enough entertained.

“We must, for the honour of all those of either persuasion with whom we have conferred, declare, That the professions and desires of all, for the advancement of piety and true godliness, are the same; their professions of zeal for the peace of the church, the same; of affection and duty to us the same: they all approve episcopacy; they all approve a set form of liturgy; and they all disprove and dislike the sin of sacrilege, and the alienation of the revenue of the church. And if, upon these excellent foundations, in submission to which there is such a harmony of affections, any superstructures should be raised, to the shaking those foundations, and to the contracting and lessening the blessed gift of charity, which is a vital part of Christian religion, we shall think ourself very unfortunate, and even suspect that we are defective in that administration of government with which God hath intrusted us.

“We need not profess the high affection and esteem we have for the Church of England, as it is established by law; the reverence to which hath supported us, by God’s blessing, against many temptations: nor do we think that reverence in the least degree diminished by our condescensions, not peremptorily to insist on some particulars of ceremony, which however introduced by the piety and devotion, and order of former times, may not be so agreeable to the present, but may even lessen that piety and devotion for the improvement whereof they might happily be first introduced, and consequently may well be dispensed with. And we hope this charitable compliance of ours will dispose the minds of all men to a cheerful submission to that authority, the preservation whereof is so necessary for the unity and peace of the church; and that they will acknowledge the support of the episcopal authority to be the best support of religion, by being the best means to contain the minds of men within the rules of government. And they who would restrain the exercise of that holy function within the rules which were observed in the primitive times, must remember and consider, that the ecclesiastical power being in those blessed times always subordinate and subject to the civil; it was likewise proportioned to such an extent of jurisdiction, as was most agreeable to that. And as the sanctity, and simplicity, and resignation of that age did then refer many things to the bishops, which the policy of succeeding ages would not admit, at least did otherwise provide for; so it can be no reproach to primitive episcopacy, if where there have been great alterations in the civil government from what was then, there have been likewise some difference and alteration in the ecclesiastical, the essence and foundation being still preserved.

“And upon this ground, without taking upon us to censure the government of the church in other countries, where the government of the state is different from what it is here; or enlarging ourself upon the reasons why, whilst there was an imagination of erecting a democratical government here in the state, they should be willing to continue an aristocratical government in the church: it shall suffice to say, that since by the wonderful blessing of God, the hearts of this whole nation are returned to an obedience to monarchic government in the state, it must be very reasonable to support that government in the church which is established by law, and with which the monarchy hath flourished through so many ages, and which is, in truth, as ancient in this island as the Christian monarchy thereof; and which hath always, in some respects or degrees, been enlarged or restrained, as hath been thought most conducing to the peace and happiness of the kingdom. And therefore we have not the least doubt, but that the present bishops will think the present concessions now made by us to allay the present distempers, very just and reasonable, and will very cheerfully conform themselves thereunto.

1. “We do in the first place declare our purpose and resolution is, and shall be, to promote the power of godliness, to encourage the exercises of religion both public and private, and to take care that the Lord’s day be applied to holy exercises, without unnecessary diversements; and that insufficient, negligent, and scandalous ministers be not permitted in the church. And that as the present bishops are known to be men of great and exemplary piety in their lives, which they have manifested in their notorious and unexampled sufferings during these late distempers, and of great and known sufficiency of learning: So we shall take especial care to prefer no men to that office and charge, but men of learning, virtue and piety, who may be themselves the best examples to those who are to be governed by them. And we shall expect and provide the best we can, that the bishops be frequent preachers; and that they do very often preach themselves in some church of their diocese, except they be hindered by sickness or other bodily infirmities, or some other justifiable occasion, which shall not be thought justifiable if it be frequent.

3. “No bishop shall ordain or exercise any part of jurisdiction which appertains to the censures of the church, without the advice and assistance of the Presbyters: And no chancellors, commissaries or officials, as such, shall execute any act of spiritual jurisdiction in these cases, viz. Excommunication, Absolution, or wherein any of the ministry are concerned, with reference to their pastoral charge. However our intent and meaning is to uphold and maintain the profession of the civil law, so far and in such matters, as it hath been of use and practice within our kingdoms and dominions: albeit, as to Excommunication, our will and pleasure is, that no chancellor, commissary or official shall decree any sentence of excommunication or absolution, or be judges in those things wherein any of the ministry are concerned as is aforesaid: Nor shall the archdeacon exercise any jurisdiction without the advice and assistance of six ministers of his archdeaconry, whereof three to be nominated by the bishop, and three by the election of the major part of the presbyters within the archdeaconry.

4. “To the end that the Deans and Chapters may be the better fitted to afford counsel and assistance to the bishops, both in ordination and the other offices mentioned before, we will take care that those preferments be given to the most learned and pious presbyters of the diocese. And moreover, that an equal number to those of the chapter, of the most learned, pious and discreet presbyters of the same diocese, annually chosen by the major vote of all the prebyters of that diocese present at such elections, shall be always advising and assisting together with those of the chapter in all ordinations, and in every part of jurisdiction, which appertains to the censures of the church, and at all other solemn and important actions in the exercise of the ecclesiastical jurisdiction, wherein any of the ministry are concerned; provided that at all such meetings the number of the ministers so elected, and those present of the chapter, shall be equal, and not exceed one the other, and that to make the numbers equal, the juniors of the exceeding number be withdrawn, that the most ancient may take place. Nor shall any suffragan bishop ordain or exercise the forementioned offices and acts of spiritual jurisdiction, but with the advice and assistance of a sufficient number of the most judicious and pious presbyters annually chosen as aforesaid within his precincts. And our will is, that the great work of Ordination be constantly and solemnly performed by the bishop and his aforesaid presbytery, at the four set times and seasons appointed by the church for that purpose.

5. "We will take care that Confirmation be rightly and solemnly performed, by the information and with the consent of the minister of the place, who shall admit none to the Lord's Supper, till they have made a credal profession of their faith, and promised obedience to the will of God, according as is expressed in the considerations of the Rubric before the Catechism. And that all possible diligence be used for the instruction and reformation of scandalous offenders, whom the minister shall not suffer to partake of the Lord's Table, until they have openly declared themselves to have truly repented and amended their former naughty lives, as is partly expressed in the Rubric and more fully in the canons; provided there be place for due appeals to superior power. But besides the suffragans and their presbytery, every rural dean (those deans as heretofore) to be nominated by the bishop of the diocese) together with three or four ministers of that deanery, chosen by the major part of all the ministers within the same, shall meet once in every month, to receive such complaints as shall be presented to them by the ministers or church-wardens of the respective parishes; and also to compose all such differences between party and party, as shall be offered to them by way of arbitration, and to convince offenders, and reform all such things as they shall find amiss by their pastoral reproofs and admonitions, if they may be so reformed: And such matters as they cannot by this pastoral and persuasive way compose and reform, are by them to be prepared for, and presented to the bishop; at which meeting any other minister of that deanery may, if they please, be present. Moreover, the rural dean and his assistants are in their respective divisions to see that the children and the younger sort be carefully instructed by the respective ministers of every parish in the grounds of Christian Religion, and be able to give a good account of their faith and knowledge, and also of their Christian conversation conformable thereunto, before they be confirmed by the bishop, or admitted to the sacrament of the Lord's Supper.

6. "No bishop shall exercise any arbitrary power, do or impose any thing upon the clergy or the people, but what is according to the known law of the land.

7. "We are very glad to find; that all with whom we have conferred, do in their judgments approve a Liturgy, or set form of public worship to be lawful; which in our judgment, for the preservation of unity and uniformity, we conceive to be very necessary. And though we do conceive the liturgy of the church of England, contained in the book of Common-Prayer, and by law established, to be the best we have seen; and we believe, that we have seen all that are extant, and used in this part of the world, and well know what reverence most of the reformed churches, or at least the most learned men in those churches have for it; yet since we find some exceptions made against several things therein, we will appoint an equal number of learned divines of both persuasions to review the same, and to make such alterations as shall be thought most necessary; and some additional forms (in the scripture phrase as near as may be) suited unto the several parts of worship, and that it be left to the ministers, choice to use one or other at his discretion. In the mean time, and until this be done, although we do heartily wish and desire, that the ministers in their several churches, because they dislike some clauses and expressions, would not totally lay aside the use of the book of Common-Prayer, but read those parts against which there can be no exception, which would be the best instance of declining those marks of distinction which we so much labour and desire to remove: yet in compassion to divers of our good subjects, who scruple the use of it as now it is, our will is, that they should not be punished for not using it, until it be altered and effectually reformed as aforesaid.

8. "Lastly, concerning Ceremonies, which have administered so much matter of difference and contention, and which have been introduced by the wisdom and authority of the church for edification and the improvement of piety: We shall say no more, than that we have the more esteem of all, and reverence for many of them, by having been present in many of those churches, where they are most abolished or discountenanced, and it cannot be doubted, but that, as the universal church cannot introduce one ceremony in the worship of God, that is contrary to God's word expressed in the scripture; so every national church with the approbation and consent of the sovereign power, may, and hath always introduced such particular ceremonies, as in that conjuncture of time are thought most proper for edification and the necessary improvement of piety and devotion in the people, though the necessary practice thereof cannot be deduced from scripture; and that which before was, and is in itself indifferent, ceases to be indifferent, after it is established by law. And therefore our present consideration and work is, to gratify the private consciences of those who are grieved with the use of some ceremonies, by indulging to and dispensing with their omitting those ceremonies; not utterly to abolish any which are established by law (if any are practised contrary to law the same shall cease) which should be unjust and of ill example, and to impose upon the conscience of some, for the satisfaction of the conscience of others, which is otherwise provided for. As it could not be reasonable that such men should expect, that we should ourselves decline, or enjoin others to do so, to receive the blessed sacrament on our knees, which in our conscience is the most humble, most devout and most agreeable posture for that holy duty, because some other men upon reasons best, if not only known to themselves, choose rather to do it sitting or standing: We shall leave all decisions and determinations of that kind, if they shall be thought necessary for a perfect and entire unity and uniformity throughout the nation, to the advice of a national synod, which shall be duly called, after a little time, and a mutual conversation between persons of different persuasions, hath mollified those distempers, abated those sharpnesses, and extinguished those jealousies which make us unfit for those consultations. And upon such advice, we shall use our utmost endeavour, that such laws may be established, as may best provide for the peace of the church and state; provided that none shall be denied the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, though they do not use the gesture of kneeling in the act of receiving.

"In the mean time, out of compassion and compliance towards those who would forbear the cross in baptism. We are content that no man shall be compelled to use the same, or suffer for not doing it. But if any parent desire to have his child christened according to the form used, and the minister will not use the sign, it shall be lawful for that parent to procure another minister to do it: And if the proper minister shall refuse to omit that ceremony of the cross, it shall be lawful for the parent, who would not have his child so baptised, to procure another minister to do it who will do it according to his desire.

"No man shall be compelled to bow at the name of Jesus, or suffer in any degree for not doing it, without reproaching those who out of their devotion continue that ancient ceremony of the church.

"For the use of the surplice, we are contented that all men be left to their liberty to do as they shall think fit, without suffering in the least degree for wearing or not wearing it. Provided that this liberty do not extend to our own chapel, cathedral or collegiate churches, or to any college in either of our universities, but that the several statutes and customs for the use thereof in the said places, be there observed as formerly.

"And because some men, otherwise pious and learned, say, they cannot conform unto the subscription required by the canon, nor take the oath of canonical obedience, we are content, and it is our will and pleasure (so they take the oath of allegiance and supremacy) that they shall receive ordination, institution and induction, and shall be permitted to exercise their function, and to enjoy the profits of their livings, without the said subscription or oath of canonical obedience: And, moreover, that no persons in the universities shall, for the want of such subscription, be hindered in the taking their degrees. Lastly, That none be judged to forfeit his presentation or benefice or be deprived of it upon the statute of the thirteenth of queen Elizabeth, chapter the twelfth, so he read and declare his assent to all the articles of religion, which only concern the confession of the true christian faith, and the doctrine of the sacraments comprised in the book of Articles in the said statute mentioned. In a word, we do again renew what we have formerly said in our Declaration from Breda, for the liberty of tender consciences, that no man shall be disquieted, or called in question for differences of opinion in matters of religion, which do not disturb the peace of the kingdom: And if any have been disturbed in that kind since our arrival here, it hath not proceeded from any direction of ours.

"To conclude, and in this place to explain what we mentioned before, and said in our Letter to the House of Commons from Breda, that we hoped in due time ourselves to propose somewhat for the propagation of the Protestant religion that will satisfy the world, that we have always made it both our care and our study, and have enough observed what is most like to bring disadvantage to it: We do conjure all our loving subjects to acquiesce in and submit to this our Declaration concerning those differences which have so much disquieted the nation at home, and given such offence to the Protestant churches abroad, and brought such reproach upon the Protestant religion in general from the enemies thereof; as if upon obscure notions of faith and fancy, it did admit the practice of christian duties and obedience to be discountenanced and suspended, and introduce a licence in opinions and manners, to the prejudice of the christian faith. And let us all endeavour and emulate each other in those endeavours, to countenance and advance the Protestant religion abroad, which will be best done by supporting the dignity and reverence due to the best Reformed Protestant Church at home: and which being once freed from the calamities and reproaches it hath undergone from these late ill times, will be the best shelter from those abroad, which will by that countenance both be the better protected against their enemies, and be the more easily induced to compose the differences amongst themselves, which give their enemies more advantage against them: And we hope and expect, that all men will henceforward forbear to vent any such doctrine in the pulpit, or to endeavour to work in such manner upon the affections of the people, as may dispose them to an ill opinion of us and the government, and to disturb the peace of the kingdom; which if all men will in their several vocations endeavour to preserve the same affection and zeal we ourself will do; all our good subjects will by God's blessing upon us enjoy as great a measure of felicity, as this nation hath ever done, and which we shall constantly labour to procure for them, as the greatest blessing God can bestow upon us in this world. Given at our court at Whitehall this twenty fifth day of October 1660.*

Though this Declaration did not please all the ministers, yet the greatest numbers in London and country were content; but because it went upon the plan of Diocesan Episcopacy, which they had covenanted against, others were not satisfied; some ventured upon a second Address to the king, in which they renew their requests for Archbishop Usher's scheme of Primitive Episcopacy, as most agreeable to Scripture, most conducive to good discipline; and as that which would save the nation from the violation of the Solemn League and Covenant, which whether it were lawfully imposed or no, they conceive now to be binding upon them.

* "A little time before this Declaration was published, Chancellor Hyde (whose head and hand were most in it) had given notice of it in a speech to the parliament, wherein he tells them, 'He was commanded to mention to them two things recommended to them by his majesty in his Declaration from Breda, the one for composing those unhappy differences and distempers in religion, which had too much disturbed the peace of the kingdom. This saith he, is a sad argument indeed, it is a consideration that must make every religious heart to bleed, to see religion, which should be the strongest obligation and cement of affection, and brotherly kindness and compassion, made now by the perverse wranglings of passionate and froward men, the ground of all animosity, hatred, malice and revenge; and this unruly and unmanly passion, I fear, too frequently transports those who are in the right, as well as those who are in the wrong, and leaves the latter more excusable than the former. When men who find their manners and dispositions very conformable in all the necessary obligations of human nature, avoid one another's conversation, and grow first unsociable and then uncharitable to each other, because one cannot think as the other doth.'

'My Lords and Gentlemen; This disquisition hath cost the king many a sigh, many a sad hour, when he hath considered the almost irreparable reproach the Protestant Religion hath undergone from the divisions and distractions which have been so notorious in this kingdom. What pains he hath taken to compose them, after several discourses with pious and learned men of different persuasions, you will shortly see by a declaration he will shortly publish upon that occasion; by which you will see his great indulgence to those who can have any pretension from conscience to differ from their brethren.'" Kennet,

Concerning the preamble of his majesty's Declaration they tender these Requests:

1. "That as they are persuaded it is not in his majesty's thoughts, to intimate that they are guilty of the offences therein mentioned, they hope it will be a motive to hasten the Union.

2. "Though they detest sacrilege, yet they will not determine, whether in some cases of superfluities of revenues, and the necessity of the Church, there may not be an alienation, which is no sacrilege.

3. "His majesty having acknowledged their moderation, they still hope they may be received into the settlement, and continue their stations in the Church.

4. "Since his majesty has declared, that the essence of Episcopacy may be preserved, though the extent of the jurisdiction be altered, they hope his majesty will consent to such an alteration as may satisfy their consciences."

They then renew their requests for promoting of piety; of a religious and diligent ministry; of the requisites of Church Communion, and for the observation of the Sabbath. They complain that parish discipline is not sufficiently granted in his majesty's Declaration, that inferior synods are passed by, and that the bishop is not 'Episcopus præses, but episcopus princeps,' endued with sole power of ordination and jurisdiction. They therefore pray again, that archbishop Usher's form of Church-Government may be established at least in these three points:

1. "That the pastors of parishes may be allowed to preach, catechise, and deny the Communion of the Church to the impenitent, scandalous, or such as do not make a credible profession of faith and obedience to the commands of Christ.

2. "That the pastors of each rural deanry may meet once a month to receive presentments and appeals, to admonish offenders, and after due patience to proceed to excommunication.

3. "That a diocesan synod of the delegates of rural synods may be called as often as need requires; that the bishop may not ordain or exercise spiritual censures without the consent of the majority; and that neither chancellors, archdeacons, commissaries nor officials, may pass censures purely spiritual; but for the exercise of civil government, coercively by mulcts, or corporal penalties, by power derived from your majesty, as supreme over all persons and things ecclesiastical, we presume not at all to interpose."

As to the Liturgy.

"They rejoice that his majesty has declared, that none should suffer for not using the Common-Prayer and Ceremonies; but then it grieves us, say they, to hear that it is given in charge to the judges at the assizes, to indict men upon the Act of Uniformity for not using the Common-Prayer. That it is not only some obsolete words and phrases that are offensive, but that other things need amendment; therefore we pray, that none may be punished for not using the Book, till it be reformed by the consent of divines of both parties."

Concerning Ceremonies.

"They thank his majesty for his gracious concessions, but pray him to leave out of his Declaration these words, 'That we do not believe the practice of the particular ceremonies excepted against unlawful, because we are not all of that opinion; but we desire, that there may be no law nor canon for, nor against them, (being allowed by our opponents as indifferent) as there is no canon against any particular gesture in singing Psalms, and yet there is an uninterrupted unity.'"

For particular Ceremonies.

1. "We humbly crave, that there may be liberty to receive the Lord's Supper either kneeling, standing, or sitting. 2. That the observation of holy days of human institution may be left indifferent. 3. We thank your majesty for liberty as to the cross in Baptism, the surplice, and bowing at the name of Jesus; but we pray, that this liberty may extend to colleges and cathedrals for the benefit of youth as well as elder persons, and that the canons which impose these ceremonies may be repealed.

"We thank your majesty for your gracious concession of the forbearance of subscription; though we do not dissent from the doctrinal articles of the Church of England; nor do we scruple the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, nor would we have the door left open for papists and heretics to come in.

"But we take the liberty to represent to your majesty, that notwithstanding your gracious concessions, our ministers cannot procure institution without renouncing their ordination by Presbyters, or being re-ordained, nor without subscription and the oaths of canonical obedience. And we are apprehensive that your majesty's indulgence does not extend to the abatement of re-ordination, or subscription, or the oath of canonical obedience. We therefore earnestly crave, that your majesty will declare your pleasure. 1. That ordination and institution, and induction, may be conferred without the said subscription and oath. 2. That none may be urged to be re-ordained, or denied institution for want of ordination by prelates, that have been ordained by Presbyters. That none may forfeit their presentation or benefice for not reading those Articles of the thirty nine that relate to government and ceremonies."

However if the king's Declaration without any amendments, had passed into a law, it would have prevented in a great measure the separation that followed; but neither the Court, nor ministry intended it, if they could stand their ground upon the foot of the old establishment. A reverend prelate of the Church of England confesses, "that this Declaration has in it a spirit of true wisdom and charity above any one public confession that was ever made in matters of religion. It shews the admirable temper and prudence of the king and his council in that tender juncture of affairs; it proves the charity and moderation of the suffering bishops, in thinking such concessions just and reasonable for peace and unity; and it shews a disposition in the other party to have accepted the terms of union consistent with our episcopacy and liturgy. It condemns the unhappy ferment that soon after followed for want of this temper; and it may stand for a pattern to posterity, whenever they are disposed, to receive the discipline, and heal the breaches of the Church." Another conformist writer adds, "If ever a divine sentence was in the mouth of any king, and his mouth erred not in judgment; I verily believe it was thus with our present majesty when he composed that admirable Declaration, which next to holy scripture I adore, and think that the united judgment of the whole nation cannot frame a better or a more unexceptionable expedient, for a firm and lasting concord of these distracted churches."

The Presbyterians about London were so pleased, that they drew up the following Address of thanks in the name of the city ministers, and presented it to the king, Nov. 16, by the hands of the rev. Mr. Samuel Clarke.

"Most dread Sovereign! We your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, ministers of the gospel in your city of London, having perused your majesty's late Declaration, and find it so full of indulgence and gracious condescension, we cannot but judge ourselves highly obliged first to render our unfeigned thanks to God, and next our most humble and hearty acknowledgments to your majesty, that we may testify to your royal self, and all the world, our just sentiments of your majesty's great goodness and clemency therein expressed." The Address then recites the several condescensions of his majesty in the Declaration, and concludes thus, "We crave leave to profess, that though all things in this frame of government be not exactly suited to our judgments, yet your majesty's moderation has so great an influence on us, that we shall to our utmost endeavour the healing of the breaches, and promoting the peace and union of the church.—We would beg of your majesty with all humility upon our knees, that re-ordination, and the surplice in colleges might not be imposed; and we hope God will incline your majesty's heart to gratify us in these our desires also." Signed by Samuel Clark; William Couper; Tho. Case; Jo. Rawlinson; Jo. Sheffield; Thomas Gouge; Gab. Sanger; El. Pledger; Matth. Poole; Jo. Gibbon; William Whitaker; Tho. Jacomb; Thomas Lye; John Jackson; John Meriton; William Bates; with many others.

The king having received the Address, returned this answer, "Gentlemen, I will endeavour to give you all satisfaction, and to make you as happy as myself."

Agreeably to the promise made in this Declaration, concerning a Review of the Liturgy, the following Commission was issued:

The COMMISSION for the CONFERENCE of the SAVOY.

“Charles the second by the grace of God, king of England, Scotland, France and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, &c. To our trusty and well-beloved the most reverend father in God Accepted, archbishop of York, the right reverend fathers in God, Gilbert bishop of London, John bishop of Durham, John bishop of Rochester, Humphrey bishop of Sarum, George bishop of Worcester, Robert bishop of Lincoln, Benjamin bishop of Peterborough, Brian bishop of Chester, Richard bishop of Carlisle, John bishop of Exeter, Edward bishop of Norwich: and to our trusty and well beloved, the reverend Anthony Tuckney, D. D. John Conant, D. D. William Spurstow, D. D. John Wallis, D. D. Tho. Manton, D. D. Edmund Calamy, D. D. Richard Baxler Clerk, Arthur Jackson, Tho. Case, Samuel Clerk, Matthew Newcomen Clerks; and to our trusty and well beloved Dr. Earles, dean of Westminster, Peter Heylin, D. D. John Hacket, D. D. John Berwick, D. D. Peter Gunning, D. D. John Pearson, D. D. Tho. Pierce, D. D. Anthony Sparrow, Herbert Thorndike, D. D. Thomas Hollar, D. D. Thomas Jacomb, D. D. William Bate, John Rawlinson, Clerks, William Cooper, Clerk, Dr. John Lightfoot, Dr. John Collings, Dr. Benjamin Woodbridge, and William Drake clerk, greeting. Whereas by our Declaration of the 25th of October last, concerning Ecclesiastical Affairs, we did (amongst other things) express our esteem of the liturgy of the church of England, contained in the book of Common-Prayer; and yet since we find exceptions made against several things therein, we did by our said Declaration declare we would appoint an equal number of learned divines, of both persuasions, to review the same: We therefore in accomplishment of our said will and intent, and of our continued and constant care and study for the peace and unity of the churches within our dominions; and for the removal of all exceptions and differences, and the occasion of such differences and exceptions from among our good subjects; for or concerning the said book of Common-Prayer, or any thing therein contained, do by these our Letters Patents require, authorize, constitute and appoint you the said, &c. to advise upon, and review the said book of Common-Prayer; comparing the same with the most ancient liturgies which have been used in the church in the primitive and purest times. And to that end, to assemble and meet together, from time to time, and at such time within the space of four calendar months now next ensuing, in the Masters lodging in the Savoy in the Strand, in the county of Middlesex, or in such other place or places as to you shall be thought fit and convenient; to take into your serious and grave consideration the several directions and rules, forms of prayer, and things in the said book of Common-Prayer contained, and to advise, consult upon and about the same, and several objections and exceptions which shall now be raised against the same; and, (if occasion be) to make such reasonable and necessary alterations, corrections and amendments therein, as by and between you the said archbishops, bishops, doctors, and persons hereby required and authorized to meet and advise aforesaid, shall be agreed upon to be needful and expedient, for the giving satisfaction to tender consciences, and the restoring and continuance of peace and unity in the churches under our protection and government; but avoiding (as much as may be) all unnecessary abbreviations of the forms and liturgy, wherewith the people are altogether acquainted, and have so long received in the church of England. And our will and pleasure is, that when you the said archbishop, bishops, doctors and persons authorized and appointed by these our Letters Patents to meet, advise and consult upon, and about the premises as aforesaid, shall have drawn your consultations to any resolution, and determination which you shall agree upon as needful or expedient to be done for the altering, diminishing, or enlarging the said book of Common-Prayer, or any part thereof. That then forthwith you certify and present to us in writing under your several hands, the matters and things whereupon you shall so determine for our approbation; and to the end the same, or so much thereof, as shall be approved by us, may be established; and forasmuch as the said archbishop and bishops have several great charges to attend, which we would not dispense with, or that the same should be neglected upon any great occasion whatsoever; and some of them being of great age and infirmities, may not be able constantly to attend the execution of the service and authority hereby given and required by us, in the meeting and consultation aforesaid; We will therefore, and hereby require you the said Dr. Earles, &c. to supply the place and places of such of the archbishops and bishops (other than the said Edward bishop of Norwich) as shall by age, sickness, infirmity, or other occasions be hindered from attending the said meeting or consultation (that is to say) that one of you the said Dr. Earles, &c. shall from time to time supply the place of each one of them the said archbishop and bishops (other than the said Edward bishop of Norwich) which shall happen to be hindered or to be absent from the said meetings or consultations; and shall and may advise consult and determine; and also certify and execute all and singular the powers and authorities before mentioned, in and about the premises, as fully and absolutely as such archbishops and bishops which shall so happen to be absent, should or might do by virtue of these our Letters Patents, or any thing herein contained, in case he or they were personally present. And wherens in regard of the distance of some, the infirmity of others, the multitude of constant employment and other incidental impediments; some of you the said Edward bishop of Norwich, &c. may be hindered from the constant attendance in the execution of the service aforesaid; We therefore will, and do hereby require and authorize you the said Thomas Horton, &c. to supply the place or places of such the commissioners last above mentioned, as shall by the means aforesaid, or any other occasion be hindered from the said meeting and consultations, that one of you the said Thomas Horton, doctor, shall from time to time supply the places of each one of the said commissioners last mentioned, which shall happen to be hindered or absent from the said meeting and consultations; and shall and may advise, consult and determine, and also certify and execute all and singular the powers and authorities before mentioned, in and about the premises, as fully and absolutely as such of the said last mentioned commissioners, which shall so happen to be absent, should or might do by virtue of these our Letters Patents, or any thing therein contained, in case he or they were personally present: in witness whereof we have caused these our Letters to be made Patents: Witness Ourself at Westminster, the 25th of March, in the thirteenth year of our reign. (Per ipsum Regem.) BARKER."

* The bishop of London's lodgings in the Savoy was appointed for the place of meeting; when the parties appeared, the bishop of London acquainted the Presbyterian ministers, that themselves and not the bishops, had requested the Conference for making alterations in the Liturgy: That therefore nothing was to be done till they had delivered their Exceptions in writing, together with the additional forms and alterations which they desired.*

The Exceptions were accordingly drawn up

* "When the commissioners were assembled the first time, April 15, the Archbishop of York stood up and said, he knew but little of the business they were met about, and therefore referred it to Dr. Sheldon, Bishop of London, who gave it as his opinion, that the Presbyterians having desired this conference, they, the Bishops, should neither say nor do any thing till the others had brought in all their exceptions and complaints against the Liturgy in writing with their additional forms and amendments. The Presbyterians humbly moved for a Conference according to the words of the commission, but the Bishop of London insisting peremptorily upon his own method, the others consented to bring in their Exceptions at one time and their Additions at another. For this purpose Bishop Reynolds, Dr. Wallis, and the rest of the Presbyterian party, met from day to day, to collect their Exceptions; but the Additions or drawing up a new Form, was intrusted with Mr. Baxter alone. 'Bishop Sheldon saw well enough,' says Burnet, 'what the effect would be of obliging them to make all their demands at once, that the number would raise a mighty outcry against them as a people that could never be satisfied.' On the other hand the Presbyterians were divided in their sentiments; some were for insisting only on a few important things, reckoning that if they were gained, and by Dr. Renolds, Dr. Wallis, Dr. Bates, Dr. Jacomb, Mr. Calamy, Mr. Newcomen, Mr. Clerk, and others.

In this Paper laid before the bishops, "they move, that the prayers and other materials of the liturgy, might not be clogged with any thing that was doubtful or questioned among pious, learned and orthodox persons.

"1. That the imposing things of doubtful disputation as terms of communion, had in all ages been the ground of schism and separation: and for this they cite the authority of Mr. Hales.

"2. That as the English reformers at first out of their great wisdom, formed the liturgy in such a manner as was most likely to gain upon the Papists, by varying as little as might be from the offices anciently received; so according to the same rule of prudence, and charity, they desired the liturgy might be so composed as might best reconcile it to those Protestants who are agreed in the substantial points of religion.

"3. To proceed, they would have the repetitions and responsals of the parish-clerk and people, and the alternate reading of the psalms and hymns, omitted. They pretend this custom raised a confused noise in the congregation, and made what was read, less intelligible. They argue farther, that the minister ought to be the people's mouth in all public services: and that by the Holy Scriptures, the people's part is only to attend with reverential silence, and declare their consent in the close, by saying Amen.

"4. For this reason they would have the an Union followed, it might be easier to obtain other things afterwards. But the majority, by the influence of Mr. Baxter, were for extending their desires to the utmost, and thought themselves bound by the words of the commission to offer every thing they thought might conduce to the peace of the church, without considering what an aspect this would have with the world, or what influence their numerous demands might have upon the minds of those who were now their superiors in numbers and strength; but when they were put in mind that the king's commission gave them no power to alter the government of the church, nor to insist upon Archbishop Usher's model, nor so much as to claim the concessions of his majesty's late Declaration, they were quite heartless; for they now saw that all they were to expect was a few amendments in the Liturgy and Common-Prayer Book. This was concluded before-hand at court, and nothing more intended than to drop the Presbyterians with some plausible decency." 4 Neal, 271.

"N. B. All the Papers relating to the Conference at the Savoy are collected in a Book intitled, 'The History of Non-Conformity, as it was argued and stated by commissioners on both sides appointed by his majesty king Charles 2, in 1661.' 8vo. edit. 2d. 1703.

divided petitions in the litany thrown into one solemn prayer, to be pronounced by the ministers.

"5. That nothing might remain in the liturgy, which seems to countenance the observation of Lent, as a religious fast: That the example of our Saviour's fasting forty days and forty nights, was above human strength, and never designed for imitation. To corroborate this reasoning, they take notice, that by an act of parliament made the 5th of Elizabeth, abstinence from flesh is prohibited, upon the score of religion, and only recommended for politic considerations.

"6. That the religious observation of Saints-days, together with their Vigils, may be laid aside. And that if any of them are continued, they may be called Festivals, and not Holy-days, that they may not be made equal with the Lord's-day, nor have any peculiar service appointed, nor the people obliged wholly to forbear working; and that such names in the Calender which are not inserted in the first and second books of king Edward the 6th, may be left out.

"7. That the gift of prayer being one special qualification for the ministry, they desire the liturgy may not be so strictly imposed, as totally to exclude the exercise of that faculty in any part of public worship: and that in consequence of this, it may be left to the discretion of the minister to omit part of the stated service, as occasion shall require. And this liberty, they pretend, was allowed by the first Common-Prayer-Book of Edward the sixth.

"8. That in regard of the many defects observed in the Version of the Scriptures, used in the liturgy, they move these mis-performances may be struck out, and the new translation allowed by authority, substituted instead of the former. That the Version in the liturgy is either obsolete in language, or mistaken in sense, they endeavour to prove from the following instances. In the epistle for the first Sunday after Epiphany, Rom. 12. 1, it is read, Be ye changed in your shape: and the epistle for the Sunday next before Easter, Phil. 2. 5. Our Saviour is said to be found in his apparel as a man: and in the epistle for the fourth Sunday in Lent, Galat. 4. the old Version runs, Mount Sinai is Agar in Arabia, and borders upon the city, which is now called Jerusalem: the epistle for St. Matthew's day, 2 Cor. 4. they translate, We go not out of kind. The gospel for the second Sunday after Epiphany, John 2. it is translated, When men be drunk. The gospel for the first Sunday in Lent, taken out of the 11th of St. Luke, it is turned, One house does fall upon another. And lastly, the gospel for the Annunciation, taken out of the 1st of St. Luke. This is the first month which is called barren.

"9. That the canonical scriptures containing all things necessary to salvation, they desire the Apocryphal books may not be read: these writings having no unquestionable authority for recommending matters either of belief, or practice.

"10. That the minister may not be enjoined to read any part of the liturgy at the communion table, excepting such portions which properly belong to the Lord's Supper: And at such times only, when the Holy Sacrament is administered.

"11. That whereas the word minister, and not priest or curate, stands in the rubric for the absolution, and divers other places: It is requested this usage may be continued through the whole book: And that the Lord's Day may be inserted instead of Sunday.

"12. And in regard singing of psalms is a considerable part of public worship; they desire the version set forth and allowed to be sung in churches, may be mended; or that they may have leave to make use of a more correct translation.

"13. That all obsolete terms and expressions in language worn out, may be altered to words of common use. This is repeating part of their Eighth Objection. Their instances are 'Aread' used in the gospel for Monday and Wednesday before Easter. 'And then opened he their wits,' in the gospel for Easter Tuesday.

"14. That no portions of the Old Testament, or of the Acts of the Apostles, be called epistles, and read as such.

"15. That the phrase in several offices which presumes all persons within the communion of the church, regenerated, converted, and in an actual state of grace, may be reformed: For considering the want of ecclesiastical discipline, confessed in the Communion, such a supposition is more than the utmost charity can admit.

"16. That the petitions in the prayers might have a more orderly connection, and the forms carried on to a more competent length: That this method would be more to edification, and gain farther upon the people's esteem.

"Under this head, they are somewhat more particular:

"And first, They charge the collects with being generally too short, many of them consisting but of one, or at most, but of two sentences of petition. That they are generally prefaced with a repeated mention of the name and attributes of God, and presently concluded with the name and merits of Christ. That by this disposition of the service, many unnecessary breaks are occasioned: And that when many petitions are to be offered at the same time, these interruptions are neither agreeable to scriptural examples, nor suited to the gravity of that holy duty.

"Secondly, They object the prefaces of many collects have no clear and direct reference to the following petitions. That the petitions are put together without due order or natural connection, and falling short, instead of being suitable to the occasions for which they are used, seem to have been the effect of chance and inadvertency. It is therefore desired, that instead of those discontinued collects there may be one methodical and entire form of prayer composed of many of them.

"17. They observe the public liturgy of a church ought to comprehend the sum of all such sins as are ordinarily to be confessed in prayer: And take in such petitions and thanksgivings as are commonly to be put up by the church: And that the Catechisms, or public systems of doctrine, should contain a brief abstract of all such doctrines as are necessary to be believed: And the points should be set down in a clear, explicit manner. And here they pretend the liturgy is defective as to all these matters.

"1. Say they, there is no preparatory prayer, in the beginning of the service, for God's assistance and acceptance; and yet many collects in the middle of the worship, have little or nothing else.

"2. The Confession, as these ministers continue, is very defective: Original sin is not clearly expressed, nor the number of actual sins with their aggravations sufficiently enlarged on. That the form goes too much upon generals: Whereas confession being an exercise of repentance, ought to be more particular.

"3. They complain of a great defect in the forms of public thanksgiving. And,

"4. They object the whole body of the Common Prayer is too much wrapt up in generals: As, 'To be kept from all evil, from all enemies, from all adversity, that we may do God's will,' &c. without dilating upon the particulars included.

"5. They pretend the Catechism is defective in many necessary doctrines, and that some of the essentials of Christianity are not mentioned, less in the creed.

"18. They alledge the Liturgy enjoins the use of several ceremonies, which from the time of the first reformation have been judged unwarrantable by divers learned and pious men.

"The impositions complained of are, First, The enjoining the use of the surplice. Secondly, That none may baptise or be baptised, without the transient image of the cross, which has at least, they say, the appearance of a sacrament of human institution. Thirdly, The enjoining the posture of kneeling at receiving the Lord's Supper. And here they cite the authority of our Saviour and his Apostles for a different gesture: And that the Church of England contradicts the practice of the Catholic Church for several ages, and runs counter to the canons of the most venerable synods. And lastly, that the weight of these impositions are still made more burdensome by the canons requiring the clergy to subscribe their lawfulness."

To these Exceptions the Commissioners who represented the Church of England returned an Answer; part of which shall be laid before the reader.

"1. The Presbyterian ministers objected the Liturgy had all along given dissatisfaction to several persons of piety and learning; to this the episcopal divines returned, That the passages complained of in the Liturgy ought to be evidently proved unlawful, before any alterations can be demanded. That it is no argument to say a great many pious persons scruple the use of it, unless it can clearly be made out the Liturgy has given just ground for such scruples. For otherwise, if the bare pretence of scruples is a sufficient plea to discharge us from obedience, all law and order can signify nothing. To this they add, that if the Liturgy should be altered as the Ministers' Paper requires, the generality of the soberest and best members of the Church of England, would have just cause of disgust. For that such an alteration would imply a concession, that this Liturgy was an intolerable burthen upon tender consciences, and a usage plainly superstitious: For these are the pretences suggested for an alteration. Now the granting all this, must infer the justifying those who have separated from it, and the condemning all those who have adhered to it, with the hazard and loss of lives and fortunes. After this introduction, they proceed to give an answer to the first general proposal, and affirm, that the English reformers had been careful to put nothing into the Liturgy, but what is either evidently the word of God, or has been generally received by the Catholic Church. To the next proposal they answer, that great care must be taken to suppress private conception of prayer, both before and after sermon: That otherwise private opinions will be brought into pulpit-prayers. For what else can be expected, if private persons may have the liberty of making public devotions?

"To that part of the proposal that prayers may consist of nothing doubtful or questioned by pious, learned, and orthodox persons: The episcopal divines reply, That since it is not defined and ascertained who those orthodox persons are, they must either take all those for orthodox persons who have the assurance to affirm themselves such: And if so, the demand is unreasonable. For some who deny the divinity of the Son of God, will stile themselves orthodox, and yet there is no reason we should part with an article of our creed for their satisfaction. Besides, the proposal requires an impossibility. For there never was, nor ever will be, any prayers couched in such a manner, as not to be questioned by some people who call themselves pious, learned and orthodox. But if by orthodox is meant only those who adhere to scripture, and the Catholic consent of antiquity, they are not of opinion that any part of the English Liturgy has been questioned by such.

"To the general objection of the English service being loaded with church-pomp, imagery, many superfluities, and reviving obsolete customs: To this they answer, That if these generals are intended to be applied to the Liturgy, they are gross calumnies, and a contradiction to the confession of these very Ministers in the latter part of their Exceptions. But if no application is intended, they are foreign to the purpose, and therefore it had been more prudence and candour not to have mentioned them."

To go on with the Church Commissioners, who need not be mentioned at every Article.

"It was the wisdom of our Reformers, say they, to draw up such a Liturgy as neither Romanists nor Protestants could justly except against: And therefore, as the first never charged it with any positive errors, but only with the want of something they conceived necessary, so was it never found fault with by those properly distinguished by the name of Protestants; that is, those of the Augustan Confession. And as for others who have brought the church service into dislike with some people; this practice of theirs has been their fault and their sin: So that to urge the present state of affairs as an argument why the book should be altered, is by no means reasonable. To do this would be to gratify these men in an error, and make their own unwarrantable conduct an advantage to them.

"The third and fourth Proposals may go together; the demand in both being against responsals and alternate readings in hymns, psalms, &c. And that upon such a motive as really rather proves the necessity of continuing them in their present condition. They would take these usages away, because they do not edify: Now for this very reason, they ought to be kept on. For that they do edify, is plain, if not by informing our understandings, (the prayers and hymns being never made for a Catechism) yet by quickening, keeping up, and uniting our devotion, which is apt to sleep or grow languid, in a long continued prayer. Our edification therefore is best consulted by being called on and awakened by frequent Amens: by being excited by mutual exultations, petitions and holy emulations, which of us shall go farthest in shewing his own zeal for the glory of God, or contribute most to that of others. For this purpose alternate reading, repetitions and responses, are far more serviceable than a long tedious prayer. Nor is this our opinion only, but the judgment of former ages, as appears by the practice of the Jewish and ancient Christian churches.

"But these Demandants object, this custom clashes with the Scripture: That these inspired writings declare the minister's being appointed for the congregation in public prayers: That the people's part is only to attend with silence, and signify their assent by saying Amen. Now if these gentlemen mean, that the people in public services must only say the word Amen, they have no text to prove their assertion. Besides, they themselves practise the direct contrary in one of their principal parts of worship: We mean their singing of psalms, where the people have as great a part as the minister. Now if this may be done in Hopkins's, why not in David's Psalms? If in metre, why not in prose? If in a Psalm, why not in a Litany?

"Farther, it is desired that nothing should be in the Liturgy which so much as seems to countenance the observation of Lent, as a religious fast: This is requested as an expedient for peace, and is in effect to desire our church may shew herself contentious for the sake of peace, and divide from the Catholic Church, that we may correspond the closer at home, and live at unity among ourselves. But, St. Paul reckons those contentious, who oppose the custom of the churches of God. Now that the religious observation of Lent was a custom of the churches of God, appears by the testimonies of the Fathers. This demand therefore has no tendency to peace, but dissension. And here the fasting forty days may be practised in imitation of our Saviour, notwithstanding what is objected to the contrary. For though we cannot reach up to his divinity, follow him passibus aequis, and abstain wholly from meat for so long a time, yet we may fast forty days together, either as Cornelius did, till three o'clock in the afternoon, or till noon, as St. Peter did, or at least we may come up to Daniel's fast, and forbear entertaining our palate: And thus far, without question, it is possible for us to imitate our Lord. Nor does the act of parliament, 5 Eliz. forbid fasting in this manner, or upon the view abovementioned: We dare not suppose the parliament had any intention to prohibit a custom commanded by the Church of Christ. Neither does the act determine any thing about a Lenten fast, but only provides for the increase of the navy, and encouraging the fishery upon that score. Besides, we must not interpret one statute so as to make it clash with another. Now the 1st of Eliz. cap. 2, still in force, confirms the whole Liturgy, and by consequence the religious keeping of Lent: and this with a severe penalty upon all those who speak in derogation of any part of the Common-Prayer. And therefore that other act of 5 Eliz. cap. 5, must not be interpreted to a counter sense, and as if it prohibited the religious keeping of Lent.

"The observing Saints-Days is not enjoined as of divine, but of ecclesiastical institution: that therefore it is not necessary they should have any particular appointment in Scripture: their being useful for the promoting piety, and serviceable to the general end recommended in holy writ, is sufficient for this purpose. That the observation of these solemnities was a primitive custom, appears by the Rituals and Liturgies, by the consentient testimony of antiquity, and by the ancient Translations of the Bible: for instance, by the Syriac and Ethiopic versions, where the lessons appointed for holy days, are particularly marked. Now the former of these Translations comes near the apostolic age. Farther, our Saviour himself kept the feast of the Dedication, which was a solemnity of the church's institution. And the chief business of these days, being not for feasting, not for entertainment and diversion, but the exercise of holy duties, they are more properly called holy days than festivals: and though they are all of a resembling nature, it cannot be inferred they all require an equal regard. As for the people, they may be indulged working after evening service, if authority shall think fit. The other names excepted against, stand in the Kalendar, not that they should be kept as holy days, but upon the score of their being useful for preserving the memories of some eminent persons: they are likewise serviceable for leases, law-days, &c.

"Their proposal touching the gift of prayer, makes the Liturgy, in effect, wholly insignificant: for what else can be the consequence, if every minister may put in, and leave out at discretion? As for the gift, or rather the spirit of prayer, it consists in the inward graces of the Holy Spirit, and not in extemporary expressions: such unpremeditated effusions are only the effects of natural parts, of a voluble tongue and uncommon assurance. But if there is any such gift as is really pretended, this extraordinary qualification must be subject to the prophets and the order of the church.

"Considering the mischiefs coming by impertinent, ridiculous, and sometimes seditious, wicked and blasphemous expressions, under pretence of giving liberty for exercising the gift of prayer; considering the honour of God is so highly injured, and religion suffers so much this way, it is reasonable those who desire such an indulgence in public devotions, should first give the church security, that no private opinions should be put into their prayers: and that nothing contrary to the faith, should be uttered before God, or offered up to him in the church. To prevent which mischiefs, the former ages knew no better way than forbidding the use of any prayers in public, excepting such as were prescribed by public authority.

"The Presbyterians objections against the obsolete language, and mistaken sense in the Translation used in the Liturgy, are all true, and all amended.

"The Church Commissioners proceed to consider their Exceptions against reading Apocryphal lessons in the church. And here they observe, the Presbyterians demand an alteration upon such grounds as would exclude all Sermons as well as the Apocrypha. Their argument is, the holy Scriptures contain all things necessary with reference both to belief and practice. This plea is returned upon them with a dilemma: if the inspired writings, say the Church-Commissioners, are so comprehensive, to what purpose are there so many unnecessary Sermons? Why have we any thing more than the reading of Holy Scriptures? But if notwithstanding the sufficiency of the Old and New Testament, Sermons are necessary, there is no reason why these Apocryphal chapters should not be reckoned equally useful: for most of them deliver excellent discourses and precepts of morality: and it is much to be wished the sermons of these ministers were no worse: if they are afraid these books may by this regard come up to an equal authority with the Canon; the church has secured them against this apprehension, by calling them Apocryphal: now it is the church's testimony which teaches us to make this distinction. And lastly, to leave out these Apocryphal lessons, were to cross upon the practice of former ages.

"That the minister should not read the communion service at the communion-table, is not reasonable to demand, since it was the practice of all the Primitive Church: and if we do not govern ourselves by that golden rule of the Council of Nice, "Let ancient customs be continued," unless reason plainly requires the contrary, we shall give offence to sober Christians by a causeless departure from Catholic usage, and put a greater advantage in the hands of our adversaries, than it is to be hoped our brethren the Dissenters would willingly allow. As for the priest's standing at the Communion-table, it seems an invitation to the holy Sacrament, and reminds us that it is the duty of some of us at least, to receive every Sunday: and though we happen to neglect our duty, it is fit the church should suggest recollection, and keep her standing.

"It is not reasonable the word Minister should only be used in the Common-Prayer: for since some parts of the Liturgy may be performed by a deacon and others, such as Absolution and Consecration, by none under the order of a Priest, it is fit some such word as Priest should be used for those offices which are appropriated to his character: the term Minister being of too low and lax a signification for this purpose. The word Curate likewise signifies those who are entrusted by the bishop with the cure of souls, and therefore very fit to be used. Sunday being a very ancient distinction of the day upon which our Saviour rose from the dead, there is no reason that name should be disused.

"Singing of Psalms in metre, continue the Church-Commissioners, is no part of the Liturgy, and by consequence no part of our communion.

In answer to the 15th objection, they allege, that the church's phrase in her prayers, is no more offensive than St. Paul's: this apostle in his epistles to the Corinthians, Galatians, and others, calls them in general the Churches of God sanctified in Christ Jesus, and Saints by their vocation. And yet amongst these, there were many, who upon the score of their open irregularities, could not properly be stiled such: however, St. Paul denominates the whole from the greater part, and puts the rest in mind of their profession, what they have undertaken in their baptism, and the privileges and honourable distinctions to which that Sacrament has given them a title.

"As to the connexion of the parts of the Liturgy, it is conformable to the example of the Churches of God, and has as much coherence as usually occurs in many petitions of the same Psalm. And the method of these offices they must believe to be admirable and beyond exception, till the Presbyterians can suggest a better, which is not yet done.

"The Collects, by their brevity, are best sui'd to devotion, and resemble those short, but prevalent prayers in Scripture, 'Lord be merciful to me a sinner.' 'Son of David have mercy on us.' 'Lord increase our faith.'

After this, proceeding to the remainder of the objection, they subjoin, "We cannot imagine why the repeated name and mention of the attributes of God, should not be most acceptable to any person religiously disposed; or how this repetition should seem any burthen, since David magnified one attribute of God's mercy six and twenty times together. Nor can we conceive why the name and merits of Jesus should be less comfortable to us than to former saints and martyrs: and since the hopes of obtaining our petitions are founded upon the attributes of God, such prefaces of prayers as are taken from the divine perfections, are not to be censured as unsuitable and casual, though they should have no special reference to the following petitions."

From hence they advance to the 17th exception: "And whereas it was objected there was no preparatory prayer in our Liturgy for God's assistance or acceptance, they answer, this is plain misreporting the Common-Prayer. For besides a preparatory exhortation, there are several prayers upon the heads in which it is pretended they are deficient. The instances are these; 'Despise not, O Lord, humble and contrite hearts.' 'That those things may please him that we do at this present.' 'O Lord open our lips,' &c.

"As to the Presbyterians objection against the Church's Confession being couched in general terms, the episcopal divines answer, that this is rather a perfection, than a disadvantage: that the offices are intended for common use: that general services would cease to be such, by descending to particulars. To come closer to the case: when confession of sins is general, all persons may and must join in it, considering in many things we offend all. But if the enumeration of sin was particular, it would not be so well suited to the use of the congregation: for it may well be supposed to happen, that some persons may by God's grace, have been preserv'd from several of those sins recited: and therefore by confessing themselves guilty, they would lie to God Almighty, and thus stand in need of a new confession. As for original sin, they conceive it sufficiently acknowledged in the church's confessing, that 'without God's help, our frailty cannot but fall; and that our mortal nature can do no good thing without him.'

"And whereas the Presbyterians complained of the want of stated forms for several public occasions; the Church-Commissioners answer, they are not conscious of any such defect: however, if any such thing can be made good, the Church will provide accordingly.

"The Dissenters complain, the Liturgy goes too much upon generals, in their applications for God's grace and protection, and instance in these expressions; 'That we may do God's will; that we may be kept from all evil.'

Now these, reply the Church-Commissioners, are almost the very terms in the Lord's Prayer. So that they must reform that, before they can pretend to mend our Liturgy in these petitions."

The principal demand of the Presbyterians, was, "That those which impose any ceremonies, especially the surplice, the sign of the cross, and kneeling, might be abrogated. Their reasons for this demand, are these.

"1. It is doubtful, as the Presbyterians argue, whether God has empower'd men to impose such significant signs. For though they call them significant, they have no real goodness in the judgment of the imposers themselves: for they call them things indifferent, and therefore they cannot fall under St. Paul's rule of Omnia decenter, neither are they suitable to the simplicity of gospel worship.

"2. Because it is a violation of the royalty of Christ, and an impeachment of his laws as insufficient. Their other two reasons, drawn from their being scrupled by several learned and orthodox men; and giving occasion to divisions and persecution, have been mentioned already."

The Church-Commissioners, before they answer particularly to these reasons, premise some general rules for supporting their following discourse.

"1. They observe, that God has not only given a power, but likewise commanded the imposing whatever shall be truly decent and becoming his public service. That after St. Paul had laid down some particular rules for praying, thanksgiving, prophesying, &c. he concludes with this general precept, let all things be done εὐκρίτως, in a decent manner: and that there may be uniformity in these circumstances of decency, the apostle adds, let there be a τάξις, a rule, or canon for that purpose.

2. Superiors, not inferiors, must be judges of what is decent and convenient: those who have authority to order that every thing be done decently, must of necessity first judge of the quality of things.

"3. These rules for decency made and enjoined by superiors, ought to be obeyed by inferiors, till it is made as clear that they are not bound to obey in the particular case, as it is evident in general, that it is their duty to obey their superiors: for if the exemption from obedience is less clear than the command to obey, it must be sin not to obey.

"4. Pretence of conscience is no discharge from obedience, for the law, as long as it continues, binds to obedience: it is the apostle's doctrine, 'Ye must needs be subject.' As to the pretence of a tender or reluctant conscience, this plea can never disable the law: for it neither takes away the authority of the legislator, nor makes the matter of the law unlawful. Besides, if pretence of conscience was a sufficient excuse for non-obedience, laws would signify nothing; for every body might pretend this plea; which if allowed, anarchy and confusion must inevitably follow.

5. "Though charity moves for compassion, and may dispose superiors to relieve those that are really over scrupulous and perplexed; yet we must not break God's command out of good nature: and therefore we must not suffer the public service to be indecently or disorderly performed, for the ease of tender consciences.

"Having premised this general answer, the church commissioners proceed to argue that those things which they call indifferent, because neither expressly commanded, nor forbidden by God Almighty, have something of natural proportion, goodness and decency in them; and for this reason they are imposed: Thus by St. Paul's rule, and many others in scripture, authority is given to governors, to impose signs, which certainly are never the worse, because they carry a signification of decency and regard. On the other side, if the church should enjoin the use of ceremonies which were wholly insignificant; such an exercise of power might rather be questioned.

2. "To make such laws upon the score of decency is no violation of Christ's royalty: it is only exercising a branch of that authority granted to his church: and therefore disobeying such commands of superiors, is a plain opposition to his sovereignty. Farther, making laws for the sake of decency, does by no means imply a charge of insufficiency upon our Saviour's institutions. For it is evident by the precepts themselves, that our Saviour never intended to determine every minute circumstance of time, place, and manner: he only commanded the substance of religious duties in general, and directed to the right ends of the performance. As to other matters, our Lord left every man to the suggestions of reason for private services; and appointed governors of the church to determine such particularities for the public. Thus for instance, our Saviour commanded prayers, fasting, &c. But time and place for these duties are undetermined. Thus by parity of reasoning, to make laws for regulating the points of decency, is no imputation upon his economy; for it is plain it was not his design to state these matters. He has left us governors for this purpose: their commission is express to all imaginable advantage: 'As my Father sent me, so send I you. Obey those that have the rule over you.' He has likewise told us, that if we will not hear his church, we must be reckoned no better than heathens and publicans.

"And whereas the non-conformists plead they cannot obey the commands of the church for fear of violating the precept, which forbids adding to the word of God. To this the church commissioners answer, These ministers do not well consider, that it is no addition to the word of God to command things for order and decency, provided they are not enjoined as God's immediate instructions, but only as regulations of human authority. But on the other hand, to affirm that superiors are not allowed to command things unforbidden by God Almighty, is an undeniable addition to the word of God. And likewise to deny ecclesiastical or civil governors that power which the scriptures have given them, is diminishing God's word, which is no less forbidden in the text last mentioned.

"And supposing some people continue perplexed, and under scruples; the church may notwithstanding, without sin, insist upon her commands for complying with decent ceremonies. And all this without being guilty of offending our weak brother; for here the scandal is taken, and not given. It is the prejudice and mistake of the scrupulous person that disturbs himself; and therefore he may be justly said to lay the stumbling block in his own way.

"Neither will the case of St. Paul's not eating flesh if it offended his brother, do any service to the complainants. For here it must be observed, the apostle speaks of things not commanded by God or his church; of matters which had nothing of decency or significance for religious purposes. And therefore in a case thus foreign and unrelated to divine worship, St. Paul was willing to resign his liberty, rather than offend his brother. But if any man should venture to break a just law or custom of the church, the apostle marks him for a contentious person.

"That these ceremonies have occasioned many divisions, as it is pretended, is no more their fault, than the misunderstandings between the nearest relations, accidentally consequent upon the preaching of the Gospel, can be fairly charged on the Christian religion.

"After this they proceed to justify the use of the surplice by alledging, that both reason and experience may inform us, that decency in ornament and habit strike the senses, and excite reverence and regard: upon this view they are made use of in the equipage of princes, and in courts of justice. And why then should the service of God be refused this common advantage? and to come to the particular case, no habit is more suitable at holy ministrations than white linen: It is an emblem of purity and beauty: angels have appeared in this dress, and therefore what colour can be more proper for those whom the scripture dignifies with that name? and that this habit was anciently used in the church, we may learn from St. Chrysostom.

"The cross, continue these episcopal divines, was always used in the church in immortali lapidato. To testify therefore our communion with the saints of former ages, as our creed teaches us; and to signify we are not ashamed of the cross of Christ: for these reasons they conceive it proper this ceremony should be continued, and cannot imagine it should trouble the conscience of any person that desires to be satisfied.

"As to the posture of kneeling, they argue it best becomes the solemnity of the holy Eucharist: That the most valuable blessings ought to be received with the greatest marks of reverence and submission. That postures of familiarity are not acceptable to God Almighty upon so solemn an occasion, may be collected from Malachi i. 6, 8. That when the church used standing at her prayers, the manner of receiving was more adorantium: That since this posture of standing has been disused, and kneeling practised instead of it; since this circumstance is thus altered by the church's appointment, to stand at the Communion now, when we kneel at prayers, would be by no means decent; neither was it ever the custom of the best times.

"The Church Commissioners conclude their General Answer with taking notice, that there were ancient liturgies in the church, as appears plainly from St. Chrysostom's, St. Basil's, and others: And the Greeks, say they, mention St. James's, much older than the rest. And though we cannot trace entire liturgies through all the centuries of Christianity; yet that there were such in the earliest ages, may certainly be concluded from the fragments remaining: such as, Sursum Corda, &c. Gloria Patri, Benedicite, Hymnus, Cherubinus, &c. Vere Dignum et Justum, &c. Dominus vobiscum et cum Spiritu tuo, with several others: and notwithstanding the liturgies now extant may be interpolated; yet where the forms and expressions are agreeable to Catholic doctrine, they may well be presumed uncorrupted remainders, and primitive usage; especially since general councils are silent as to the original of these liturgies."

To this Answer the Non-conformists put in a long Reply.

As to their more particular exceptions against the Rubric and the offices in the Common Prayer; "In the Litany they would have 'from all other deadly sin,' altered to 'from all other heinous sins.' 'From sudden death,' they moved might be changed to 'unprepared dying suddenly.' They take check at the church's praying for 'all that travel,' and insist the expression may be qualified, to 'those that travel.' In the office for the Visitation of the Sick, they except to the form of absolution, press for declarative and conditional expressions; as 'I pronounce thee absolved if thou dost truly repent and believe.' To this the Church Commissioners answer, "That the form of absolving in the Liturgy is more agreeable to the scriptures than that which these ministers desired. For where the apostles, and their successors the bishops and priests, are commissioned for this purpose, it is declared, 'Whose sins ye remit, they are remitted;' not 'whose sins you pronounce remitted;' neither needs the condition be expressed, being always necessarily understood.

"In the office for Churching of Women, they would have this prayer with the responsal omitted; O Lord save this woman thy servant; Answ. Which putteth her trust in thee. The reason of their exception is, That it may happen a woman may come to give thanks for a child born in adultery or fornication. But to this the episcopal divines reply, That in such cases she is to do penance before she is church-ed. And which is the last case that I shall mention, they except against the Rubrics enjoining the woman to offer the accustomed offerings: this they pretend looks too like a Jewish purification. To this the Church Commissioners return, That offerings are required as well under the Gospel, as under the Law; and that when we give thanks for special blessings and deliverance from danger, it is a proper occasion for such religious acknowledgments."

Besides the Exceptions already mentioned by the Non-conformists, there were larger Additions or new Forms referred to Baxter's management. This divine went a great way in his commission, and drew up an entire service which he intitled he Reformed Liturgy. This was read by the ministers, and generally approved. The Common Prayer is very much altered in this composition: the additions and omissions are considerable; and both matter and form remarkably different. It was laid before the bishops and other divines in the commission. In the commendatory address before it, the non-conformists had the modesty to declare, that if any of those rules or directions upon debate shall be judged by the Commissioners unnecessary or over-long, we shall be very ready (say they) to submit either to the alteration, or omission of them. At last, in the close of their application, they desire the several particulars thereof may be inserted into the respective places of the Liturgy to which they belong; and be left to the minister's choice to use the one or the other, according to his majesty's gracious Declaration concerning Ecclesiastical Affairs.

About ten days before the commission expired, the non-conformists desired a personal conference with the bishops upon the subject of the papers exchanged. This request being agreed, three of each party were pitched on to manage the dispute: the bishops chose Dr. Pearson, Dr. Gunning, and Dr. Sparrow: the ministers' managers were Dr. Bates, Dr. Jacob, and Mr. Baxter: When they met, the conference, through want of order, frequent interruptions, and personal reflections, turned to no account.

Time being thus spent to little purpose, bishop Cosens at last produced a Paper, containing an expedient to end the controversy. The principal thing in this paper was a proposal to put the complainants upon distinguishing between things they charged as sinful, and others, which they opposed upon the score of expediency. The three disputants on the ministers' side, were desired to draw up their sense upon this subject against the next morning. This was accordingly done and delivered, but in their own names only: for here they would not pretend to represent their party. In this discourse they charge the Rubric and Injunctions of the Church with eight things, flatly sinful and contrary to the word of God: they are these: 1. That no minister be admitted to baptize without the transient image of the cross. 2. That no minister be permitted to read or pray, or exercise the other parts of his office that dares not wear a surplice. 3. That none be admitted to Communion in the Lord's-Supper, that dare not receive it kneeling; and that all ministers be enjoined to deny it to such. 4. That ministers are obliged to pronounce all baptized infants regenerate by the Holy Ghost, whether they are children of Christians or not. 5. That ministers be forced to deliver the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ unto the unfit, both in health, and sickness, and that with personal application, putting it into their hands: And that such are forced to receive it, though against their own wills, in the conscience of their impenitency. 6. That ministers are forced to absolve the unfit, and that in absolute expressions. 7. That ministers are forced to give thanks for all whom they bury, as brethren whom God has delivered and taken to himself. And, 8. That none may be a preacher that dares not subscribe there is nothing in the Common-Prayer-Book, book of Ordination, and the 39 Articles, that is contrary to the word of God.

The most remarkable things in this debate were these two.

"First, They had a long argument about settling the sense and application of Rom. xiv. 1, 2, 3. 'Him that is weak in the faith, receive you, but not to doubtful disputations, &c.' Here the Presbyterian ministers were the opponents.

"In the other part of the dispute, the question was, Whether it was sinful to enjoin ministers to deny the Communion to those that would not receive it kneeling? And here the episcopal divines who opposed, urged several arguments, that things in their own nature indifferent, might become necessary as to their use, when commanded by lawful authority. In this debate, the episcopal divines arguing thus; That a command which commands only an act in itself lawful is not sinful. This was denied by Baxter, upon the score that some unlawful circumstance might hang upon the command, or because the penalty might be over-charged. The opponents reinforced their proposition thus: That command which commandeth an act in itself lawful, and no other act whereby any unjust penalty is enjoined, nor any circumstance whence directly, or per accidens, any sin is consequent, which the commander ought to provide against, is not sinful. This Baxter denied, 'because the first act commanded, may be accidentally unlawful, and be commanded by an unjust penalty, though no other act or circumstance be such.' The opponents endeavoured to set the argument in a stronger light, if possible. To this purpose they improve their proposition thus: That command which commandeth an act, in itself lawful, and no other act whereby any unjust penalty is enjoined, nor any circumstance whence directly or per accidens, any sin is consequent, which the commander ought to provide against, hath in it all things requisite to the lawfulness of a command, and particularly cannot be guilty of commanding an act per accidens unlawful, nor of commanding an act under an unjust penalty. This proposition was denied by Baxter for his reasons last mentioned."

Before we leave this famous Conference at the Savoy it will not be amiss to remark the behaviour of the Commissioners on both sides; some of whom seldom or never appeared, as Dr. King, bishop of Chichester, Dr. Heylin, Barwick and Earl; Sheldon bishop of London came but seldom, though he, with Hinchman and Morley, had the chief management of affairs; others were present, but did not much concern themselves in the debate, as Dr. Frewen archbishop of York; Lucy of St. David's; Warner of Rochester; Saunderson of Lincoln; Lancy of Peterborough; Walton of Chester; Sterne of Carlisle; Dr. Hockett and Dr. Sparrow—On the side of the Presbyterians Dr. Horton never appeared, nor Dr. Drake, because of a misnomer in the commission; Dr. Lightfoot, Tuckney, and Mr. Woodbridge were present but once or twice.

Among the bishops; Dr. Morley was the chief speaker; his manner was vehement, and

* "Whether the encouragement the Non-Conformists received from the king, and the ministry, the assurances they might have from some leading members in parliament, or their interest they reckoned on with the people; whether all, or any of these motives made them stand off, and less compliant, is farther than I shall pronounce.

"Before I take leave of this subject, I shall just mention those Church Commissioners who had the greatest share in the debate. Hinchman, then bishop of Salisbury, and afterwards of London, is reported well acquainted with the Fathers and Councils: He discoursed with great temper, but was strongly against large abatements, and schemes of comprehension. This prelate, together with Sheldon and Morley, are said to have had the chief management of this affair. Dr. Pearson, afterwards bishop of Chester, disputed with great exactness. The ministers on the other side had a particular regard for him, and believed that if this divine had been an umpire in the controversy, his concessions would have gone a great way: And to mention only one more, Dr. Gunning, afterwards bishop of Ely, had a principal part in the debate: He had a ready pronounciation, and argued with great learning and vigour. His regard for the practice of antiquity made him adhere strictly to the ceremonies and constitution of the church: and he thought it by no means reasonable to give up usages and regulations, so primitively settled, and supported.

"At the close of the last day it was mutually agreed, that the Report of the Conference should be delivered to the king in writing: And that each party should give in this general account, 'That the church's welfare, that unity and peace, and his majesty's satisfaction, were ends upon which they were all agreed: But as to the means, they could not come to any harmony.'" Collier.

he was against all abatements. He frequently interrupted Mr. Baxter; and when Dr. Bates said, 'Pray my lord, give me leave to speak, he could not obtain it.

Bishop Cosins was there constantly, and though he was inclined to moderate measures, said some very severe things. When the ministers prayed the bishops to have some compassion on their brethren, and not cast such great numbers unnecessarily out of the ministry, he replied, "What, do you threaten us with numbers? For my part I think the king would do well to make you name them all." Again, when the ministers complained, that after so many years calamity the bishops would not yield to that which their predecessors offered before the war, bishop Cosins replied, "Do you threaten us then with a new war? 'Tis time for the king to look to you."

Bishop Gauden often took part with the presbyterian divines, and was the only moderator among the bishops, except bishop Reynolds, who spoke much the first day for abatements and moderation; but afterwards sitting among the bishops he only spoke now and then a qualifying word, but was heartily grieved for the fruitless issue of the Conference.

Of the disputants, 'tis said, Dr. Pearson, afterwards bishop of Chester, disputed accurately, soberly, and calmly, the presbyterian ministers had a great regard for him, and believed, that if he had been an umpire in the controversy his concessions would have gone a great way.

Dr. Gunning was the most forward speaker, and stuck at nothing. Bishop Burnet says, that all the arts of sophistry were used by him in as confident a manner as if they had been sound reasoning; that he was unweariedly active to very little purpose, and being very fond of the popish ritual and ceremonies, he was much set upon reconciling the church of England to Rome.

On the side of the presbyterians, Dr. Bates and Manton behaved with great modesty: the most active disputant was Mr. Baxter, who had a very metaphysical head and fertile invention, and was one of the most ready men of his time for an argument, but too tenacious of his own opinion. Next to him was Mr. Calamy, who had a great interest among the presbyterian ministers in the city and country, and for his age and gravity was respected as their father.

Among the auditors Mr. Baxter observes there was with the bishops a crowd of young divines who behaved indecently; but mentions only two or three scholars and laymen, who, as auditors, came in with the Presbyterians, as Mr. Miles, Mr. Tillotson, and others.

After the removal of lord Clarendon, an attempt for a Comprehension of the Protestant Dissenters was set on foot in the year 1668, by Lord-Keeper Bridgman, Hale, Wilkins and others; an account of its failure is given by Burnet in the History of his own Times, Vol. 1.

p. 249. See also 4 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 413, et seq. and 4 Neal's History of the Puritans 340. An attempt of the same nature in favour of the sectaries was made about the same time in Scotland. Laing thus speaks of it:

"The humane design to relieve the Presbyterians, was retarded, not discouraged by the attempt on Sharp. The scandalous lives, and the ignorance of the western clergy were notorious, and the people were agitated and inflamed by a hot, itinerant race of youthful preachers, whose fiery polemics required a present remedy, more efficacious than persecution could afford. An accommodation with the presbyterians was attempted by Leighton, while the situation of the church might admit of an easy comprehension of sects. The prelates, intent on the acquisition of power, had introduced no material innovation in its worship or its rites: Its worship was still extemporary, or in some congregations was exchanged for a portion of the Liturgy; the sacramental rites were administered without kneeling, or the sign of the cross; and as the surplice, the altar, and the offensive ceremonies of the preceding reign were not generally revived, an uniform mode of worship was not difficult to be restored. The chief obstacle, and almost the only source of defection, was the government of the church, which, according to Leighton's scheme of comprehension, was to be restored to its former situation in the reign of James. The bishops were to relinquish their negative, and not to ordain without the concurrence of the presbytery, and their authority was to be reduced to little more than a right to preside in ecclesiastical courts. The presbyterian clergy were to be replaced and relieved from canonical oaths, and permitted, on their ordination or return to their Presbyteries, to exonerate their conscience by a Protestation against the precedence of the bishops, to which they submitted only for the sake of peace. Leighton, whose proposals were moderate, yet artful to an extreme, expected that the protestations would soon be forgotten, and represented to his own order, that their authority would easily be recovered, without the danger of a schism, when the present generation had sunk into the grave. But the prelates were not more unwilling to unlock the gates, than the Presbyterians to enter within the pale of the established church. The latter were apprehensive of the same consequences which Leighton anticipated, that if the people were once accustomed to the name of prelates, Presbytery would expire with the present generation, and therefore they preferred a separate, precarious existence, as a persecuted sect, to a secure and honourable, but obscure asylum, during the remainder of their lives. The people were industriously impressed with their fears; Touch not, taste not, handle not, was their favourable text against religious communion with an hostile sect. The accommodation was protracted by fruitless conferences, in which their scrupulous obstinacy was generally blamed; but when their church had been deprived so lately of a legal establishment, it is not surprising that in the true spirit of sectaries, they declined a comprehension which must have soon extinguished their religion and their name.

"A partial-indulgence proposed at the same time by Tweedale, would have proved a more efficacious remedy, had it been extensively adopted, or even steadily pursued. A part of the ejected clergy was permitted to officiate in vacant churches, and a small salary was promised to others who remained unprovided. The wages of silence were rejected, or rather were never paid; but the indulgence was at first so acceptable, that at different times above forty ministers were restored to their churches; and their labours were at first so successful, that the people endeavoured, in other parishes, to purchase the resignation of the episcopal incumbents. But the exiled and ejected clergy inveighed at an indulgence from which they were excluded themselves. In a few years, their publications and sermons against an Erastian dependance on the civil magistrate, estranged and separated the people from the indulged. When the latter ceased to preach to the times, the salt of their doctrine lost its relish, and it was visible to the people that the divine grace with which they were endued in conventicles, had departed on their submission to the injunctions of the civil power. The kings curates, as they were contumeliously denominated, were compared to dumb dogs, unable or afraid to bark. The controversy continued burning for many years. The people returned to their conventicles with an increase of appetite, the temporising clergy relapsed into those popular doctrines which they had been forbidden to preach. But the severity of government was soon awakened by the rapid growth and increase of conventicles, for which the indulgence was supposed to leave no pretext." 4 Hist. of Scotland, 53.

For the Proceedings at the Hampton Court Conference in 1604, see vol. 2, p. 69, of this Collection. Shortly after the Revolution king William was very desirous of an accommodation between the Church and the Protestant Dissenters, and some steps were taken, but unsuccessfully, to effect that purpose. The following is bishop Kennett's Account:

"On April 4, 1689, the House of Lords entered into a consideration of the Report of the Amendments in the Bill 'For Uniting their majesty's Protestant Subjects.' And, upon debate, the question was put, "Whether to agree with the Committee in leaving out the clause, about the indifferency of the posture at receiving the Sacrament." The Votes were equal, and therefore according to the ancient rule in the like cases it was carried in the Negative. The next day the Lords resumed the debate of the Report of the said Amendments, particularly of the clause concerning a Commission to be given out by the king, to some bishops and others of the clergy; and it being proposed, Whether some of the laity should be added? The Votes were again equal on both sides, and so it was again carried in the Negative; but some peers entered their dissents for these reasons.

"First; Because the act itself being, as the preamble sets forth, designed for the Peace of the State; the putting the clergy into commission, with a total exclusion of the laity, lays this humiliation on the laity, as if the clergy of the Church of England were alone friends to the Peace of the State, and the laity less able, or less concerned to provide for it.

"2. Because the matter to be considered being barely of human constitution, viz. the Liturgy and Ceremonies of the Church of England, which had their establishment from King, Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons assembled in parliament, there can be no reason why the Commissioners, for altering any thing in that civil-constitution, should consist only of men of one sort of them, unless it be supposed that human reason is to be quitted in this affair, and the inspiration of spiritual men to be alone depended on.

"3. Because though upon Romish principles the clergy may have the title to meddle alone in matters of religion, yet with us they cannot, where the Church is acknowledged and defined to consist of clergy and laity; and so those matters of religion which fall under human determination, being properly the business of the Church, belong equally to both; for in what is of divine institution, neither clergy nor laity can make any alteration at all.

"4. Because the pretending, That differences and delays may arise, by mixing lay-men with ecclesiastics, to the frustrating the design of the Commission, is vain and out-of-doors; unless those that make use of this pretence, suppose that the clergy-part of the Church have distinct interests or designs from the lay-part of the same Church; and will be a reason, if good, why one or other of them should quit this house, for fear of obstructing the business of it.

5. "Because the Commission being intended for the satisfaction of Dissenters, it would be convenient, that lay-men of different ranks, nay, perhaps of different opinions too, should be mixed in it, the better to find expedients for that end; rather than clergy-men alone of our Church, who are generally observed to have all very much the same way of reasoning and thinking.

6. "Because it is the most ready way to facilitate the passing the alterations into a law, That lay-lords and commoners should be joined in the Commission, who may be able to satisfy both Houses of the reasons upon which they were made, and thereby remove all fears and jealousies ill men may raise up against the clergy, of their endeavouring to keep up, without grounds, a distinct interest from that of the laity, whom they so carefully exclude from being joined with them, in consultations of common concernment, that they will not have those have any part in the deliberation, who must have the greatest in determining.

7. "Because such a restrained Commission lies liable to this great objection, That it might be made use of to elude repeated promises, and the present general expectation of compliance with tender-consciences, when the providing for it, is taken out of the ordinary course of parliament, to be put into the hands of those alone, who were latest in admitting any need of it, and who may be thought to be the more unfit to be the sole composers of our differences, when they are looked upon, by some, as parties.

Lastly, "Because, after all, this carries a dangerous supposition along with it, as if the laity were not a part of the Church, nor had any power to meddle in matters of religion; a supposition directly opposite to the constitution both of Church and State: which will make all alterations utterly impossible, unless the clergy alone be allowed to have power to make laws in matters of religion; since what is established by law, cannot be taken away, but by consent of lay-men in parliament; the clergy themselves having no authority to meddle in this very case, in which the laity are excluded by this Vote, but what they derive from lay-hands. "MORDANT,
"LOVELACE."

"I dissent, for this and other reasons; because it is contrary to three statutes, made in the reign of king Henry 8, and one in king Edward 6, which impower 32 Commissioners, to alter the canon and ecclesiastical-law, &c. whereof sixteen to be of the laity, and sixteen of the clergy. STAMFORD."

On May 24th, the Act of Toleration, or Liberty of Conscience, received the royal assent, intitled, 'An Act for exempting their majesty's Protestant-Subjects, dissenting from the Church of England, from the penalties of certain laws.' The reason of it was thus given, in the preamble: Forasmuch as some ease to scrupulous consciences, in the exercise of religion, may be an effectual means to unite their majesty's protestant-subjects in interest and affection; it was therefore enacted, "That none of the penal-laws shall be construed to extend to any person or persons dissenting from the Church of England, that shall take the oaths to the present government, and subscribe the declaration mentioned in Stat. 30 Car. 2. cap. 1. Provided, That no assembly of persons so dissenting, should be had in any place for religious worship with the doors locked, barred or bolted, during the time of such meeting together; and provided, That nothing should be construed to exempt any of the persons aforesaid from paying of tythes, or other parochial duties: If any Dissenter should be chosen or appointed to bear the office of constable, church-warden, overseer, &c. and should scruple the oaths required by law to be taken, in respect of such office, he shall or may execute such office or employment by a sufficient deputy: That all preachers or teachers of any congregation of Dissenting Protestants, who shall take the oaths, and subscribe the declaration aforesaid, and also subscribe the articles of religion, mentioned in Stat. 13 Eliz. cap. 12. except the 34th, 35th, and 36th, and these words in the 20th Article, viz. [The Church hath power to decree rites or ceremonies, and authority in controversies of faith; and yet] shall not be liable to any of the pains and penalties mentioned in Stat. 17 Car. 2, 2. 22 Car. 2, 13, & 14 Car. 2. cap. 4. Every such teacher shall be exempted from serving upon any jury, or from being chosen and appointed to bear the office of church-warden, overseer of the poor, &c. but any justice of peace may require any person that goes to any meeting, for exercise of religion, to subscribe the declaration, and to take the oaths; and in case of refusal, is required to commit such person to prison, without bail or mainprise, &c." The like liberty was given to Anabaptists: and the Quakers were admitted to it, on condition of making this declaration of fidelity: 'I A. B. do sincerely promise, and solemnly declare, before God and the world, That I will be true and faithful to king William and queen Mary; and I do solemnly profess and declare, that I do, from my heart, abhor, detest and renounce, as impious and heretical, that damnable doctrine and position,' [That Princes excommunicated or deprived by the pope, or any authority of the See of Rome, may be deposed or murdered by their subjects, or any other whatsoever.] 'And I do declare, That no foreign prince, person, prelate, state or potentate, hath, or ought to have, any power, jurisdiction, superiority, pre-eminence or authority, ecclesiastical or spiritual, within this realm.' And subscribing a profession of their Christian Belief, in these words: 'I A. B. profess faith in God the Father, and in Jesus Christ his Eternal Son the true God, and in the Holy Spirit, one God blessed for evermore; and do acknowledge the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testament, to be given by divine inspiration.' "Provided, That all the laws made for the frequenting Divine Service on the Lord's Day, shall be still in force and executed against all persons that offend against the said laws, except such persons come to some congregation permitted by this act. Provided, That if any person shall maliciously or contemptuously come into any cathedral or parish-church, or other congregation, and disquiet or disturb the same, or misuse any preacher; or teacher, he shall, upon conviction, suffer the penalty of twenty pounds. And finally, Provided, That no congregation or assembly for religious worship, shall be permitted or allowed by this act, until the place of such meeting shall be certified to the bishop of the diocese, or to the arch-deacon of that arch-deaconry, or to the justices of the peace at the general or quarter-sessions, and registered in the said bishop's or arch-deacon's Court, or recorded at the said general or quarter-sessions."

Though the body of Dissenters were contented with this liberty, yet the more moderate and wiser part of them would be glad to be taken into the national establishment; and there was indeed a bill of Union still depending in parliament, which passed the House of Lords, and when it came down to the House of Commons, they desired his majesty to summon a Convocation, and lay the matter before them. Accordingly a Convocation was summoned by the king's writ, to meet on Dec. 4. In the mean time his majesty thought fit to fill up the vacant sees: And therefore on Oct. 13, Dr. Edward Stillingfleet, late dean of St. Paul's, bishop elect of Worcester; Dr. Simon Patrick, late dean of Peterborough, bishop elect of Chichester; and Dr. Gilbert Ironside, late warden of Wadham-college in Oxford, bishop elect of Bristol, were consecrated in the chapel of Fulham-Palace by the bishops of London, St. Asaph and Rochester, by virtue of a Commission granted to them in that behalf. And because the time allowed by act of parliament for the clergy to take the oaths was expired, those who refused to qualify themselves were suspended ab officio; particularly the archbishop of Canterbury, and the bishops of Gloucester, Ely, Norwich, Bath and Wells, and Peterborough.

In order to prepare matters to be considered by the Convocation, his majesty issued out this legal and reasonable Commission, to the most eminent bishops and divines.

"Whereas the particular Forms of divine worship, and the Rites and Ceremonies appointed to be used therein, are things in their own nature indifferent and alterable, and so acknowledged; It is but reasonable, that upon weighty and important considerations, according to the various exigencies of times and occasions, such changes and alterations should be made therein, as to those that are in place and authority, should from time to time seem either necessary or expedient.

"And whereas the book of Canons is fit to be reviewed, and made more suitable to the state of the church; And whereas there are defects and abuses in the ecclesiastical courts and jurisdiction; and particularly, there is not sufficient provision made for the removing of scandalous ministers; and for the reforming of manners either in ministers or people: And whereas it is most fit, that there should be a strict method prescribed for the examination of such persons as desire to be admitted into holy orders, both as to their learning and manners.

"We therefore, out of our pious and princely care, for the good order, and edification, and unity of the church of England, committed to our charge and care; and for the reconciling, as much as is possible, of all differences among our good subjects, and to take away all occasions of the like for the future, have thought fit to authorise and empower you, &c. and any nine of you, whereof three to be bishops, to meet from time to time as often as shall be needful, and to prepare such alterations of the Liturgy and Canons, and such proposals for the reformation of ecclesiastical courts, and to consider of such other matters, as in your judgments may most conduce to the ends above-mentioned."

These Commissioners often met, and drew up several alterations to make conformity the more easy and acceptable to all manner of conscientious persons; but some that were named in the Commission, did either not appear, or did soon desert their other brethren upon a high notion, That either no alterations ought to be made or at least that this was not a seasonable time for the making of them; of which number were Dr. Jane, Regius Professor of Divinity in Oxford, and some others. But the better and much greater majority applied themselves to the business of accommodation, with great industry and prudence: That point which created the greatest difficulty, was about the admitting of dissenting-ministers to officiate in the church, when duly reconciled to it. Some of the Commissioners were inclined not to insist on the re-ordination of them, alledging, That they ought not to shew less regard to the vocation of Presbyterian ministers, than to that of Roman Catholic priests, whose ordination was never questioned upon their joining in communion with the church of England. But the majority thought it more proper to keep a middle course, which was, first with respect to Romish priests, to leave it undecided whether their ordination was good or no: But because they were not obliged to give credit to their certificates, That therefore such of them as for the future should turn Protestants, should live in lay-communion only, unless they were re-ordained to a legal title of any church or cure: And secondly, That though they did not determine the ordination of Presbyterians to be altogether invalid; yet they thought it necessary for their ministers to receive orders from a bishop, who, in conferring the same might add a clause to the common-form, as the church had already ordained in the case of uncertain baptism, to this effect, If thou art not already ordained, I ordain thee, &c. and this was the greatest concession that was made by the Commissioners. One of the chief Dissenters has given this opinion of their proceedings: "These Commissioners often met and debated matters, but were deserted by Dr. Jane* and several others. They drew up sundry alterations, a copy of which I have by me; but they having never thought fit to communicate them to the body of the convocation, or to expose them to the view of the world from the press, I know not how proper it would be for me to print them. But this much I shall venture to say that such amendments as those were, with such an allowance in the point of orders for ordination by presbyters, as is made 13 Eliz. cap. 12. would in all probability have brought in two thirds of the Dissenters in England, which being done, and at the same time a liberty continued to such as could not be comprehended, would have been greater service than can easily be imagined."

One of the commissioners has more lately given this better account of it; "In the reign of king James, those of the church who saw the papists drawing in the Dissenters to concur with them in their designs against the church, applied to the then prince of Orange, desiring him to make use of his interest in them for diverting them from that: And in those letters which are yet extant, assurances were given, That the church was then in such a temper, so well convinced of former errors, that if ever she got out of that distress, all those differences would be certainly made up: And to make this assurance more public, the archbishop and bishops, in that Petition, for which they were imprisoned and tried, declared, That they were ready to come to a temper in those matters, both in parliament and convocation. Upon this it was, that the prince of Orange promised in his declaration, to use his endeavours, to heal all those divisions: In order to the performing this, he, by a special commission appointed all those bishops who owned his authority, he being then set on the throne, together with a great many of the clergy, to draw out the grounds upon which the Dissenters had separated from us, and to offer expedients in order to the healing our breaches. We had before us all the books and papers that they had at any time offered, setting forth their demands; together with many advices and propositions which had been made at several times, by most of the best and most learned of our divines; of which the late most learned bishop of Worcester had a great collection: So we prepared a scheme to be laid before the convocation; but did not think that we ourselves, much less that any other person, was any way limited, or bound to comply with what we resolved to propose. On the contrary, we said, if we saw better reason, we should change our minds: yet this, which was only a council, created by the king to prepare matters, was complained of as an imposing on the convocation, and as a limiting of it; and though a royal license was sent them, yet a previous resolution was taken, to admit of no alterations. When we saw that, we resolved to be quiet, and leave that matter to better times: But then the enemies of the civil government began to work on the jealousies and fears of many well minded men; and the preserving the church, was given out as the word, by those who meant France or St. Germans by it; and under this fatal delusion, many are apt to be misled to this day."

The convocation met on Thursday, Nov. 21, and began in an unhappy difference about the choice of a Prolocutor. The person designed by the bishop of London and most of his brethren and the sober part of the clergy, was Dr. Tillotson, dean of Canterbury, whom the king had lately made clerk of his closet, and used to call him the honestest man and the best friend that ever he had in his life; but it was carried by a majority of votes for Dr. Jane of Oxford, who being presented on the 25th to the bishop of London as president, for his approbation, made a customary speech in Latin, wherein he extolled the excellency of the church of England as established by law, above all christian com-

* Dr. Jane was very averse to any concession on the part of the Church. There is a story, that when a friend expressed to him a hope that he had not given up much, the Doctor replied, "I have not given up Bel and the Dragon," See also as to Bel and the Dragon, 1 Burnet's Own Time, 184. This Dr. Jane had been the penner of the famous Oxford Decree; as to which and his conduct respecting it upon the Revolution, which gave occasion to this Epigram:

Cum fronti sit nulla fides ut carmina dicunt,
Cur tibi bifronti, Jane, sit ulla fides, see 3 Kennett's Compl. Hist. (1st ed.) 419, et seq.

munities, and implied that it wanted no amendments; and then ended with the application of this sentence by way of triumph: 'Nolumus legis Angliæ mutari.' The bishop of London, to whom the Prolocutor had been chaplain, made a speech in the same language with more charity and candour: He told the clergy, they ought to endeavour a temper in those things that are not essential in religion, thereby to open the door of salvation to a multitude of straying christians: That it must needs be their duty, to shew the same indulgence and charity to the Dissenters under king William which some of the bishops and clergy had promised to them in their addresses to king James, and concluded with a pathetic exhortation to unanimity and concord.

At the next meeting, the bishop of London, being sensible that the majority of the Lower House were resolved to oppose the intended Union with the Dissenters, acquainted the Convocation, "That having communicated the Royal Commission by which they were empowered to act, to an eminent civilian, he had found it defective in not having the Great Seal, and therefore he should prorogue them till that was procured." During this interval many arguments were used to bring the most stiff of the inferior clergy to a charitable condescension, and the much desired Union, but to very little purpose; there was a jealousy and a distrust not to be conquered: though there could be but two arguments of any force to justify their averseness to enter upon the terms of accommodation; one was, That it seemed to derogate from the dignity of the Church of England, to make any step toward the altering of her constitution, till it did appear that the Dissenters themselves did desire a reconciliation, and were ready to offer some Proposals or to accept of others. A second argument might be, That the archbishop of Canterbury and some of his suffragans, and some other divines, would not own the present government, and were therefore ready to fall into a new separation from their brethren; so that at this juncture it might be dangerous to make any change that might give a pretence of being for the Old Church, as well as for the Old King.

On December 4th, while both Houses were together in Henry 7th's chapel, the earl of Nottingham brought in the king's Commission, and a Message from his majesty in writing, both which were read, there being present twelve bishops and a good number of the inferior clergy.

The Commission was as follows:

"William and Mary, by the grace of God, king and queen of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, &c. To all to whom these presents shall come, greeting: Whereas, in and by one act of parliament, made at Westminster in the 25th year of Henry the 8th, reciting, That whereas the king's humble and obedient subjects, the clergy of this realm of England, had not only acknowledged according to the truth, that the Convocation of the same clergy, were always, had been, and ought to be assembled only by the king's writ; but also submitting themselves to the king's majesty, had promised in verbo sacerdotis, That they would never from thenceforth presume to attempt, alledge, claim or put in ure, or enact, promulge or execute any new canons, constitutions, ordinances, provincial, or others, or by whatsoever other name they should be called in the Convocation, unless the said king's most royal assent and license might to them be had, to make, promulge and execute the same; and that the said king did give his royal assent and authority in that behalf.

"It was therefore enacted by the authority of the said parliament, according to the said submission and petition of the said clergy, among other things, that they, nor any of them from thenceforth should enact, promulge or execute any such canons, constitutions, or ordinances provincial, by whatsoever name they might be called in their convocations in time coming, which always should be assembled by authority of the king's writ, unless the same clergy might have the king's royal assent and license, to make, promulge and execute such canons, constitutions and ordinances, provincial or synodal, upon pain of every one of the said clergy doing contrary to the said act, and being thereof convict, to suffer imprisonment, and make fines at the king's will.

"And further, by the said act it is provided, That no canons, constitutions or ordinances should be made, or put in execution within this realm, by authority of the convocations of the clergy, which should be contrariant or repugnant to the king's prerogative-royal, or the customs, laws or statutes of this realm, any thing contained in the said act to the contrary thereof notwithstanding.

"And lastly, it is also provided by the said act, that such canons, constitutions, ordinances, and synodals provincial, which then were already made, and which then were not contrariant or repugnant to the laws, statutes and customs of this realm, nor to the damage or hurt of the king's prerogative-royal, should then still be used and executed as they were before the making of the said act, until such time as they should be viewed or searched, or otherwise ordered and determined by the persons mentioned in the said act, to the most part of them, according to the tenor, form and effect of the said act; as by the said act, among divers other things, more fully and at large, it doth and may appear.

"And whereas the particular Forms of divine worship, and Rites and Ceremonies appointed to be used therein, being things of their own nature indifferent and alterable, and so acknowledged, it is but reasonable, that upon weighty and important considerations, according to the various exigency of times and occasions, such changes and alterations should be made therein, as to those that are in place and authority, should from time to time, seem either necessary or expedient.

“ And whereas the Book of Canons is fit to be reviewed, and made more suitable to the state of the Church : and whereas there are divers defects and abuses in the ecclesiastical courts and jurisdictions ; and particularly there is not sufficient provision made for the removing of scandalous ministers, and for the reformation of manners, either in ministers or people : and whereas it is most fit that there should be a strict method prescribed, for the examination of such persons as desire to be admitted into Holy Orders, both as to their learning and manners : Know ye, that we, for divers urgent and weighty causes and considerations, us thereunto moving, of our especial grace, certain knowledge, and mere motion, have by virtue of our prerogative-royal, and supreme authority in causes ecclesiastical, given and granted, and by these presents do give and grant, full, free and lawful liberty, licence, power and authority unto the right reverend father in God, Henry, lord-bishop of London, president of this present convocation for the province of Canterbury, (upon the suspension of the lord archbishop of Canterbury,) during this present parliament now assembled ; and in his absence, to such other bishop as shall be appointed president thereof, and to the rest of the bishops of the same province, and all deans of cathedral-churches, arch-deacons, chapters and colleges, and the whole clergy of every several diocese, within the said province : that they the said lord-bishop of London, or other president of the said convocation, and the rest of the clergy of this present convocation within the said province of Canterbury, or the greatest number of them, whereof the president of the said convocation to be always one, shall and may from time to time, during this present parliament, confer, treat, debate, consider, consult, and agree of and upon such points, matters, causes and things as we from time to time shall propose or cause to be proposed by the said lord bishop of London, or other president of the said convocation concerning Alterations and Amendments of the Liturgy and Canons, and orders, ordinances and constitutions for the reformation of ecclesiastical courts, for the removing of scandalous ministers, for the reformation of manners either in ministers or people, and for the examination of such persons as desire to be admitted into Holy Orders : and all such other points, causes and matters as we shall think necessary and expedient, for advancing the honour and service of Almighty God, the good and quiet of the church, and the better government thereof.

“ And we do also, by these presents, give and grant unto the said lord-bishop of London, or other president of the said convocation, and to the rest of the bishops of the said province of Canterbury, and unto all deans of cathedral-churches, arch-deacons, chapters and colleges, and the whole clergy of every several diocese within the said province, full, free and lawful liberty, license, power and authority, That they

the said lord-bishop of London, or other president of the said convocation, and the rest of the said bishops, and other the clergy of the same province, or the greatest number of them that shall be present in person, or by their proxies, shall and may, from time to time, draw into forms, rules, orders, ordinances, constitutions and canons, such matters as to them shall be thought necessary and expedient for the purposes above-mentioned ; and the same set down in writing, from time to time, to exhibit and deliver, or cause to be exhibited and delivered unto us ; to the end that we, as occasion shall require, may thereupon have the advice of our parliament : and that such, and so many of the said canons, orders, ordinances, constitutions, matters, causes and things, as shall be thought requisite and convenient by our said parliament, may be presented to us in due form, for our royal assent, if, upon mature consideration thereof, we shall think fit to enact the same. In witness whereof, we have caused these our letters to be made patent. Witness ourselves at Westminster the 30th day of November, in the first year of our reign.

Per Breve de Privato Sigillo. “ BURKE.”

His Majesty's Message to the Convocation, is as follows :

WILLIAM R.

“ His majesty has summoned this convocation, not only because it is usual, upon holding of a parliament, but out of a pious zeal, to do every thing that may tend to the best establishment of the church of England, which is so eminent a part of the Reformation, and is certainly the best suited to the constitution of this government, and therefore does most signally deserve, and shall always have both his favour and protection ; and he doubts not, but that you will assist him in promoting the welfare of it, so that no prejudices, with which some men have laboured to possess you, shall disappoint his good intentions, or deprive the church of any benefit from your consultations. His majesty therefore expects, that the things that shall be proposed, shall be calmly and impartially considered by you ; and assures you, that he will offer nothing to you, but what shall be for the honour, peace, and advantage, both of the Protestant religion in general, and particularly of the Church of England.”

The Bishops agreed on this Address to his majesty :

“ We your majesty's most dutiful subjects, the bishops and clergy of the province of Canterbury, in convocation assembled, having received your majesty's gracious Message, together with a Commission from your majesty, by the earl of Nottingham, hold ourselves bound in gratitude and duty, to return our most humble thanks and acknowledgements, of the grace and goodness expressed in your majesty's Message, and the zeal you shew in it for the Protestant religion in general, and the church of England in particular, and of the trust and confidence repose'd in us, by this commission. We look upon these marks of your majesty's care and favour, as the continuance of the great deliverance Almighty God wrought for us, by your means, in making you the blessed instrument of preserving us from falling under the cruelty of Popish tyranny. From which, as we have so often thanked Almighty God, so we cannot forget that high obligation and duty which we owe to your majesty; and on these new assurances of your protection and favour to our church, we beg leave to renew the assurance of our constant fidelity and obedience to your majesty; whom we pray God to continue long and happily to reign over us."

The Lower House, whose professed business was to do nothing, would not consent to this Address, but first pleaded for the privilege of presenting a separate Address of their own drawing up; and then, dropping that pretension, they fell to making Amendments, and gave a reason why they could not concur with the bishops, in their form, in these words: "We are desirous to confine our Address to his majesty's most gracious Message, and to those things only therein which concern the church of England." Hereupon a conference was desired, that was chiefly managed between the bishop of Salisbury and the Prolocutor; and these reasons were reported, why their lordships insisted on the express mention of the Protestant religion: 1. "Because it is the known denomination of the common doctrine of the western part of Christendom, in opposition to the errors and corruptions of the church of Rome. 2. Because the leaving out this, may have ill consequences, and be liable to strange constructions, both at home and abroad, among Protestants as well as Papists. 3. Because it agrees with the general reason, offered by the clergy, for their amendments, since this is expressly mentioned in the king's Message; and in this the church of England being so much concerned, the bishops think it ought to stand still in the address." The Lower House debated these reasons, and disagreed to them; and then resolved, "That instead of Protestant Religion, they would rather say, Protestant Churches." Their lordships desired a reason of this alteration; which was returned to them in these words: "We being the representative of a formed Established Church, do not think fit to mention the word Religion, any farther than it is the religion of some formed Established Church." The Lords returned the amendments, with this Alteration: "We doubt not the interest of the Protestant religion, in this and all other Protestant Churches.

The Lower House seeming to fear it was a diminution to the church of England, to join it with foreign Protestant Churches, would have the words [this and] to be omitted; and at last, with great difficulty, this Address was agreed on, and presented to his majesty in the Banqueting-house at Whitehall, on Thursday, Dec. 18th;

"We your majesty's most loyal and most dutiful subjects, the bishops and clergy of the province of Canterbury, in convocation assembled, having received a most gracious Message from your majesty, by the earl of Nottingham, hold ourselves bound in duty and gratitude, to return our most humble acknowledgments for the same, and the pious zeal and care your majesty is pleased to express therein, for the honour, peace, advantage and establishment of the church of England; whereby, we doubt not, the interest of the Protestant Religion in all other Protestant Churches, which is dear to us, will be the better secured, under the influence of your majesty's government and protection. And we crave leave to assure your majesty, That in pursuance of that trust and confidence you repose in us, we will consider, whatsoever shall be offered to us from your majesty, without prejudice, and with all calmness and impartiality: And that we will constantly pay the fidelity and allegiance which we have all sworn to your majesty and the queen; whom we pray God to continue long and happily to reign over us."

His majesty well understood why this Address omitted the thanks which the bishops had recommended his royal commission, and the zeal he had shewn for the Protestant Religion; and why there was no expression of tenderness to the Dissenters, and but a cool regard to other Protestant Churches. However, his majesty returned this gracious Answer: "My Lords, I take this Address very kindly from the Convocation. You may depend upon it, that all I have promised, and all I can do, for the service of the Church of England, I will do: And I give you this new assurance, that I will improve all occasions and opportunities for its service."

The majority of the Lower House had a reserved kindness for the Non-juring bishops and clergy; and therefore, one of the members made a zealous speech, in behalf of the bishops under suspension, "That something might be done, to qualify them to sit in convocation; yet so, as that the convocation might not incur any danger thereby." But this matter was too hard for them, and therefore it was left to farther consideration; while they laboured to find out some other business to divert them from that for which they were called together: And therefore, on Dec. 11th the Prolocutor attended the President and Bishops, and, in the name of the House, represented to their lordships, "That there were several books of very dangerous consequence to the Christian Religion, and the Church of England; particularly, Notes upon Athanasius's Creed, and two Letters relating to the present Convocation, lately come abroad; and desired their lordships advice, in what way, and how far safely, without incurring the penalty of stat. 25 Hen. 8. the convocation may proceed, in the preventing the publishing the like scandalous books for the future, and inflicting the censure of the church, according to the canons provided in that behalf, upon the authors of them." Upon which the Prolocutor soon after acquainted the House, "That the President had declared his sense of the ill consequence of those books that were sent up from this House to their lordships; and that, upon enquiry, he could not receive any satisfaction, how far the convocation might proceed in that affair, but he would as far as lay in him, take farther order about it." When the President and his brethren saw the disposition of the Lower House, they found it was to no purpose to communicate any proposals to them; and therefore the Convocation was prorogued to Jan. 24th, and soon after, with the parliament, prorogued and dissolved. "It must be confessed, (says a late writer) That the Presbyterians did not a little contribute to exasperate the convocation against them, having, at this very time, given orders to near fifty young students; and Mr. Baxter (the head of their party) having published a book, reflecting on the Church of England. It was also reported, That the Presbyterians of Scotland were the authors of a sham plot, which they fathered upon the Episcopal party of Glasgow, that they might have a pretence to disarm them, and oppress them.

The following is Burnet's Account of this transaction, and of some of the leading Churchmen of the time: "At the Restoration, Juxon, the ancientest and most eminent of the former bishops, who had assisted the late king in his last hours, was promoted to Canterbury, more out of decency, than that he was then capable to fill that post; for as he was never a great divine, so he was now superannuated. Though others have assured me, that after some discourses with the king he was so much struck with what he observed in him, that upon that he lost both heart and hope. The king treated him with outward respect, but had no regard to him. Sheldon and Morley were the men that had the greatest credit. Sheldon was esteemed a learned man before the wars: But he was now engaged so deep in politics, that scarce any prints of what he had been remained. He was a very dexterous man in business, had a great quickness of apprehension, and a very true judgment. He was a generous and charitable man. He had a great pleasantness of conversation, perhaps too great. He had an art, that was peculiar to him, of treating all that came to him in a most obliging manner: But few depended much on his professions of friendship. He seemed not to have a deep sense of religion, if any at all: And spoke of it most commonly as of an engine of government, and a matter of policy. By this means the king came to look on him as a wise and honest clergyman. Sheldon was at first made bishop of London, and was upon Juxon's death promoted to Canterbury. Morley had been first known to the world as a friend of the lord Falkland's: and that was enough to raise a man's character. He had continued for many years in the lord Clarendon's family, and was his particular friend. He was a Calvinist with relation to the Arminian points, and was thought a friend to the Puritans before the wars: But he took care after his promotion to free himself from all suspicions of that kind. He was a pious and charitable man, of a very exemplary life, but extreme passionate, and very obstinate. He was first made bishop of Worcester. Dr. Hammond, for whom that see was designed, died a little before the Restoration, which was an unspeakable loss to the church: For, as he was a man of great learning, and of most eminent merit, he having been the person that during the bad times had maintained the cause of the church in a very singular manner, so he was a very moderate man in his temper, though with a high principle; and probably he would have fallen into healing counsels. He was also much set on reforming abuses, and for raising in the clergy a due sense of the obligations they lay under. But by his death Morley was advanced to Worcester: And not long after he was removed to Winchester, void by Duppa's death, who had been the king's tutor, though no way fit for that post; but he was a meek and humble man, and much loved for the sweetness of his temper; and would have been more esteemed, if he had died before the Restoration; for he made not that use of the great wealth that flowed in upon him that was expected. Morley was thought always the honestest man of the two, as Sheldon was certainly the abler man.

"The first point in debate was, whether concessions should be made, and pains taken to gain the Dissenters, or not; especially the Presbyterians. The earl of Clarendon was much for it; and got the king to publish a Declaration soon after his Restoration, concerning ecclesiastical affairs; to which if he had stood, very probably the greatest part of them might have been gained. But the bishops did not approve of this: And after the service they did that lord in the duke of York's marriage, he would not put any hardship on those who had so signally obliged him. This disgusted the lord Southampton, who was for carrying on the design that had been much talked of during the wars, of moderating matters both with relation to the government of the church, and the worship and ceremonies: Which created some coldness between him and the earl of Clarendon when the Lord Chancellor went off from those designs. The consideration that those bishops and their party had in the matter was this: The Presbyterians were possessed of most of the great benefices in the church, chiefly in the City of London, and in the two universities. It is true, all that had come into the room of those who were turned out by the parliament, or the visitors sent by them, were removed by the course of law, as men that were illegally possessed of other men's rights: And that even where the former incumbents were dead, because a title originally wrong was still wrong in law. But there were a great many of them in very eminent posts, who were legally possessed of them. Many of these, chiefly in the City of London, had gone into the design of the Restoration in so signal a manner, and with such success, that they had great merit, and a just title to very high preferment. Now, as there remained a great deal of the old animosity against them for what they had done during the wars, so it was said, it was better to have a schism out of the church than within it; and that the half conformity of the Puritans before the war had set up a faction in every city and town between the lecturers and the incumbents, that the former took all methods to render themselves popular, and to raise the benevolence of their people, which was their chief subsistence, by disparaging the government both in church and state. They had also many stories among them, of the credit they had in the elections of parliament men, which they infused in the king, to possess him with the necessity of having none to serve in the church, but persons that should be firmly tied to his interest, both by principle, and by subscriptions and oaths. It is true, the joy then spread through the nation had got at this time a new parliament to be elected of men so high and so hot, that, unless the Court had restrained them, they would have carried things much farther than they did, against all that had been concerned in the late wars: But they were not to expect such success at all times: Therefore they thought it was necessary to make sure work at this time: And, instead of using methods to bring in the sectaries, they resolved rather to seek the most effectual ones for casting them out, and bringing a new set of men into the church. This took with the king, at least it seemed to do so. But, though he put on an outward appearance of moderation, yet he was in another and deeper laid design, to which the heat of these men proved subservient, for bringing in of popery. A popish queen was a great step to keep it in countenance at Court, and to have a great many priests going about the Court making converts. It was thought, a toleration was the only method for setting it a going all the nation over. And nothing could make a toleration for popery pass, but the having great bodies of men put out of the church, and put under severe laws, which should force them to move for a toleration, and should make it reasonable to grant it to them. And it was resolved, that whatever should be granted of that sort should go in so large a manner, that Papists should be comprehended within it. So the Papists had this generally spread among them, that they should oppose all propositions for comprehension, and should animate the church party to maintain their ground against all the sectaries. And in that point they seemed zealous for the church. But at the same time they spoke of toleration, as necessary both for the peace and quiet of the nation, and for the encouragement of trade. And with this the duke was so possessed, that he declared himself a most violent enemy to comprehension, and as zealous for toleration. The king being thus resolved on fixing the terms of conformity to what they had been before the war, without making the least abatement or alteration, they carried on still an appearance of moderation, till the strength of the parties should appear in the new parliament.

"So, after the declaration was set out, a commission was granted to twelve of a side, with nine assistants to each side, who were appointed to meet at the Savoy, and to consider on the ways of uniting both sides. At their first meeting, Sheldon told them, that those of the church had not desired this meeting, as being satisfied with the legal establishment; and therefore they had nothing to offer; but it belonged to the other side, who moved for alterations, to offer both their exceptions to the laws in being, and the alterations that they proposed. He told them, they were to lay all they had to offer before them at once; for they would not engage to treat about any one particular, till they saw how far their demands went: And he said, that all was to be transacted in writing, though the others insisted on an amicable conference; which was at first denied: Yet some hopes were given of allowing it at last. Papers were upon this given in. The Presbyterians moved, that bishop Usher's reduction should be laid down as a ground-work to treat on; that bishops should not govern their diocese by their single authority, nor depute it to lay officers in their courts, but should in matters of ordination and jurisdiction take along with them the counsel and concurrence of the Presbyters. They did offer several exceptions to the liturgy, against the many responses by the people; and they desired, all might be made one continued prayer. They desired that no lessons should be taken out of the Apocryphal books; that the Psalms used in the daily service should be according to the new translation. They expected to many parts of the office of Baptism, that import the inward regeneration of all that were baptized. But as they proposed these amendments, so they did also offer a liturgy new drawn by Mr. Baxter. They insisted mainly against kneeling at the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, chiefly against the imposing it; and moved that the posture might be left free, and that the use of the surplice, of the cross in baptism, of God-fathers being the sponsors in baptism, and of the holy days, might be abolished. Sheldon saw well what the effect would be of putting them to make all their demands at once. The number of them raised a mighty outcry against them, as people that could never be satisfied. But nothing gave so great an advantage against them, as their offering a new liturgy. In this they were divided among themselves. Some were for insisting only on a few important things, reckoning that, if they were gained, and an union followed upon that, it would be easier to gain other things afterwards. But all this was overthrown by Mr. Baxter, who was a man of great piety; and, if he had not meddled in too many things, would have been esteemed one of the learned men of the age: He writ near two hundred books: Of these, three are large folios: He had a very moving and pathetic way of writing, and was his whole life long a man of great zeal and much simplicity; but was most unhappily subtle and metaphysical in every thing. There was a great submission paid to him by the whole party. So he persuaded them, that from the words of the commission they were bound to offer every thing that they thought might conduce to the good or peace of the church, without considering what was like to be obtained, or what effect their demanding so much might have, in irritating the minds of those who were then the superior body in strength and number. All the whole matter was at last reduced to one single point, whether it was lawful to determine the certain use of things indifferent in the worship of God? The bishops held them to that point, and pressed them to shew that any of the things imposed were of themselves unlawful. The Presbyterians declined this; but affirmed, that other circumstances might make it become unlawful to settle a peremptory law about things indifferent; which they applied chiefly to kneeling in the Sacrament, and stood upon it that a law, which excluded all that did not kneel from the Sacrament, was unlawful, as a limitation in the point of communion put on the laws of Christ, which ought to be the only condition of those who had a right to it. Upon this point there was a free conference that lasted some days. The two men, that had the chief management of the debate, were the most unfit to heal matters, and the fittest to widen them, that could have been found out. Baxter was the opponent, and Gunning was the respondent; who was afterwards advanced, first to Chichester, and then to Ely: He was a man of great reading, and noted for a special subtilty of arguing: All the arts of sophistry were made use of by him on all occasions, in as confident a manner, as if they had been sound reasoning; He was a man of an innocent life, unweariedly active to very little purpose: He was much set on the reconciling us with popery in some points: And, because the charge of idolatry seemed a bar to all thoughts of reconciliation with them, he set himself with very great zeal to clear the church of Rome of Idolatry: This made many suspect him as inclining to go over to them: But he was far from it; and was a very honest, sincere man, but of no sound judgment, and of no prudence in affairs; He was for our conforming in all things to the rules of the primitive church, particularly in praying for the dead, in the use of oil, with many other rituals: He forned many in Cambridge upon his own notions, who have carried them perhaps farther than he intended. Baxter and he spent some days in much logical arguing, to the diversion of the town, who thought here were a couple of fencers engaged in disputes, that could never be brought to an end, nor have any good effect. In conclusion, this commission, limited to such a number of days, came to an end, before any one thing was agreed on. The bishops insisted on the laws that were still in force, to which they would admit of no exception, unless it was proved that the matter of those laws was sinful. They charged the presbyterians with having made a schism, upon a charge against the church for things, which now they themselves could not call sinful. They said, there was no reason to gratify such a sort of men in any thing; One demand granted would draw on many more; All authority both in church and state was struck at by the position they had insisted on, that it was not lawful to impose things indifferent, since they seemed to be the only proper matter in which human authority could interpose. So this furnished an occasion to expose them as enemies to all order. Things had been carried at the Savoy with great sharpness, and many reflections. Baxter said once, such things would offend many good men in the nation. Stearn, the archbishop of York, upon that took notice that he would not say kingdom, but nation, because he would not acknowledge a king. Of this great complaints were made, as an indecent return for the zeal they had shewn in the restoration.

“The Conference broke up without doing any good. It did rather hurt, and heightened the sharpness that was then on peoples minds to such a degree, that it needed no addition to raise it higher. The presbyterians laid their complaints before the king: But little regard was had to them. And now all the concern that seemed to employ the bishops thoughts was, not only to make no alteration on their account, but to make the terms of conformity much stricter than they had been before the war. So it was resolved to maintain conformity to the height, and to put lecturers in the same condition with the incumbents, as to oaths and subscriptions; and to oblige all persons to subscribe an unfeigned assent and consent to all and every particular contained and prescribed in the Book of Common Prayer. Many who, thought it lawful to conform in submission, yet scrupled at this, as importing a particular approbation of every thing; And great distinction was made between a conformity in practice, and so full and distinct an assent. Yet men got over that, as importing no more but a consent of obedience: For though the words of the subscription, which were also to be publicly pronounced before the congregation, declaring the person's unfeigned assent and consent, seemed to import this, yet the clause of the act that enjoined this carried a clear explanation of it; for it enacted this declaration as an assent and consent to the use of all things contained in the book. Another subscription was enacted, with relation to the League and Covenant; by which they were required to declare it unlawful upon any pretence whatsoever to take arms against the king, renouncing the traitorous position of taking arms by his authority against his person, or those commissioned by him, together with a declaration, that no obligation lay on them or any other person from the League or Covenant to endeavour any change or alteration of government in church and state, and that the Covenant was in itself an unlawful oath. This was contrived against all the old men, who had both taken the covenant themselves, and had pressed it upon others. So they were now to own themselves very guilty in that matter. And those, who thought it might be lawful upon great and illegal provocation to resist unjust invasions on the laws and liberties of the subjects, excepted to the subscription, though it was scarce safe for any at that time to have insisted on that point. Some thought, that since the king had taken the covenant, he at least was bound to stand to it."

He then proceeds to give some account of the Act of Uniformity, and of different transactions connected therewith.

209. The Trial of JOHN JAMES, a Fifth Monarchy Man,* at the King's-Bench, for High Treason: 13 CHARLES II. A. D. 1661. [Written by his Friends.]

SOME PASSAGES at the first taking and apprehending of JOHN JAMES, and the Company with him, met together in Bulstake-alley in Whitechapel, Oct. 19, 1661.

THE Congregation being assembled the day above-mentioned, (being the seventh day of the week) in Bulstake-alley (where was the place of their public meeting, the doors being open)

* Of the Insurrection of the Fifth Monarchy Men, under Venner, archdeacon Echard gives us the following account; "While the affairs of the nation seemed to be in peace and tranquillity, in the beginning of the new year 1660-1, there happened a strange and unparalleled action in London, which strengthened the belief of those secret Plots and Conspiracies mentioned by the lord chancellor. This was occasioned by a small body of Fifth-Monarchy Men, who hating all monarchy, and the appearance of it, had formerly made an attempt against Cromwell's government, but escaped beyond expectation. The head of them was one Thomas Venner, sometime a wine-cooper, who by the king's indulgence held a conventicle in Coleman-street, where he, and others, used to preach to them out of the Prophecies of Daniel and the Revelations, and from thence drew strange inferences, persuading their congregations 'to take up arms for King Jesus, against the powers of the earth, the king, the duke of York, general Monk, &c.' assuring them, 'That no weapons formed against them should prosper, nor a hair of their heads be touched; for one should chase a thousand, and two put ten thousand to flight.' Upon which they put a Declaration printed, entitled, 'A Door of Hope opened;' in which they said, and declared, 'That they would never sheath their swords till Babylon, as they called monarchy, became a hissing and a curse, and there be left neither Remnant, Son, nor Nephew: that when they had led captivity captive into England they would go into France, Spain, Germany, &c. and rather die than take the wicked Oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance: that they would not make any leagues with monarchists, but would rise up against the carnal, to possess continued together the former part of the day in the worship of God without disturbance; and being again come together in the afternoon, continued without interruption till three o'clock; about which time John James was speaking from 1 Cor. vi. 20, in these words,

For ye are bought with a price, therefore glorify God in your body, and in your spirit, which are Gods.' About which time one jus-the Gate, or the world, to bind their kings in chains, and their nobles in fetters of iron.' And so to accomplish this heroic design, they observed so much policy as to put it in execution when the king was attending his mother and sister to embark at Portsmouth, for their return into France. Accordingly on Sunday the 6th of Jan. being fully animated by the sermon, which hinted to them, 'That they had been praying and preaching, but not acting for God,' they sallied out well armed from their Meeting-House, and marched to St. Paul's Church-Yard in the dark of the evening. Here they mustered their party, amounting to above 50, and placed their centinels for the time, one of whom killed a poor innocent man, who upon demand had answered, 'He was for God and king Charles?' This gave an alarm to the city, and the lord-mayor, sir Rd. Brown, and the trained bands being upon the guard, some files of men were sent against them, whom these desperate men quickly routed, and so marched on to Bishopsgate, where they passed without opposition, and from thence to Cripplegate, where they came into the city again, and so to Aldersgate. Here threatening the constable, who was weakly attended, they were let out again. Then they declared themselves for King Jesus, and thus proceeded to Beech-Lane, where they killed a headborough that opposed them, and so hastened to Cane-Wood, between Highgate and Hampstead, where they reposed themselves for that night.—The noise of this strange Insurrection caused the General to send a party of horse and foot the next day, who drove them out of the wood, and took some of them prisoners, who were committed to the Gate-House. The rest having rallied again, on Wednesday morning returned to London, with assurance by Venner their leader, tice Chard, with Mr. Wood the headborough, came to the meeting-place, Mr. Wood commanding him in the king's name to be silent and come down, having spoke Treason against the king: but John James, taking little notice thereof, and going on upon his subject, the headborough came nearer to him in the middle of the meeting-place, and commanded him again in the king's name to come down, or else he would pull him down; whereupon the disturbance grew so great he could not proceed, but told the headborough he would not come down except he was pulled down; whereupon he pulled him down, and hauled him away. The cause of his being apprehended proceeding from one Tipler, a pipemaker, journeyman to a neighbour near adjoining, who from their yard hearing the said John James speak a little before, from Psal. viii. 2, in these words; 'Out of the mouths of babes and sucklings hast thou ordained strength because of thine ene'mies, that thou mightest still the enemy and 'the avenger.' (Which words were occasionally spoken to, by way of addition to what another brother had spoken before) whereat the said Tipler taking offence, went to justice Chard to acquaint him therewith; but being an idle fellow, the justice, as it is said, took not much notice of what he spake, till bringing a neighbour with him, he was provoked by him to regard his testimony.

Whereupon the Justice came forth and went with Mr. Wood the headborough to the meeting-place, and seized upon him as aforesaid, the said Justice standing at the door: Hereupon an uproar grew, some crying out in the streets, Treason! Treason! the Hamlets were hereupon summoned upon pain of death, many of whom appeared accordingly; and by this time four Justices of the Peace were come together, to wit, the Lieutenant of the Tower, Justice Bide, Justice Swallow, and Justice

That no weapon formed against them should prosper: therefore they might look upon the example of Gideon: it was the same thing to God, whether he saved by a few or a multitude.' Their first appearance was in Threadneedle-street, behind the Exchange, where they beat back a party sent by the guard there. But, upon the advance of more forces, they retreated to Bishopsgate-street; where after a sharp encounter, two of each side being slain, they gradually slipped away and disappeared. A while after, like the gathering of clouds, they were seen again at College-Hill and Maiden-Lane, where they designed to sacrifice the lord-mayor. But missing of him, they crossed Cheapside, and passed into Wood-street. Here began a cruel fight, wherein they shewed skill as well as great valour; and having ruffled some trained-bands, and repelled the horse-guards that came to assist them, they did not give way till Venner was knocked down and severely wounded, and Tuffney and Cragg, two of their fiercest preachers and combatants, were slain. Whereupon the greatest part of them retreated to Cripple-gate, firing in good order in their rear upon the trained-bands, who were in close pursuit of them. Col. Cox, who commanded, lodged ten of them in an ale-house near the postern, which house they obstinately maintained. The house being surrounded, some of the soldiers untiled the next house, and shot in upon them, being in the upper room, who still refused quarter: at the same time another party of musketeers got up the stairs, broke down the door, and entered their garrison. Six of them were killed before, another refusing quarter was first knocked down, and then shot with a musket. The rest being demanded why they did not ask quarter before, answered 'They durst not for fear their own fellows should have shot them.' In this Insurrection 20 of the king's men were slain, and as many of the rebels. Those taken were Venner himself, Hodgkins, Gowler, Allen, Pym, Ashton, Prichard, Fall, Hopkins, Wells, and about as many more, not much worth the naming; who blasphemously alledged, 'That if they were deceived or mis-led, it was God that deceived them.'—These, to the number of 20, were soon after arraigned at the Old Bailey for treason and murder; which being fully proved, with all the forementioned particulars, they were all found guilty, except Hopkins and Wells, against whom the evidence was not full, and against one Patshul only a single witness: wherefore they were acquitted by the jury. When sentence was pronounced against them, and the lord chief justice Foster seriously charged Venner with the blood of his unhappy accomplices, he impudently replied, 'It was not he, but Jesus that led them.' Three of them confessed their crime, and craved mercy, but the rest continued obstinate. Being sentenced to be hanged, drawn, and quartered, Venner and Hodgkins were on the 19th of Jan. executed over-against their Meeting-House in Coleman-street. The former spoke little but in vindication of himself and his fact, and something of his opinion, with an assurance 'That the time was at hand when other judgment would be;' highly reflecting upon the present government. Hodgkins raved and cursed in the manner of praying, 'calling down vengeance from Heaven upon the king, the judges, and the city of London;' nor would he desist, till the executioner put an end to all his extravagancies. Two days after nine more were executed in five several places of the city, without being quartered, as the two first were. All persisted, like the Regicides, in justifying their crimes, except one young man, who shewed great signs of repentance.—Thus ended a Rebellion of a very strange nature, which was begun and carried on with such infernal rage, that if their numbers had been equal to their spirits, they would have overturned the city and the nation, and the world, which in their imagination they had divided among themselves." P. 784.

Chard; John James in the mean time was committed to the custody of the headborough, who carried him to a tavern near thereunto, where several soldiers and other loose people came about him, scoffing and blaspheming, some taking wine and saying, 'I drink to you in the spirit;' and others being rude, and reproved by the officer, said, 'I would only speak to him a few words in the spirit:' in this time the rest of the meeting by sevens were brought before the justices (being at an house near the meeting-place) who tendering the Oath of Allegiance unto them, committed those that refused, some to Newgate, both men and women, being guarded thither by the Hamlets; afterwards the same justices entering the meeting-place sate down about the table with their clerk and (one major Manly standing by) did send for John James, and in the mean time the Lieutenant of the Tower read a Paper which he pulled out of his pocket, saying, he would read to them what doctrine was preached there that day, being of the nature of a charge, which they drew up from Tipler's mouth against John James, demanding of certain women (relating to the meeting, yet detained, and whose names they were then taking) how they could hear such things as those? To which they unanimously replied in the fear of the Lord, That they never heard such words, as they should answer it before the Lord, and they durst not lie: who replied, That they had but their words, but they had others oaths for it: who made answer in the prophet's words, Psal. cii. 8. 'They which were mad against them, had sworn against them.' By this time John James was brought into the meeting-place, and the Lieutenant (looking upon him) said to the women, What have you no better a holder-forth than he? John James said, That the way of the Lord was and is many times, to use the poorest of his people to do his work, alledging also the Apostle's words, 1 Cor. i. 27, that 'He chooseth the weak and foolish things of the world to confound the mighty:' Then said the Lieutenant of the Tower, What you are a Jew. John James said, that in one sense he was a Jew, and in another sense not, repeating those words of the Apostle in Rom. ii. last. 'For he is not a Jew that is one outwardly, neither is that circumcision which is outward in the flesh; but he is a Jew which is one inwardly, and circumcision is that of the heart in the spirit, whose praise is not of men, but of God.' The Lieutenant asked him, whether he had not been before him before this? who answered, he had: and whether he had not been civilly used? he replied, Yea, and for his civility he thanked him: Then the Lieutenant asked him, if he was not counselled for to take heed for the future? he answered, Yea, and he had taken it so far as he could with a good conscience: upon which the Lieutenant told him he should stretch for it, 'and if he were not hanged he would be hanged for him.' John James told him, he was not careful in that matter, and that they could do no more than they should be suffered by the Lord to do: The Lieutenant told him, he thought he was not careful, for he had a mind to be hanged as some of his holy brethren that went before him. John James desired he would not speak so lightly. The Lieutenant spake something also about the Fifth Kingdom, and asked him, whether it was not his principle? who told him he did own the Fifth Kingdom which must come: whereupon they laughed one upon another and said, 'Now they had it from his own mouth.' Something also was charged upon him about his learning to sound a trumpet, in order to a rising with Venner's Party; to which he said, there was a friend of his who lay in his house, minding to go to sea, being to learn to sound, desired he might have liberty to be taught in his house, but he never learned himself, neither was he one of those in that rising, judging it to be a rash act. Then the Lieutenant of the Tower called in capt. Hodgskin, who commanded the party of soldiers that stood at the door, and said, Take this man, be careful of him, and commit him close prisoner to Newgate. So they carried him away with his Mittimus hereafter expressed.

To the Keeper of the Gaol of Newgate, or his Deputy.

'Middles. These are in the king's majesty's name to require you to receive into your custody the body of John James, whom we send you herewith, being taken this present day at a conventicle, or private meeting, in the parish of White-Chapel, and there speaking in the audience of the people present, treasonable words against his majesty's royal person; you shall therefore keep him close prisoner until further order, and this shall be your warrant. Given under our hands this 19th day of October, 1661.

'JOHN ROBINSON, Lieut. of the Tower.'

'Thomas Bide, Edward Chard.

'Thomas Swallow.'

After that John James was sent away according to the Mittimus afore-mentioned, the witnesses were called in and further examined, and forthwith a Paper was presented to one of them, being as was supposed the substance of what Tipler had before sworn to, which being read with a low voice, the relator could not hear, but this he saw, that one of the witnesses refused to take his oath, saying, That there were many words in the paper which he did not hear: but the justices said, That this which was written, and that which was heard, was all to one purpose, therefore take it; but he refused it again: yet it being tendered once more, with much persuasions, entreaties, and threatnings to send him to prison if he refused it, he took it; after which the lieutenant said, he knew nothing to the contrary but that this business might be worth to them 100*l.* a piece: after this Osburn, who was a seaman, said, I cannot stay, but must go to sea for a livelihood, for I am poor; Then justice Chard said to the lieut. of the Tower, Let him be entered in the Tower, or upon some ship, to receive the king's pay till the business be over; bidding him come to the Tower accordingly the next morning. As they were going away, a woman and friend of the seaman's being present and heard what passed, said, that his oath was not to be taken? Then the lieutenant asked what she was, saying that she would fain seduce the witnesses, and that she deserved to be sent to Newgate; to which she replied saying, You may do what you please, but I speak the truth, and know that his word is not to be taken; after this they said to the seaman as they were going away, Be not seduced by her; and further said, that if he did not stand to his oath, he should be committed, with other threatening words, and so they departed. And it is further asserted by several persons that were then upon the place when Osburn was sworn, who immediately demanded of him what it was he had sworn unto, desiring him to tell them the words, who seemed at that time to be very sad, telling them that he could not remember the words except he heard them named over again; upon which also some of the guard themselves hearing him speak thus, said to him, that they would not be in his condition for all the world. Some time after this, several spake unto the said Bernard Osburn, questioning him about the oath he had taken; he declared that he had sworn to he knew not what, being forced there-to through fear and hopes of release; That the said Bernard Osburn intending not to stand to his oath, went to his ship towards the Hope in order to the sea-voyage he was engaged in, but not long after came a warrant from the lieut. of the Tower, to require his appearance in the court as one of the witnesses, which was directed to his brother's house in Wapping where he used to lodge, but his sister acquainted them that he was gone to sea sometime before; and they demanding where? she said, I suppose he may be in the Downs by this time; at which the messenger was much offended, threatening him greatly, which occasioned her speedy coming to the lieut. of the Tower, who in great wrath demanded, how long he had been gone, and what ship he was upon? which she signified unto him, and accordingly he forthwith sent his marshal to demand him from his ship, which was performed accordingly; and when he was come, they threatened to have him hanged, if he did not stand to his evidence, but if he did he should have all his charges borne, and a reward for his pains; and from this time he was kept in the marshal's hands at the king's charge, till the trial was over; After this the said Osburn, with the other witnesses, were divers times under private examination by the king's counsel and attorney and solicitor general, &c.

The evidence being prepared, and all things in readiness for a Trial, John James having been in Newgate from the 19th of the 8th month, was appointed the 14th of the 9th month to appear at the King's-bench bar in order to his Trial.

HIS ARRAIGNMENT AND TRIAL.

What passed the 1st day, Nov. 14.

Being carried in a coach to Westminster by the under-sheriff, and brought to the King's bench bar; chief justice Forster, justice Mallet, justice Twisden, and justice Windham, being judges upon the bench; he was commanded, according to custom, to hold up his hand; and he did so, and told them he did hold up, his hand to signify he was there to answer to what should be laid to his charge. But he held up his hand with his glove on, which some were offended at, and told him he must pull it off. John James answered, it was all one to him, to hold up his hand with it off or on; and then he did pull off his glove, and held up his hand, and then his Charge was read.

The Substance of the Indictment.

‘He stood indicted by the name of John James: 1. For compassing and imagining the death of the king. 2. For endeavouring to levy war against the king. 3. For endeavouring a change of the government. And in this his compassing, imagining, and contriving the king's death, he had maliciously, traiterously, and by instigation of the devil, not having the fear of God before his eyes, declared these words: 1. That the king was a bloody tyrant, a blood-sucker, and blood-thirsty man, and his nobles the same. 2. That the king and his nobles had shed the blood of the saints at Charing-Cross, and the blood of the covenanters in Scotland. 3. That the king was brought in to this end, to fill up the measure of his iniquity; and that the king's cup of iniquity had filled more within this last year, than in many years before. 4. That he did bemoan that they had not improved their opportunity when they had the power in their hands; and that he did say it would not be long before they had power again, and then they would improve it better; and that he did bewail the apostacy of the people of God, and say, they had not fought the Lord's battles thoroughly: but when the Lord should give power to them again, and give his work unto their hands, they would do it better. 5. That the death and destruction of the king drew very near.’

The Indictment being read, the clerk called upon John James to answer to his Charge, and plead Guilty, or Not Guilty.

John James desired, before they did proceed, that he might have a copy of his Charge, and time to consider of it.

The Lord Chief Justice answered, That a copy of the Charge was not allowed in cases of High Treason; and he told him he must plead Guilty, or Not Guilty, or else a worse thing would follow.

John James answered, he humbly conceived it was his privilege as an Englishman; and till he had that he was not free to plead one way or other. He alledged that Chief Justice Coke had declared it good law; and that Judge Heath had declared it also good law; and that he did at Oxford give John Lilburne a copy of his Charge, being arraigned there for High Treason.

Then one of the King's Counsel told him, That the law would not grant him a copy of his Charge in case of Felony, much less in case of High Treason; and told him, If he would not plead, they would proceed against him as a person contemning the court, and look upon him a mute.

John James made answer, Seeing he was over-ruled, he pleaded Not Guilty; neither in form nor matter.

The clerk asked him how he would be tried. He answered, By the law of God. At which the lawyers gave a great hiss.

And it was answered thus, or to this effect, 'It was not a place or time to talk of the laws of God.' But John James was willing to urge it again, That seeing the Judge did sit there as judge of the law, and of God's law, as they thought, it was meet they should give him liberty to appeal to God's law.

Whereupon the Judge told him he must proceed according to their law, or else a worse thing would follow; and say, 'By God and the country.'

John James answered, He was ignorant of their law, and knew not what snare there might be in it, never having been at any bar before; and therefore desired him he would open the terms, what they meant by God, and what they meant by the Country.

The Judge answered, God forbid but he should open the terms: 'By God,' says he, 'is meant your first demand, to wit, the law of God.'

John James asked him, Why then his first demand was not granted?

The Judge said, God forbid but that you should be so tried; but you must use the form of the court.

John James said, If it were so, he was satisfied.

'And by the Country,' saith the Judge, '12 Middlesex men, men of truth, that would judge impartially between the king and him.'

John James said, If that be the meaning, he put himself upon the trial of God and the Country.

When this was done, John James was sent by a Habeas Corpus to the King's-bench prison in Southwark, and there continued till the 19th day of November, and then was brought again to the King's-bench bar at Westminster, to his further trial.

In this interval betwixt the commitment and trial, upon the first day of the week, being the 18th of November, John James received a letter from a person of note, to advertise him that there was such a jury of life and death impanelled to proceed upon him, as had not been for many years before, being all picked men, and most of them knights and gentlemen; and that if he did not except against them, or most of the chief of them, he was a dead man.

The Second Day.

Upon the 19th of November he appeared the second time at the King's-bench bar, according to the order of the court, where were present.

The Judges. Sir Robert Forster, chief justice, sir Thomas Mallet, justice, sir Thomas Twisden, justice, sir Wadham Windham, justice, sir Jeffery Palmer, attorney-general, sir Heneage Finch, solicitor-general.

The King's Counsel; serjeant Maynard, serjeant Glynne, serjeant Wilde, serjeant Keeling.

The Witnesses Names appearing in the Court; Alderman Chard, John Tipler, Bernard Osburn. The fourth witness's name not yet known.

The Names of the Jury, Charles Pitfield, Ralph Halsaye, Thomas Egglefield, Daniel Carlwood, Ambrose Hanburrough, Anthony Hall, Humphrey Higgins, Thomas Snow, William Cole, Thomas Upnel, Gilbert Messe, William Blunt.

The witnesses and jury being called into the court, John James having excepted against divers knights and gentlemen picked for his jury, and the aforementioned standing for his jury, the Clerk bid John James hold up his hand as before. He did so; and again told them it was to signify he was there: (and then they laughed) and the Judge said, O ho, are you come?

Afterwards, the Indictment being read again, the Clerk proceeded to tell the court for what he was indicted and arraigned; and that he pleaded Not Guilty, and had put himself upon God and the country for trial; and therefore told the jury they were to judge between the king and him in that matter.

Serjeant Keeling's Speech.

Hereupon Serjeant Keeling, one of the king's counsel, stepped up, and said, My lord, and you gentlemen of the jury, John James prisoner at the bar stands indicted for high Treason; for that he, with other disaffected persons, enemies unto the government of the king, being assembled at Bulstake Alley in White-Chapel, not having God before his eyes, but being moved by the instigation of the devil, spake and published these words, viz. That king Charles was a blood-thirsty tyrannical king; and that the nobles of England were blood-thirsty and tyrannical men; and that the cup of their iniquity was begun to be filled by the shedding of the blood of the Covenanters in Scotland; and that it was almost filled by the shedding of the blood of the Saints this time twelve-month; and that the time of their destruction was near at hand: And did condole the neglect of the opportunity and price they had put into their hands; and that if ever the like occasion were administered unto them again they would fight the Lord's battle more effectually than they had done before.' And (said he) if we prove that these words were spoken, by John James, you are to find him guilty of high treason. (and so he sat down.) Then stood up Sir Jeffry Palmer, attorney-general.

The Substance of Sir Jeffry Palmer's Speech.

First he spake of the antiquity of monarchy, and did fully assert the present government. Then, by way of reflection, he reviewed the 20 years troubles that had passed over our heads in these nations; and that the vessel of this commonwealth had been beaten and blown upon the waves and billows of a tempestuous raging sea being almost broken to pieces, and like utterly to be lost, unless God by a miraculous providence had restored his majesty Charles the second to his crown and dignity; for which (he said) ever blessed be his name. Then he observed that the beginning of our sorrows was by the seditious preaching of some discontented ministers in this nation, and about this city. Then he told them how much care the law had taken for the preservation of his majesty's person and government; and that it was as much treason in the heart, as in the act, 'Mens rea facit reum.' Then he did descant upon the words of the indictment, and opened them, and told the jury, that according to the law of England [13 Car. 2. c. 1.] * they were treason, for which he ought to die: and then sat down.

Then the Court called John Tipler, the first witness, the Judge bidding him look upon the prisoner. Serjeant Glynne asked him, what he could say concerning the words spoken by John James? Who said, at the time of the Indictment alledged, (which was on Saturday,) he was at a house near adjoining unto the place where they usually did meet; and that about two of the clock in the afternoon, he stood at a window in a yard, next adjoining to the meeting-place, and saw John James, the person at the bar, preaching, (as they call it, said he) and repeated the words that were opened by Serjeant Keeling exactly; only further, That he did wonderfully adore Oliver Cromwell, saying; That every finger of his was a champion; and that when they had power again, they should do the work more thoroughly. And said, That thereupon he told it presently to a justice, and afterwards to a neighbour of his, who was in an extreme fright and borror, and so they both went together to alderman Chard, justice, who then came immediately, and surprised and seized upon them; the women only they let go, but the men the Justice did commit to prison that would not take the oath of Allegiance: that they seized John James in the pulpit, where he was preaching when they came in. The Court asked him, what time of the day it was? And he said it was about two of the clock in the afternoon. And they asked him, where he stood? And he said he stood directly opposite in a window, in a yard next adjoining to the meeting-place; and that he could easily discern him. Demanding of him some other questions, that might induce the jury to believe the evidence given was neither with thought of malice to the prisoner, nor hope of reward: then the Court gave the prisoner leave to ask Tipler what questions he pleased.

The exception that John James took unto the witness, was, That it was a hard thing for him to swear that he was the person that was then preaching, he being without the window, which might intercept his sight. To which he answered, That he knew him very well; and that he was not deceived.

Another witness was Alderman Chard, the Justice; who said, He could say nothing as to the words that were spoken; but so soon as John Tipler came to him, and informed him of the words spoken by John James, he enquired the place where it was, and immediately he and his clerk and the constable hasted thither, where they found John James preaching, and about 30 or 40 assembled there to hear him. And said, He there seized John James, and pulled him out of the pulpit where he was preaching; and all those men that would not take the oath of Allegiance, he committed, but the women he let go. So the court asked him, if it were at the time alledged in the Indictment? And he said, yea.

Another witness was a Yorkshire man, whose name we know not; who coming into the Court was commanded to look upon the prisoner at the bar, and declared what he heard him say. Who answered, he was at Tipler's house, and heard very loud speaking, which caused him to come out, and hearken, and he heard very dangerous words. The Judge asked him, what those dangerous words were? He said, he could remember no more than this, that one said; That the Lord had a great work to do for his people; and that they were the people that must do it. The Judge asked him if he heard nothing concerning the king's cup of iniquity? To which he answered, No. And they bid him look upon the prisoner at the bar, and asked if that was the man? He answered, He could not say that he was the man.

Whereupon John James desired the Judge to

* This was an Act for safety and preservation of his majesty's Person and Government, against treasonable and seditious practices, and attempts: by this statute it was made capital treason, during the king's life to devise his death, or imprisonment, or bodily harm, or to deprive and depose him from the kingly name, &c. It enacted likewise, that whoever affirmed the king to be an Heretic, or a Papist, or should by writing, printing, preaching, or other speaking, stir up the people to hatred or dislike of his majesty, or the established government, should be rendered incapable of holding any employment in Church or State. It also declared the Long Parliament to be dissolved, the Solemn League and Covenant to be illegal; and that there was no legislative power in either, or both houses of parliament, without the king; and whoever asserted the contrary, were made liable to the penalty of a Premunire. See 4 Cobbett's Parl. Hist. 217.

ask him, if he was the man? And he turned his face towards John James, as if he directed his speech to him, and said he could not say he was the man.

Another was Bernard Osburn, whom the Judge commanded to look upon the prisoner at the bar, and tell the Court what he heard him say concerning the king and the powers that were now in being.

Hereupon John James told Osburn, He hoped he was a man of some conscience and integrity, and that he feared wrongfully to take away the life of a man; and how great a sin it was, especially to shed the blood of them that fear the Lord.

Then the Court asked the witness, where he was when the words were spoken? He said he was in the meeting-place; and he said he heard John James say, "That king Charles was a blood-thirsty tyrannical king; and that the nobles of England were blood-thirsty: that he had drank pretty deep of the blood of the Saints already, in that he had shed their blood 12 months ago at Charing-Cross, and the blood of the Covenanters in Scotland; and that God had brought him in to that end, to fill up the measure of his iniquity, and he had filled it up more in twelve months than in many years before." They asked him if he heard nothing concerning the Lord's battles? And he told (as though he had forgot it) that he had heard him say, "That they should have power in their hands; and that they should fight the Lord's battles more thoroughly." And they asked him if he heard any thing concerning the ruin of the king? He answered, Yes, he heard him say, "That the ruin of the king was very near." Then they asked him if those were the words? He said, He could not say they were the same words, but to the same substance.

Having done this, the Judge told John James he had liberty to speak for himself.

Whereupon he desired the favour of the court to those witnesses he had attending the court, in respect of Bernard Osburn. Whereupon four witnesses were called into the court, that gave evidence that this Bernard Osburn confessed to them he had sworn against John James he knew not what. One of them declared further and more largely, (that was near marriage to Bernard Osburn) That he had told her "he did not only swear he knew not what, but that he was affrighted into what he swore." He did say, That what he swore to, was first sworn to by another man, and then brought to him in writing. The former witnesses declared, That moreover they desired to know of Bernard what he had sworn against John James: And he told them, He could not tell, except he heard the words repeated. (Though Bernard Osburn denied in the face of the court that ever he said any such things.) John James then told the court he had several witnesses attending the court, that were free, if they pleased, to prove that the words charged upon him were not spoken. The Judge told him he might call in as many witnesses as he would. Whereupon John James called in four witnesses more; all which did testify in the face of the court, That the words charged upon him were not spoken. And the court did, as before, give them the hearing.

Then the Judge bid the jury take notice what had been spoken by the king's witnesses and his. And then the court told John James that now he had free leave to speak for himself, as much and as long as he pleased, if he had called all his witnesses; and told him, That when the king's counsel had concluded, he could speak no more: but now he might say as much as he pleased. Then he spake with much freedom, the court and all present giving attention to what he said, which was to this purpose:

JOHN JAMES'S Defensive Speech.

He said he had somewhat to say, first, as to the form of the Charge, viz. "That he had maliciously, wickedly, traitorously, and by the instigation of the devil, not having the fear of God before his eyes, &c." He told them, That in the fear of God he did deny it; and told them he had not a malicious thought against the person of the king, but desired the salvation of his soul, as of his own; that he had not dealt maliciously against the king, neither was instigated thereto by the devil; and that by the goodness of the Lord, what he had done, he had done it in the fear of God. Neither could he be judged, as he told them, as a malicious person against the king, in regard he never had any public employment in the nation, either against this king in being or his father, being a man of no account in the world, having not worn a sword these eleven years; and therefore desired they would in their understanding clear him from this charge, as a person malicious against the king. And further he said, He was a person that could not be supposed to have in his eye any thing of advantage in the world in so acting against the king. And as to the matter of the charge, whereas it runs, "That I John James had compassed, imagined and contrived, the death of the king;" John James told the court he did not well understand what they meant by compassing the death of the king, as compassing and imagining is ordinarily taken: he had not, neither was he capable of endeavouring the king's death; nor the change of the government; being a mean inconsiderable person, a man that had lived upon his calling. And as to those particulars lastly charged upon him, he said he was not guilty of them: He did not say "the king was a bloody tyrant, a blood-sucker, a blood-thirsty man;" That in the fear of the Lord he did utterly deny; neither did he say any thing tending thereto. He further said, He did not say "the king had shed the blood of the saints at Charing Cross this time twelve-month;" he did not say, "That when they had power, in their hands, would improve it more thoroughly for God; and that we did not fight the Lord's battles thoroughly. And whereas he was charged for contending for Cromwell, and that power, (that God hath eminently wiped off from the stage) he said he did declare against that power, and was averse to it, and did suffer under it in his measure; and told them he did not stand there as Cromwell's advocate. Then did he endeavour to speak more particularly to the jury, letting them know, that in a secondary way his life was in their hands; and it was in the eye of reason, in their power to save or destroy him, and wished them to have a care of shedding innocent blood: and told them, because of innocent blood the land did mourn; to wit, for the blood shed in queen Mary's days, and king Henry the Eighth's; and if there were any innocent blood shed since, he desired no more to be added to it. He told them he did desire they would act conscientiously, and not to be over-awed by any man. He told them they were his judges in law of matter of fact, and desired them to be tender of his blood. He said, he should say very little more for himself, but one word for the Lord, and therefore desired he might have his fear before him, and although he was the poorest and meanest for such a work, yet he was called forth, and did declare, "That the Lord Jesus Christ was king of nations as well as king of saints; and that the government of kingdoms did of right belong to him." And he quoted Rev. xi. 15. "And the seventh angel sounded, and there were great voices in heaven, saying, The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord, and of his Christ, and he shall reign for ever and ever."

And when he had so spoke, the Lord Chief Justice Forster interrupted him, saying, "Hold, Sirrah; Sirrah, you think you are in the conventicle in White Chapel preaching." And thereupon commanded the clerk to read an act of parliament, entitled, "An Act for the preservation of the king's person and government;" wherein was expressed to this purpose, "That whosoever shall contrive or endeavour to levy war against the king or government, &c. or endeavour to compass or contrive the death of the king, his wound or maim; or that by printing, preaching, writing, or other speaking, endeavour the same; then every such person or persons shall be looked upon as traitors to the king, and shall be proceeded against as in the case of High-Treason, &c." Which when the clerk had read,

John James desired liberty to speak, desiring the court to produce a statute that would reach his case, for that did not, but the case of such as had endeavoured to levy war against the king, or had compassed or contrived his death or maim: but he had not contrived or compassed the death of the king, or the change of the government within or without his dominions; and therefore desired a statute might be produced that might reach his case, for he conceived that was short.

The Judge told him it fully reached his case.

And one of the king's counsel made answer, That it reached him in every case.

And another of the counsel said, Treason was the first conception and the first evil thought in the heart; and treason was made visible by preaching, printing, or speaking, &c. which was a manifestation of the things that were in the heart.

This being spoken, the Judge asked him if he had any more to say for himself; and told him, if he did not speak now, the king's counsel would enter upon their plea, and then he must speak no more for himself.

He told them he had one word to the Jury, which he desired to lay before them: It was a scripture written in the 29th of Isaiah, ver. 21.

"That make a man an offender for a word, and lay a snare for him that reproveth in the gate."

Whereupon the Judge told him it was not to be borne: for he did inveigh against the parliament.

Though he said, He had not the least thought of the parliament: but he spake it to let the Jury know, that if he were guilty of those words, there was no law of God to take away a man's life for words.

Hereupon the king's counsel spake severally one after another.—First serjeant Glynne stood up, and said, Brother Maynard, shall we not answer something to what the prisoner hath objected? So Glynne began.

The Substance of Serjeant Glynne's Speech.

He told the jury, That if they proved the words alledged in the indictment substantially, though it were not adequate thereunto in every tittle and iota, yet it was sufficient to satisfy their consciences, and to find the prisoner guilty of high-treason.

First, He began with the exception taken unto the first witness, that he stood without the window, and therefore could not easily discern the visage and physiognomy of the prisoner that was there a preaching. He told them he had sworn expressly it was the same person; and that as he came into the yard he was there a preaching, and as he went away to the justice of peace he saw him: and the justice did seize the same person, and find him preaching when he came; and therefore it must be him, and no other. And told them, that the witness could have no end in discovering of it; for if he had kept silence, he had consented, and so been guilty of misprision of treason.

Then said he, As to the exception taken against the fourth witness, That he said he swore he knew not what, and could not tell what he had sworn to. He said, This was no cause to reject this evidence; for peradventure he could not well call to mind the several words that were spoken; or peradventure he would not tell them, because he might suppose that they were sent to ensnare him in his evidence, that they might make it void.

Then as to the witnesses that were brought on the part of the prisoner, to testify that no such words were spoken; As to that he must refer it unto the consciences of the Jury. But he said, he conceived that it was altogether immaterial; for the question is not, what he did not say, but what he did say. They say that he did not say these words, but they do not say what he did.

Then stept up serjeant Maynard, and said, That as to the evidence of those three persons, his brother Glynne had spoken so much, and so well, that he could add no more, or very little: and urged the same things that serjeant Glynne did. And further said, that the prisoner spoke much of his integrity and innocency; I believe, saith he, gentlemen of the jury, never was there any offender, or the vilest miscreant in the world, that would ever have received the reward of his doings, if his own excuse and protestation might have saved him. Then he said, as for the blood of the saints that was spilt this time twelvemonth, he said they were sad saints, such saints, said he, as would have cut all our throats.

Then John James desired to be heard one word, that that gentleman had untruly alledged against him; but the court refused to allow him the liberty.

Then stood up sir Heneage Finch, Solicitor-General.

The Substance of Sir Heneage Finch's Speech.

My Lord, and you Gentlemen of the Jury, be it known unto you, and to all that hear me this day, that the prisoner at the bar is not arraigned for his conscience or religion, but for treason and rebellion, for horrid treason and rebellion, for spurning against the meekest king in the earth. His majesty, to the great and inexpressible grief of his heart, did not think there was a person so unworthy left within his dominions, that would have lifted up the heel against him, after twenty years rejecting of his majesty and his royal father; and having also conferred his grace upon us, to reduce us to a state of innocency, he could not think there was any gall left in our hearts, or any guile to be found in our mouths.—He then pressed his Treason upon the consciences of the Jury, who, as he told them, would affright their consciences with his innocency. And told them, how that the punishment of this offender might affright the like malefactors for the future: and said, that there were a people, that under the pretence of religion had the liberty of conscience allowed by the king for a time, till they were better informed; but this man, and those of his mind, are none of those men: but they endeavour not only to destroy the monarch, but monarchy itself; not only in England, but all the world over. This is the principle that they are of, therefore I desire the Jury to take notice, what may be their duty upon that account. And that when the prisoner was preaching that pernicious sermon, he pressed it with the peril of their salvation, and now would affright you upon the account of innocent blood: but you shall find, if his blood be rightly and swiftly pursued, it may be a means of preventing the shedding of the blood of thousands, for the time to come. And withal did desire them to consider further, That the great trouble this nation had undergone for these twenty years last past, sprung from pulpits, conventicles, and seditious preaching; and therefore if these causes were taken away, it might prevent such evil effects for the future. And said, That as to the evidence he had produced, it had been well spoke to by the two Serjeants that spoke last: and as to that evidence by the women, he said they had no reason to tell what was said by John James, for thereby they would make themselves guilty of misprision of treason; which is to be punished with perpetual imprisonment, confiscation of goods, and the loss of the profits of lands during life.

That is well observed, said my lord to the Solicitor.

Then Judge Forster endeavoured further to inform the Jury, and to incense them against his principle, telling them, that he was of the same spirit with those that did endeavour heretofore to put all the nation in a flame, and to set every one against each other; and said, No treason was comparable to that treason that was covered with a pretence of religion.

This being done, and the Jury ready to go forth, John James desired the Court to favour him with one word to the Jury. They told him he had had a great deal of liberty, and time to speak; but now he should speak no more. Then John James replied, That if they would not suffer him to speak to his Jury, they had as good have hanged him at Bull-stake Alley gate, before he came there, and not brought him thither to cover over the matter with the pretence of law. This being spoken, the Judge gave him a sore rebuke, and told him he was not to be judge in the case.

Then my lord and the Judges laid their heads and conferred together, whereupon my lord said thus to the Jury, or to this effect: You have heard the evidence, you are to find the matter of fact as it is laid before you, whereof you are the proper judges, and I pray God direct you.

Then the King's Counsel and the Jury departed from the bar; and at the return of the Jury, being about a quarter of an hour, the Attorney and Solicitor General came back into the Court with them. Whereupon the Crier called them all by name, and the Clerk asked them if they were all agreed, and they answered, Yes. Then the Clerk of the Crown commanded the prisoner to hold up his hand, and asked the Jury, How say you, is John James, who hath been arraigned and tried, Guilty of the Treason alledged in the Indictment, or Not Guilty? And the Foreman, which was Charles Pitfield, said, Guilty according to the Indictment.

Then the Attorney General prayed Judgment for the king. To that the Court answered, Never the same day he is arraigned, but appoint what day the prisoner shall be brought, and it shall be granted. Then the Attorney and Solicitor conferred together, and the Attorney said, On Friday next. Till which time he was remanded to the King's-Bench prison in Southwark.

His Wife's Application to the King after her Husband was cast.

In the interval, betwixt his casting and condemnation, upon the fourth day of the week in the evening, his wife, by advice of some friends, endeavoured to make address to the king, to acquaint him with her husband's innocency, and the condition of those loose persons who had falsely accused him; which she put in writing, lest she might either want an opportunity, or not have courage enough to speak to him. And with some difficulty at last she met with the king as he came out of the Park, going into the Gallery; where she presented him with the Paper, which on the back-side was indorsed, "The humble Request of Elizabeth James:" acquainting him also by word who she was, to whom he held up his finger, and said, "Oh! Mr. James, he is a sweet gentleman!" but following him for some further answer, the door was shut against her; which was all she could obtain at that time. The next morning she came again to the same place, where she had not long been, but the king came out of the Gallery to go into the Park, whom she followed down the stairs, imploring his answer to her request; who then replied, "That he was a rogue, and should be hanged." One of the Lords attending him, asked her of whom she spake; whereunto the king answered, "Of John James, that rogue: he shall be hanged, yea he shall be hanged." And so she came away, satisfied in her conscience, that what she had done was but her duty.

The Third Day, Nov. 22.

Being this day brought to the bar, according to former order, the Clerk proceeded according to their manner, and told the Court, That John James had been arraigned and tried, &c. and had committed himself to God and the country for trial, and by the country was found guilty of the crimes and treasons alledged against him in the Indictment. And then it was demanded of John James, what he had to say for himself why Sentence of death should not be passed upon him according to the law? To which John James answered, That he had not much to say, only two or three Scriptures he would leave with them. The first Scripture was Jer. xxvi. 14, 15. "As for me, do as seemeth good unto you; but know ye for certain, that if ye put me to death, you shall surely bring innocent blood upon yourselves, and upon this city, and upon the inhabitants thereof." The second Scripture was Psal. cxvi. 15. "Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his Saints." He also minded that good word of the Lord, "He that toucheth the Lord's people, toucheth the apple of his eye." He told them he had not more to say for himself, only one word for the Lord, and so he had done: "That Jesus Christ the Son of God, was king of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and of all the kingdoms of this world."

Which being spoken, they silenced him, and the Court proceeded to Sentence, and the Judge pronounced Sentence according to the law, and said thus:

"John James, thou hast been here indicted, arraigned, and tried as a false traitor to his majesty, his crown and dignity, and hast put thyself upon the trial of God and the country, and the country have found thee guilty; and therefore, John James, thou art to be carried from hence to prison, and from thence to the place of execution, and there to be hanged by the neck, and being yet alive, to be cut down, and thy bowels to be taken out, (a fire being prepared) and to be burnt before thy face; and thy head to be severed from thy body, and thy body to be quartered, and thy head and body to be disposed according to the king's pleasure."

This being done, John James had only time to say, "Blessed be God; whom man hath condemned, God hath justified."*

* Keble's Report of the Case of John James is as follows:

"John James was indicted (and found guilty) for compassing and imagining of the king's death, and intending his deprivation, manifested by preaching at White-Chapel, after the 21th of June 1661, viz. 18th of Oct. affirming of the king and his nobles, That the king was a blood-thirsty and tyrannical king, and so of the nobles; and that the cup of their iniquity was almost filled with the blood of the saints a year ago, but the putting of the covenanters to death in Scotland, had (to fit them for destruction) filled it fuller; and he was sorry he had neglected his opportunity of fighting the Lord's battle, but hoped that if ever he had it again, he should consider it more fully. Serjeant Keeling opened the indictment (the Court on his desire refused to allow any friend to take notes for him) Mr. Attorney General further observed, That the intent and imagination was the prime treason, the preaching an evidence of it, which was the law before any statute made in the world, as ancient as monarchy itself; but the uncertainty is bounded by the statute, 25 Edw. 3, which is only declaratory of the common law for the ease of the subject, bare words at common law being treason, this is more than that, preaching is an overt act, at least by the statute of 13 Car. 2, cap. 1, of preserving the king's person, that he endeavoured not only to overthrow the king, but monarchy (that divine rule from all antiquity) in this land. After the evidences that swore the words punctually, the prisoner objected against the testimony. The Court summed up the evidence, and verdict pro rege."

Some Account of the FEES and CHARGES demanded and paid by JOHN JAMES to the Officers and Jailors, during his Trial and Imprisonment.

That notwithstanding his great poverty, who (as it was well known) what through the means of his calling,* but especially the weakness of his body, had much ado for this many years to get bread for his family, these following Fees were exacted from him. First (besides the Charges and Fees paid by him in Newgate) upon his Arraignment at Westminster, and first commitment to the King's-Bench prison, the tipstaff men received of him 13s. for the Judges clerks, their own and officers fees; and 1s. for his prison in the King's Head tavern in Westminster, which they demanding with rigour, he told them he was a poor man and had it not to give them; and that they would have his life, and he thought that might suffice them: but they would abate him nothing; for their fees (they said) they must have; whereupon he was constrained to borrow the same at Westminster to pay them.

Upon his coming to the King's-Bench prison, sir John Lenthall received of him for Fees the sum of 15s. and then turned him into a yard where it rained upon him; and after, (for some shelter he got amongst them in an alehouse) he paid 3s. 6d.

After he was cast for his life, the tipstaff men belonging to the King's-Bench at Westminster demanded his cloak of him, which he refusing to give, they took by violence, saying, "It must be divided amongst several of them;" which afterwards they offered to sell him: but he told them he had but a little time to live, and those cloaths he had should now serve him. After his return to the King's-Bench prison, he was constrained to pay 5s. to keep in his former prison chamber, and they forced him also to diet a man they put with him to look after him during his stay there. And all the time of his trial they would hurry him to alehouses, and still make him pay for all; and put him to all charges of going by water, when he was brought to and from his trials. Further, his wife was constrained to pay to Hicks the keeper of the Press-yard, the sum of 10s. for his chamber rent during his continuance there, which was not above three or four days.

The hangman also the day before his execution, came to demand money, that he might be favourable to him at his death: He asking what would satisfy him? the hangman demanded twenty pounds; but John James pleading poverty, he fell to ten pounds; but in conclusion told him, if he would not give him

* "He was for some years a small-coalman, but not able to undergo that calling, by reason of weakness (though the most profitable to him of any other) was constrained to undertake ribbon weaving, his former profession, which scarcely afforded him bread." Orig. Edit.

five pounds, he would torture him exceedingly: To which John James said, he must leave that to his mercy, for he had nothing to give him.

Some occasional SPEECHES in the King's-Bench Prison upon his first Commitment there.

A friend coming to visit him at the King's-Bench, and finding him in his bed, went to his bed side and asked him how he did? he then made relation of the several ways that God and man had taken with him; told that friend, that touching his spirit he had much to do while in Newgate; that one whole day and night he was assaulted with very horrible temptations, and sometimes was much pressed to make known to his brethren what he met withal; but this Satan hindered for a long time, telling him it would but expose him to be slighted, &c. But at last the Lord overcame, and he did acquaint them with his condition, who immediately betook themselves to prayer for him, and God was near unto them, and broke in upon him with that word, 2 Sam. 23. 5. 'Although my house be not so with God, yet he hath made with me an everlasting covenant, ordered in all things and sure;' which came with wonderful efficacy, and (said he) for present set me into perfect liberty from all my fears: but in some time Satan came on again, and would endeavour to weaken the force of the Word to him, by shewing him how weak and inconsiderable he was, and short of David, to whom that word was spoken: but this cloud was quickly blown over, and the Lord by two words of Scripture fully answered all; one of which was, 2 Cor. 8. 12. If there be first a willing mind it is accepted according to that a man hath, and not according to that he hath not; and the other, that word of the apostle, 'It is God who worketh in us both to will and to do, according to his good pleasure.' And proceeding to acquaint his friend with the Lord's ways further with him, he said, I was after this brought from Newgate to this place, where, upon my first coming, I was dealt hardly with, and first put into a place where it rained upon me; complaining of this, I had leave to go into an alehouse, which liberty I purchased with my money; in which place I was attended from three till nine of the clock with cruel mockings, by one company after another; and afterwards, though I desired to be alone, yet could not obtain it, but would have put me with a very unsuitable company; yet with much ado obtained the company, whose civilities I cannot but acknowledge, though I would rather have been alone; and truly for some time I was troubled, and said, as he of old, "Why should I live any longer? Lord, take away my life." 1 Kings 19. 5. But this also the Lord in some little time rebuked, and I had much calmness in my spirit, and very suddenly by grace arrived to my rejoicings in God, and now I bless the Lord I am well; sometimes I am putting the halter about my neck, and putting the sled before my eyes, to see if it will terrify me; but through grace, they are not at all terrible (as yet) to me ; and he hoped the Lord would keep him to the end, or words to this purpose : speaking also to the same friend, with admiration that such a poor contemptible wretch as he was, should be called forth into such service for the Lord. And as to them that sought his life, there was no advantage could accrue to them thereby, they were not like to get one penny by him, having for these eight years been put to such exigencies to get a livelihood, that many a night he has not been able to take his rest, for the sore and painful labour he had taken the day before with his weak body, to get food for his poor family ; but if the Lord would glorify himself by such a worm he desired to be given up to his dispose.

After he was carried from the Court, being found Guilty, he was asked how it was with him ? He answered, Very well, I bless the Lord : I am a great deal more at ease in my mind than I was before, for the verdict of the Jury hath not at all terrified me.

Another friend visiting him in the same place, found him exceeding chearful, and much filled with the sense of the goodness of the Lord, declaring in these very expressions, that he could truly say, Whatever the Lord had spoken of in his blessed word, in relation to any trials he had hitherto met withal, he had been every way as good as his word.

Some other friends visiting him at the same prison, after some discourse, he desired them not to be troubled, for the Lord had compassed him about that he had neither fear nor torment, yet, he said, he had looked upon all their instruments of death, and was filled with joy and peace unutterable, but when he had any thoughts of living he had nothing but trouble and distraction ; for alas, said he, what will my life signify ? It will signify but little ; but my blood will cry aloud, it will speak louder than all my life. I have spoke many a time at a higher rate for the kingdom of Christ than I did then, but my hour was not come.

Some Speeches uttered by him in the Dungeon in Newgate after the Sentence was pronounced against him.

One visiting him in that place, expressed much trouble on his behalf, and could not refrain weeping ; who came to the party smiling and said, I beseech you let me not see any of this, for all is well, and therefore forbear I beseech you, such carriage, which will too much encourage the enemies of the Lord ; therefore I pray you let me not see a sad countenance from any of you.

To several he uttered these words ; O saith he, this poor weak body has been often near the gates of death in my own thoughts, and others, and now that the Lord should make choice of so poor a carcass to put it off at such a rate, O (said he, with much rejoicing) blessed be God ! let him take it.

Two of his fellow prisoners coming unto him at that place, found him at prayer with some friends, who observed that his heart was much enlarged in thanksgiving and praises for that choice help and assistance the Lord had given him in the work he had been called to, who after he had ended, saluted them, rejoicing greatly to see them ; telling them of his hardships he had endured since he was taken from them, and also spake of the goodness of the Lord, which he judged to be great towards him, in that he was supported with suitable strength, and made willing to do the good pleasure of his Father, either in life or death, and also said, he had gotten the start of his brethren, and was going to a place where the ' Wicked cease ' from troubling, and where the prisoners be at ' rest,' (Job iii. 17, 18.) declaring further to them, that God had been eminently with him, in delivering him from all the fears he lay under while the trial was upon him ; and although it was hard to flesh and blood to look the King of Terror in the face, yet when the Lord brought him to it, it was made easy to him ; for which he thanked God, and bid his friends be encouraged, saying, That his dear Lord had helped him over two of his steps, and now he had but one more before he should be free from all that care and fear of dishonouring God, or grieving his people in the work he was called to ; and while he was speaking of the goodness of the Lord to him in an admiring manner, that God should choose and own such a contemptible creature as he was, he presently reflected upon himself, fearing lest he might be too much lifted up, but withal saying, he was now going to a place where his sins should trouble him no more.

Another friend visiting of him in that place, asking him how he did ? said, I bless God I am well, never better in all my life. I will tell thee brother, never a poor creature hath more dreaded this condition than I have done ; I have been afraid of a prison, my heart would tremble to think of it ; I would have gone out of the land to have escaped a prison ; but now it is all gone, every cloud is blown over ; I bless God I do no more fear this death, than to lye down upon this bed. And to another he said, The Sentence that day was no more to him than the eating of those raisins in his hand, saying, O how good is God ! There is a ground of encouragement in the Lord's dealing with such a poor worm as I, for all the saints to trust in him in every condition.

Upon the seventh day in the morning, being the day after his Sentence, some friends coming to see him before he was unlocked, none being in the room but his wife and himself, he was in prayer for some good time, and that in more than ordinary enlargement, (though the said friends could only hear some sound of words ;) after he had concluded, and the door being opened, being asked how he did, and how it was with him in his spirit ? his answer was, Very well, I bless the Lord, never better in all my life ; my wife and I have had the best morning that ever we had, we have been giving up one another to the Lord, and I bless the Lord he hath made us as willing to part one from another, as ever we were to come together.

Some Passages and Speeches in the Press-yard, in Newgate, after his Removal from the Dungeon, three or four days before he suffered.

Upon the first day of the week, after the Sentence of condemnation was passed upon him, several friends being come to see him, he told them that with the help of the Lord he would now finish that discourse amongst them, that he was upou at White-Chapel when he was taken prisoner; for then, he said, he was pulled down before he had gone far in it, and so he read the scripture to them.

The Scripture was, 1 Cor. vi. last verse. "For you are bought with a price," &c. In the opening of which blessed portion of truth, he was made a choice blessing to them that were with him; his words came upon them like the small rain upon the tender herbs, and as the dew upon the grass.

He first treated of the great cost the Almighty was at to redeem our bodies and spirits, as to what the Son of his Love underwent upon that account. And, secondly, What it was to glorify God in our bodies and spirits, as to obedience in respect to the rule of God's Word, and that we were in great danger to fall short in our duties therein, and except we had more than ordinary zeal and watchfulness, we might lose our holy frames of spirit, &c. But that which was most considerable in the conclusion, he treated of glorifying God in the body, by giving it up in the spirit to suffer for righteousness sake, shewing how many prophets, apostles, and precious saints had glorified God that way, and had great joy in that service; and that our dear Lord Jesus was perfect through sufferings, and how he did rejoice in that he had a body given him to do the will of God, not only as to obedience to the preceptive will of the Father, but also to fulfil all the prophecies that had been spoken of him, that related to his suffering, &c.

And then said, He did not think when he began to speak from that text in White-Chapel, that he should so suddenly have been called to glorify God in his body in that way he was now likely; yet, inasmuch as it was his Father's good pleasure so to honour such a poor worm as he was, to give him, not only to believe in his name, but also to suffer for his sake, his soul did rejoice in the Lord; and as he had a baptism to be baptized withal, he was straitened till it was accomplished.

The messenger that brought the tidings from the Under-Sheriff of his execution, coming the second day of the week to him, found him in bed, and said he had brought him sad news; who raising himself in his bed, said, God forbid, what can that be? who said, that the next fourth day he was ordered to go to his Execution. He replied, Blessed be God, that is good news. Whereupon a friend coming in, he said,

Ah! now I can invite thee to my wedding, for I know now my wedding day: Upon the bringing of which news that Scripture was presented to him with much power, "The cup which my Father hath given me to drink, shall I not drink it?"

Upon the second day of the week in the afternoon, several friends being with him, he judging that the greatest cause of the Sentence and Condemnation passed upon him, was in respect to his principle of the Fifth Kingdom, therefore he desired to leave with them some of his Scripture-grounds for that his persuasion, for which he was now about to suffer, desiring the same might be committed to writing, which was as followeth.

He said, I do really judge that the Lord Jesus Christ that is now at the right hand of the Father, shall have the kingdoms of the world. I shall quote some Scriptures for it: The first is in Psal. 2, 8. "Ask of me, and I will give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession:" and this he must have by God's decree, as in ver. 7. "I declare the decree, the Lord hath said unto me, Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee." That Christ must have the heathen for his inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for his possession, is proved clear from hence. There is another word in Psal. 72, from the beginning of the Psalm to the end of the 15th verse, but more especially the 8, 9, 10th verses: "He shall have dominion also from sea to sea, and from the river to the ends of the earth: they that dwell in the wilderness shall bow before him, and his enemies shall lick the dust: the kings of Tarshish, and of the Isles, shall bring presents, the kings of Sheba and Seba shall offer gifts." Another Scripture is in the 9th of Isaiah (though I might urge many more Scriptures, as Psal. 145, about the beginning of that Psalm, &c.) Isa. 9, 6. "For unto us a child is born, unto us a Son is given, and the government shall be upon his shoulder; and his name shall be called, Wonderful Counsellor, The Mighty God, the Everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace; Of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end, upon the throne of David, and upon his Kingdom, to order it, and to establish it with judgment and with justice," &c. These Scriptures are very clear to prove that Jesus Christ must have the government. Another full word is in Isa. 53, 12, (and that by purchase) "Therefore will I divide him a portion with the great, and he shall divide the portion with the strong, because he hath poured out his soul unto death," &c. That Jesus Christ must have the government is clear, as he is the son of David, Luke 1, 31, 32, 33." And behold, thou shalt conceive in the womb, and bring forth a son, and shalt call his name Jesus; He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Highest: And the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David, and he shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end." I judge this Scripture to be equivalent to that in Isa. 9, 6. "Unto us a child is born," &c. respecting Christ as he is the son of David. But these Scriptures may suffice for the Old Testament. The apostle Paul clearly asserts this truth of the Fifth Kingdom, in 1 Tim. 6, 15. "Which in his time he will shew, who is the blessed and only Potentate, the King of kings, and Lord of lords. The Apostle asserts Jesus Christ to be the only Potentate, King of kings, and Lord of lords: which is the very superscription he brings upon the thigh when he comes to make war with the horns, Rev. 19, 16. "He hath on his vesture and on his thigh a name written, King of kings, and Lord of lords." That Jesus Christ must have the government, that he must have the kingdoms of the world is very clear: but to the further proof thereof, take Rev. 11, 15. "The seventh angel sounded, and there were great voices in heaven, saying, the kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord, and of his Christ, and he shall reign for ever and ever."

If any now say, We grant that Jesus Christ shall have dominion and power, and shall reign for ever, but Jesus Christ says, "His kingdom is not of this world."

Ans. It is true, Christ spake truth, Christ's kingdom was not then in this world, or of this world; but what is this to that? there is a time that his kingdom must be of this world, the Scripture saith it plainly, I never heard any allegorize this text, but have been forced to take it in the plain sense of the words; the Scripture saith it plainly, if that word in Joh. 5, 26, 27, be rightly understood: "For as the Father hath life in himself, so hath he given to the Son to have life in himself; and hath given him authority to execute judgment also, because he is the Son of Man." Again, this truth is plain from that of Daniel (which I thought not to have urged) ch. 7, 18, compared with the 27 verse. Ver. 18. "But the Saints of the Most High shall take the kingdom, and possess the kingdom for ever, even for ever and ever." And ver. 27. "And the kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole Heaven, shall be given to the people of the Saints of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey him." Now observe, here is two things I take notice of, to prove that this kingdom is an outward visible kingdom. First, the kingdom that the Saints take is from the fourth beast; the beast had never to do within any kingdom but what is below in the lower region; the kingdom that the Saints take, which is said to be Christ's kingdom, (in the 27 verse) is an outward kingdom, and therefore not a spiritual kingdom. That is one reason. Secondly another reason is, it is the kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven; and therefore it must be an outward kingdom, and must be equivalent to that, Rev. 11, 15. "The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord, and of his Christ, &c."

The next thing that I have to say, will be as to the nature of this kingdom in the administration thereof, which will be very righteous and holy; which you have clearly in Isa. 32, 1, 2. "Behold, a king shall reign in righteousness, and princes shall rule in judgment, &c." Isa. 1, 26, hath respect to the same time, "I will restore thy judges as at the first, and thy counsellors as at the beginning; afterwards thou shalt be called the City of Righteousness, the Faithful City." This kingdom will be a kingdom wherein the laws of God will be the only laws extant, the laws of God will be the only laws in being; and those that shall have the executive power of those laws, will be men qualified accordingly, moulded according to that holy and just law: as to the persons that shall have the executive power of that government, you have in Isa. 60, 17. "I will also make thy officers peace, and thine exactors righteousness."

The next thing (I must but touch upon things) How Jesus Christ must come by this kingdom? and that is, "He shall use his people in his hand as his battle-ax and weapon of war for the bringing in the kingdoms of this world into subjection to him." A few Scriptures (and but a few) as to this, Isa. 41, 14 ver. but more especially the 15, and 16 verses, the Prophet, speaking of Jacob, saith, "Behold, I will make thee a new sharp-threshing instrument, having teeth; thou shalt thresh the mountains, and beat them small, and shalt make the hills as chaff; thou shalt fan them, and the wind shall carry them away," &c. The next Scripture is in Jer. 51, 20, 21. "Thou art my Battle-ax (speaking to his own people) and weapons of war; for with thee will I break in pieces the nations, and with thee will I destroy kingdoms," &c. I might produce many Scriptures more, that God will make use of his people in doing of this great work: 17, 14. "These shall make war with the Lamb, and the Lamb shall overcome them; for he is Lord of lords and king of kings: and they that are with him, are called, and chosen, and faithful." In the great work of Jesus Christ against the horns, he hath a remnant called, and faithful, and chosen, standing by him in this work, which doth mightily correspond with those two former prophecies. Therefore, seeing that the Lord will make use of his people as his battle-ax and weapon of war; and that they are a faithful, and called, and chosen remnant, I only leave this one word by way of exhortation to the Lord's people that have faith in these prophecies, to be looking to the qualifications of this chosen remnant, and that they have in Rev. 14, 3, 4, 5. "They sung as it were a new song before the throne, and before the four beasts, and the elders, and no man could learn that song but the hundred and forty and four thousand which were redeemed from the earth, &c." They that serve the Lord in this great work, they must be a remnant indeed, redeemed from the earth. I press the Lords people very earnestly to look to the qualifications of that remnant that must serve the Lord, and see how it is with them, whether or no they are a people so qualified, a people indeed 'redeemed from the earth,' a people indeed taken from among men; a people in whose mouth is no guile, a people 'that have not defiled themselves with women,' a people 'that are virgins,' and have kept a virgin-like spirit: and I shall say no more, but leave what hath been spoken as some Scripture-evidence of my judgment aforesaid.

In this interval between the Sentence and his Execution, several persons of quality came to visit him, both men and women, courtiers and others, whose coming were chiefly to this end and purpose, to persuade him to petition the king for his life, and further to lay forth his innocency; and especially one of eminency in the city, did labour much with him to that end: to whom he did reply, as usually to others in that case, That he had discharged his duty and conscience already in the clearing of himself, and to the king he had done no wrong; and therefore would submit himself to the Lord, and rest satisfied in his good-pleasure. The said party of note afterwards urged his wife that she would petition, if her husband had not that freedom; and withal, as an argument to provoke her thereto, told her it might be a means to prevent the cry of innocent blood, which otherwise might be brought upon them: to whom she gave a particular account what means she had already used to that purpose, and what success she had (according as has been before recited) which gave him satisfaction in that matter.

Some COLLECTIONS and OBSERVATIONS of a Friend, that was frequently with him during his Imprisonment, till the time of his Execution. —

He was for the most part borne up in a sweet spiritual rejoicing frame, and his words were gracious, much rejoicing in the Lord, and admiring at his bounty towards such a poor worm as he was, inasmuch as he was accounted worthy to suffer for so glorious a cause, even for testifying to the kingdom of Christ, and the righteousness thereof; and against the kingdom of this world, and the wickedness thereof; and also in that he was a companion of them that had been so used, he being so unlike them; they being men of note, and he a man of no name; they were men educated and of considerable breeding, and he hardly knew letters; their persons had some presence and amiableness, but he a poor low deformed worm, yea a flea; and sometimes he would speak with a smiling countenance, rejoicing that he was in his trials and death made so like his precious Redeemer; first, in that he was delivered up into the hands of men to be judged through envy, &c. Secondly, and that envy procured false witnesses, to lay to his charge things that he knew not;

he himself, with many witnesses, affirming, that what was witnessed against him was false, both as to the matter and form: And thirdly, that he was tried in so high a Court, there being several Judges before him, and four of the King's Counsellors, besides the Attorney and Solicitor General, pleading against him to take away his life; and a Jury of knights and gentlemen all of the same spirit, thirsting after his blood, and in thus much, like to his precious Redeemer, according to the word of prophecy spoken of him in this case, Psal. xxii. 12, 16. Fourthly, in that they robbed him of his garments; for when they had condemned him, the King's-Bench jailors took away his cloak from him. And fifthly, in that he was to be hanged on a tree, and that his bowels were to be poured forth like water, and his body not suffered to be put into a grave, but set upon poles, as is foretold of them, Rev. 11.

To all his friends that came to visit him he gave good encouragement to perseverance and constancy in the matters of Worship and Testimony; and that they should not fear man's fear, nor be afraid, assuring them, that sufferings from man for righteousness were not so bad as they seemed to be.

He did not like to see any that came to him to weep or be sad, he would still tell them, that concerning him they had no cause to mourn, but rather to rejoice; for the joy of the Lord was his strength, and he was going to his Father, even to God his exceeding joy. But he said to his friends, they would rather see cause to weep for themselves, for the world wherein they were to abide, for a time would be full of defilements, and that even the grossness of Poverty was coming up to try them.

The day before he suffered, he had many friends came to see him, so that his chamber was thronged one could hardly pass in it from one side to the other; he spake to every company, and to most of them particularly, with a sweet joyful countenance, encouraging them much in the Lord, testifying to them that the Lord was good, and that there was no bitterness in his service; and said, that even that part which seemed to be most bitter, was made most sweet, for in it the glory of Christ was most revealed.

The night before he suffered, he sat at supper with some of his friends, and said unto them, "I sup with you to night, but you would be glad to sup with me to-morrow night." And would often say, he had many a night been in more care to get bread for his family the day following, than for what he should suffer the morrow.

That night he sat up late till near the middle of the night, accompanied with several friends; his discourse was very sweet and profitable, rejoicing in his portion, telling his friends that he should be taken out of the land of his labours, and should be at peace and rest before another night.

About three o'clock in the morning he had a sharp combat with the King of Terrors for about an hour and half's time, but spake no word; only had an inward wrestling that put him into a sweat; a friend that watched with him read a portion of scripture to him, which was the 11th of the Hebrews, and therein the Lord discovered, to the refreshing of his soul, how that the way that he was to travel that day, had been travelled through by the Lord's Worthies in the days of old, and by faith they endured both stonings and sawings asunder, and accepted not of deliverance upon man's terms, because they looked for a better resurrection; and afterwards that friend sought the Lord. And then John James declared that the Comforter was come to him again, and had refreshed his soul; and then he made himself ready, and in a joyful frame took his Bible and read, Jam. i. 12, "Blessed is the man that endureth temptation; for when he is tried, he shall receive the crown of life, which God hath prepared for them that love him." From which Scripture he spake about half an hour, and did chiefly make forth the blessed estate of those that endured torment for righteousness sake, and how the Lord had given that choice blessing only to his choicest children in all ages; and that it was no mercy to be tried, if we yielded to the temptation; for when he is tried, he shewed the Lord took great pleasure in those servants that bore their trials, and came forth like gold: he instanced Job, and the holy prophets and martyrs, and our dear Lord Jesus, who was a tried stone; declaring, That it was a way wherein men were greatly manifested to be heirs of the prepared glory, and that wherein men did as much manifest their love to God as men could be capable to do; yea, it was the way that our Lord took to hold out his love to mankind: And then shewed with great joy of heart, that he was going to follow his dear Lord through Golgotha, and to manifest his love to his Redeemer by shedding his heart's blood for him, and passing that way to the prepared glory, yea, to receive the crown of glory prepared for the Beloved Ones. And when he had ended his discourse, he kneeled down and prayed, and praised the Lord, and was much enlarged, to the comfort and edification of the friends that were with him. After that, he discoursed with much joy and sweetness, and said, That the Lord had granted him the desire of his heart; for he had desired and sought the Lord that he might be so far from being afraid of any amazement, that he might endure the shame with joy when it came, and even long for the coming of the sledge; and he said, he did bless the Lord it was so with him, for he did much long for it before it came.

A little before his going forth, seeing some of his friends come in who had particularly desired to accompany him to the place of Execution, said, "Here comes my bride-men," embracing them with much joy. But, said he, "Must not the sacrifice be bound?" one answered, "Yea, it must be bound with cords," he rejoicing, said, so he had heard.

Soon after the Keeper came into the room, and calling him down to deliver him to the Sheriff, he told him he was a welcome messenger, he had waited long for him; and so he came with joy after the Keeper from his chamber into the Press-Yard, where hearing the noise of the multitude without, said to a friend "There would be by and by as many Hallelujahs, as shoutings of the people without;" and there they bound him about the back with a new cord, and so had him into the street like a sheep to the slaughter; with a sweet smiling countenance he came into the street, where he was a gazing-stock unto the multitude, and so being placed upon the sled, drawn by a team of horses, attended by the Sheriff's men and a company of foot-soldiers, was drawn along to Tyburn; the way out of the town being very foul, he was drawn through very much water and dirt, besides the very much slapping of the horses that went besides him, yet for all this he was born up with much joy and cheerfulness, not at all dismayed or terrified.

Being come to the place of Execution, he asked Mr. Sterling the Sheriff, whether he might not have the liberty to speak to the people. He told him he might, if he would not speak seditiously, (or words to that purpose.) Then John James addressed himself to speak as followeth:

The last SPEECH and PRAYER of JOHN JAMES at Tyburn, immediately before his Execution, November 26, 1661.

First of all, that which I have to say before I go out of this world, is, to remove that which hath been thrown upon me by way of aspersion as if I were a Jesuit.* Here at this place at this time are some that knew me from my childhood, and can clear me in this particular and therefore I shall only say this to it, That I am an Englishman, never was out of the nation in all my life; never had any knowledge of any other tongue but the English tongue, therefore altogether incapable of such work and employment as Jesuits are usually put upon, they being commonly men of great parts and learning, which I am not. I shall only speak this in respect of my parentage and education, I came of a very mean family; I may truly say, as once Gideon did, 'My family is the least in all Manasseh, and I am the least in all the family.' And in truth I may justly say, my family, the family that I came of, it was a very mean family, the meanest amongst all families of the people of the Lord at that day, as I knew of; and for my parents, they were people fearing God, those that durst not for their lives, I say, they were those that durst not for their lives stain their consciences in respect of idolatry and superstition that was up at that day.

* "This Vindication was occasioned by the coming of a Courtier, (and, as some said one of the bed-chamber) two or three nights before he suffered, to know if he was not a Jesuit, and if he had not been beyond the seas."

I shall not need to speak any more to that, I came not here to boast of my parentage; I declare I came of a mean family, only my parents were people fearing God, and did to their utmost, endeavour what they could to bring me up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord; and I hope my father at his death had not ought to be charged with by way of blame: and my mother is yet alive and attained to a good old age, and I trust so she is. But I shall not trouble you more about this matter, for I only speak this, to take off that which was cast upon me, wherein I judged the name of God would have suffered had I not cleared myself.

2. The second thing that I shall say, is, what I am in my principles, what I am in respect of my religion and judgment, and I shall be brief as to that. I do own the title of a Baptized Believer, I do own the Ordinances and Appointments of Jesus Christ, I do own all the principles in Heb. 6. 1. 2. about the doctrine of Faith towards God, and repentance from dead works, the doctrine of Baptisms and laying on of hands, the Resurrection of the dead, and Eternal Judgment. These are the principles that I desire to own, and have in some weak measure been found walking in: I do not only own the principles and doctrines, declared in the sixth of the Hebrews, but I do own the Commandments of God, the Ten Commandments as they are expressed in the 20th of Exodus. I do here, as before the Lord, testify I durst not, I durst not willingly break the least of those Commandments to save my life; I do declare that the rather, because I would inform persons that I do own the Lord's holy Sabbath, the seventh day of the week to be the Lord's Sabbath; you know the Commandment 'Remember that thou keep holy the seventh day.' I shall forbear to speak any more to that.

Again, further, in respect of my principle (as that for which I judge I am here this day to suffer) That I do own the kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ, (to wit) the visible kingdom of Jesus Christ here on earth, and I do desire to declare it humbly and in the fear of the Lord, That Jesus Christ the Son of God is king of all the nations in the world, according to that in Rev. 11. 15. upon the sounding of the seventh trumpet there was a great voice in Heaven, "The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord, and of his Christ; and he shall reign for ever and ever." There needs no more to be said, though many more Scriptures might be brought to prove that it is so. It cannot be a spiritual kingdom, the text cannot be allegorical; for the text saith expressly, (The Kingdoms of this world, &c.) I shall endeavour not to tire you with many words: I do not come here (the Lord knows) to sow sedition, I have it not upon my heart, it hath not been my practice, though this be the pretended cause of bringing me hither; but the Lord knows, before whom I stand, and with whom I shall shortly be, that whatever I am accused of, as to matter of fact, I am free from it; I desire you may hear it, and take notice of it, the things charged upon me are notoriously false, I speak it as my last words, the Lord that knows all hearts, and one day will call all men to an account, knows I speak true, both in respect of the manner of the thing charged upon me, and in respect of the matter, notwithstanding that several witnesses took the boldness to swear it in court. I do in the fear of the Lord also tell you, that I bless the Lord I have not the least hard thought of them that swore against me, I have not the least hard thought upon that account, nor the least rising of spirit against either Judge, Jury, or Witnesses, or any other the Lord knows it, but have sought their pardon upon my bended knees, and I hope further shall do it, if God permit. I have one word to say to the people of God, and that is this; I would entreat you not to think ever the worse of the ways of God, because you see such a poor worm as I brought hither to suffer upon that account, let not the assembling of yourselves together be any way a burden to you; know that word, "Forsoke not the assembling of your selves together, as the manner of some is, but be instructing one another so much the more as you see the day approaching," Heb. 10. 25. and let not any of the ways of God, any of the ordinances of God, any of the commandments of God, be ever the worse in your eyes, because a poor worm that has professed them, and has in some poor measure tasted in them of the love of God, is brought hither, do not think the words and commandments of God are the worse for that; and I would intreat you that you would stick close to them whatever dispensation may be at the door, which no man here knows one or other: but I say, whatever the ways and dispensations of God may be, though you may expect to suffer more and more, yet know that was the way that our Lord did go, the captain of our salvation was made perfect through sufferings; and the Apostles and holy christians of old counted it great joy, they accounted it great joy to be filling up the measure of Christ's sufferings that are behind. And now my dear friends, for Jesus Christ's sake be exhorted in the fear of God, not only to stick to those ordinances and commandments of God, wherein you are enlightened, but take that good word of God, in 1 Chron. 28. 8. it was David's advice to Solomon, the words are, 'Solomon my son, keep and seek for all, &c.' do not content yourselves with what you do already know, but endeavour in the fear of the Lord to be seeking after more. I would further charge every one of the people of the Lord, to have a care of defiling themselves with any idolatry, with any superstition by treading in by-paths that may not suit the mind of God, however it may be accepted in the land.

I shall not trouble you with much more, only a word to those that have not yet an interest in Jesus Christ, that cannot call God father, I beseech such to consider, it may be that God hath a mind by the words of a dying man to do their souls good, and I would add a word; I beseech you consider, though you may not go the same way I go, you do not know how soon God may call for you by death, and therefore I speak to them that are young ones, in the first place, 'That they remember their Creator in the days of their youth, before the evil day is come,' and the days wherein they themselves shall say, 'they have no pleasure in them.' And to those that are ancient, that have spent the greatest part of their time here, in sporting in their own lusts, I would only say this to them, There is yet a day of Grace, 'To day if you will hear his voice.' Jesus Christ is held forth in the Gospel freely, He holds forth his blood freely; for the worst of sinners are not too old, nor too wicked, nor too great, they are not too unclean for Jesus Christ to pity; and therefore friends, consider in the fear of the Lord whereabouts you are, and how the case stands with your poor souls. I have said what I have to say, only I would desire that I might have liberty to wait upon God, to commit my soul and the concerns of each other to the Lord in prayer.

Then he addressed himself to the Lord in prayer, as followeth:

His Prayer.

"Glorious and holy majesty, in whose eyes all the nations of the world are but as the drop of a bucket, or as the small dust of the balance; and therefore O Lord, this mighty concourse of people are nothing in thy sight. Thy eyes are open to the ways of thy people, and thy ears are open to their cries, and thou wilt one day shew thyself strong in the behalf of them that fear thee, whose hearts are upright towards thee. Sweet Father! blessed be thy holy and dear name, that such a poor worm as is before thee can call thee Father, that such a poor worm before thee can come and take hold of thee through thy dear Son. O Lord, O Lord, what am I, or what was my father's house, that thou hast brought me hitherto? and, ah Lord, this has been but a small thing in thine eyes, but thou hast spoken thy servants welfare for a while to come, even to all eternity. Dear Lord, in the audience of this people, thy poor worm cannot but bless thee that ever thou didst call him, and ever became acquainted with his soul, that ever thou wert pleased to engage his soul to walk before thee in thine own paths; and, blessed be thy holy name, thy paths do not seem in the eyes of thy servants to be ever the worse because of this thing, but thine can bless thee, thine can rejoice before thee, thine can say, bless the Lord, O my soul, all that is within me bless his holy name. And blessed be thy holy name that thou hast been pleased to keep the soul of thy poor servant hitherto; and blessed be the Lord, that though thy poor servant doth suffer in the account of the greatest part of this people as an evil-doer, yet it is not so; yea, blessed be thy name, thy poor worm can approve his heart to thee now at the very giving up of the ghost, that he is not guilty, that he is not guilty in respect of the things that have been by ungodly men witnessed against him: sweet and dear Father, thy poor worm can now lift up his face with much boldness to thee, and is assured that he whom man hath judged, God hath justified: and now for thy dear name sake give thy poor worm leave, in integrity and godly simplicity to beg one request at thy hands for the poor witnesses; O Lord for the very thing that they have done, O that thou wouldest pardon them, O that thou wouldest pardon them, O that thou wouldest shew them as much grace as thou hast done to thy poor worm: and that thou wouldest please, that as they have done their utmost to wash their hands in the blood of thy servant, let their souls be washed thoroughly in the blood of Jesus Christ; for thy tender mercies sake be pleased to deal graciously with every one, if it be thy blessed will, that have had a hand against thy servant, from the least to the greatest, from the first to the last. And Father, O that thou wouldest be pleased to look upon the poor executioner, which is to destroy thy servant and take him out of the world; O Lord, thou knowest the soul of thy servant has not the least rising against him; that thou wouldest be pleased, if it may stand with thy glory, and if he be within the line of the covenant of grace, that thou wouldest wash his soul in the blood of Jesus Christ. O how eminently didst thou please in times past to work upon some of those that were the executioners of thy people in the Marian days, &c. this work is not too hard for thee, thou canst work upon him, thou canst make him as chosen a vessel of thy glory as ever was in the world; O Lord, if it be thy will, that thou wouldest do it, if it be thy will, O that thou wouldest do it. And for thy dear name's sake remember all thy people in this land; Lord remember all thy people in Scotland, and in Ireland, and all thy people up and down the countries; O Lord, thou hast a remnant that fear thy name, thou hast a remnant that fear thy name in truth, good Lord keep their hearts close to thee, fit them for any trial, for any hard dispensation that may be coming upon them. Sweet and dear Father, cement thy people, let thy people's hearts be one; Lord, remove those controversies, Lord close up all those divisions, Lord grant there may be no more rending among thy people; O Lord, what differences there may be among thy people in respect of some circumstances in matters of religion, I beseech thee for Jesus Christ his sake that thou wouldest be pleased to knit their souls as one, O Lord, knit their souls as one, that there may be more love, and more peace, and more unity, and more universal agreement among thy own people. And sweet Lord, remember our dear king, our righteous Redeemer; O that thou wouldest be pleased according to thy word, to give him the heathen for his inheritance, and the utmost parts of the earth for his possession; and let his dominions be from sea to sea, and from river to river; and let those that dwell in Sion rejoice before him, and let his enemies be brought under the soles of his feet; and set him, precious Father, upon thy holy hill of Sion, and hasten thy work in order to his exaltation; cut it short in righteousness, for a short work thou hast said thou wilt make upon the earth. And be thou pleased for thy name sake to think upon this concourse of people that are come to this place this day, and be thou pleased to set home to their souls with much power, what hath been spoken and delivered by a poor weak instrument; let no soul come hither this day in vain, but let it be a day wherein thy own people may get much strength to serve thee in any further work they may be called to; and let it be a day wherein those that have not yet the knowledge of thee, those that are enemies, those that are aliens to the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers to the covenant of promise, let it be a day wherein their souls may come acquainted with thee; let it be a day of exercising much power and much favour, and much grace to the souls of those that shall be lookers on, that shall be spectators upon thy poor worm this day. And now, sweet majesty, for thy name sake think upon thy poor worm; thou knowest, thou knowest O Lord, how it is with him, upon what account he is brought hither, the Lord knows it is not so: Father, wilt thou be pleased from some eminent token from thyself to clear up the innocency of thy servant, in respect of the things charged upon him; and keep now the soul of thy servant upright with thee this little moment that he has to live in this world. And dear Father, O give thy poor worm strength enough to encounter with the king of Terrors; blessed be God that thou hast been so kind to thy poor worm all the way from Newgate hither; and sweeten to his soul all that thy poor creature has been tasting of, and what thy poor one is entering into; let him know what it is to enjoy those mansions that our sweet Lord went to prepare; and indeed and in truth let thy poor worm know what it is to be a child, what it is to be an heir, what it is to be a co-heir with Jesus Christ: O that thou wouldst please to give some sweet taste of thy holy spirit to thy poor worm, whereby his soul, whilst in this world, whilst in this place, might be well satisfied, and more strongly assured than ever, that he is coming to thee: blessed be God, blessed be God, thy poor worm knows he is thine, thy poor worm knows he is thine. And now dear and tender Father, think upon thy poor worm, think upon the trial that at present is upon him; and as trials and tribulations abound for Christ, so let all grace and consolation abound by Christ: and dear God, in the very passage be then pleased to sweeten to my soul the very passage; let not the instruments of cruelty that are provided to destroy thy poor worm any way scare him, but let there be such an open door into the glory thou hast provided for thy poor creature, that thy poor one may know it all the time his body is in the hands of men; and make the passage very easy and let thy poor servant see by faith an innumerable company of angels ascending and descending to convey my soul into Abraham's bosom; Father, let thy servant see that there are as many angels ready to attend and receive the soul of thy servant as people here to look upon him. And now sweet Father, for thy dear name sake hear what has been spoken here, hear what has been spoken by thy poor worm, and be thou pleased to be far more gracious than what thy poor creature is able to beg of thee; and all upon the account of thy dear Son, the Saviour and Redeemer of thy poor worm, to whom he is coming to live with to all eternity? to whom be glory and praise, power, dominion, and the kingdom, this day and for evermore."

After this he said he could not speak more, being very much tired, and his body brought very low. The hangman said 'The Lord receive your soul.' He replied, 'I thank you.' Then another said, 'This is a happy day.' He said, 'I bless the Lord it is so.' The other said, 'The Lord make your passage easy.' He said, 'I trust he will so.' One asked if he had any thing to say to the sheriff? He said 'No, but only thank him for his civility.' Then the hangman having prepared him for his death, drew away the cart, John James said aloud, lifting up his hands, 'Father into thy hands I commit my spirit,' and so finished his course.

The sheriff and hangman were so civil to him in his execution, as to suffer him to be dead before he was cut down; the hangman taking out his heart, and burning his members and intrails, returned his head and quarters back to Newgate, put in a basket in a cart, and from thence were disposed by the king, (viz.) his quarters to the gates of the city, and his head first upon the bridge, but afterwards, by appointment, taken down thence, and put upon a pole in White-Chapel, over against the passage to the meeting-place, where he and his company were apprehended.*

* The following passages of "An Historical Account of all the Trials and Attainders of High Treason from the beginning of the Reign of king Charles the First, &c." throw some light on this Case of John James: "The excess of mercy shewn by king Charles 2, at his Restoration, was a great encouragement to that immense multitude of hardened rebels the nation swarmed with, to proceed in their vile practices. The first that broke out, were a pack of wild enthusiasts, so besotted with their bellish notions, that they conceived a handful of them sufficient to overwhelm and embroil the whole nation. These were the Millenaries, or Fifth-Monarchy Men, who, notwithstanding

A Relation of the Arraignment and Trial of those who made the late Rebellious Insurrections in London. 1661.

[From the Third Collection of Somers' Tracts, Vol. 4, p. 520.]

WE shall here give you the Arraignment and Trial of those bloody fanatics, who brake forth into open rebellion on January the 6th and 9th last (we cannot forget the time, for the one was the day when the Regicides at Westminster passed their Ordinance for the Trial of our glorious sovereign king Charles the 1st; the other was the day when they proclaimed their High Court of Justice for that monstrous Trial,) which without troubling you with their

the prime heads of them, as colonel Overton, cornet Day, major Allen, Courtney, &c. had been before seized upon suspicion, still persisted in their wicked designs, which they attempted to put in execution in January 1661, as follows.

"On Sunday, January 6, 1661, these monsters assembled at their Meeting-house in Coleman-street, where they armed themselves, and sallying thence, came to St. Paul's in the dusk of the evening, and there, after ordering their small party, placed sentinels, one of whom killed a person accidentally passing by, because he said he was for God and king Charles, when challenged by him. This giving the alarm, and some parties of Trained-Bands charging them, and being repulsed, they marched to Bishopsgate, thence to Cripplegate and Aldersgate, where going out, in spite of the constables and watch, they declared for king Jesus. Proceeding to Beech-lane, they killed an headborough, who would have opposed them. It was observed, that all they shot, though never so slightly wounded, dyed. Then they hasted away to Cane Wood, where they lurked, resolved to make another effort upon the city, but were drove thence, and routed by a party of horse and foot, sent for that purpose, about 30 being taken, and brought before general Monk, who committed them to the Gate-house.

"Nevertheless, the others, who had escaped out of the wood, returned to London, not doubting of success in their enterprize; Venner, a wine-cooper by trade, and their head, affirming, 'he was assured, that no weapons employed against them, would prosper, nor a hair of their heads be touched;' which their coming off at first so well, made them willing to believe. These fellows had taken the opportunity of the king's being gone to Portsmouth, having before made a disposition for drawing to them of other desperate rebels, by publishing a Declaration, called, 'A Door of Hope opened,' full of abominable slanders against the whole royal family.

"On Wednesday morning, January 9, after the watches and guards were dismissed, they reassumed their first enterprize. Their first appearance was in Threadneedle-street, where they alarmed the Trained-Bands upon duty that day, and drove back a party sent after them, to their main guard, which then marching in a body towards them, the Fifth Monarchists retired into Bishopsgate-street, where some of them took into an ale-house, known by the sign of the Helmet, where after a sharp dispute, two were killed, and as many taken, the same number of the Trained Bands being killed and wounded. The next sight of them, (for they vanished, and appeared again on a sudden) was at College-Hill, which way they went up into Cheapside, and so into Woodstreet, Venner leading them, with a murrion on his head, and a halbert in his hand. Here was the main and hottest action, for they fought stoutly with the Trained-Bands, and received a charge from the life-guards, whom they obliged to give way, until being over-powered, and Venner knocked down, and wounded with shot, Tufney and Crag, two others of their chief teachers, being killed by him, they began to give ground, and soon after dispersed, flying out-right, and taking several ways. The greatest part of them went down Woodstreet to Cripplegate, firing in the rear at the yellow Trained-Bands, then in close pursuit of them. Ten of them took into the Blue-Anchor ale-house, near the Postern, which house they maintained until lieutenant-colonel Cox, with his company, secured all the avenues to it. In the mean time, some of the aforesaid yellow-Trained-Bands got upon the tiles of the next house, which they threw off, and fired in upon the rebels, who were in the upper room, and even then refused quarter. At the same time another file of musketeers got up the stairs, and having shot down the door, entered upon them. Six of them were killed before, another wounded, and one refusing quarter, was knocked down, and afterwards shot. The others being asked why they had not begged quarter before, answered, they durst not, for fear their own fellows should shoot them. Such was their resolution, or enthusiastic madness.

"The whole number in this last attempt, does not appear to have been above 50 persons, though not above 40 were ever seen together; yet so great was their confidence in the pretended-revelations of their teachers, that al-repeated impertinencies and contradictions, which longer narratives are too often full of, was briefly thus :

On Thursday, January 17, twenty of the prisoners taken in arms were arraigned together at Justice Hall in the Old Bailey, the rest being dangerously wounded, were put off by the Court for a future trial. These twenty arraign-luding to the history of Gideon in holy writ, they questioned not, with that small remnant that could lap, to subdue and conquer all the rest, designing to allow none but such Quakers as agreed with them in their millenary notions, as nearest to their sort of enthusiasm, the honour of partaking with them in this their great and glorious design, as they termed it, in their aforesaid declaration, wherein they farther blasphemously said, 'That if they were deceived, or misled, it was God that deceived 'them;' laying their delusions, and charging their wicked and desperate folly on him, as the author of it.

"In this vile insurrection, were slain 22 of the king's men, and as many of the traitors, most of them in houses, and some others taken prisoners, were afterwards shot for refusing to tell their names. There were 20 taken, besides some few upon suspicion; the 20 were as follows, viz. Thomas Venner, the wine-cooper, their captain; Roger Hodgkins, a button-seller, in St. Clement's-Lane, Lombard-street; Leonard Gowler, Jonas Allen, John Pym, William Orsingham, William Ashton, Giles Pritchard, a cow-keeper, Stephen Fall, John Smith, William Cocket, John Dod, John Eleston, Thomas Harris, John Gardener, Robert Bradley, Richard Marten, John Patshal, Robert Hopkins, and John Wells, five of whom had been formerly in a design against Oliver Cromwell.

"These were all brought to their trials together; the wounded men had chairs allowed them, and their indictment was for High-Treason and Murder.

"Thomas Venner was first called, who, when he had held up his hand at his arraignment, being asked, Guilty, or Not Guilty, began a wild fanatic discourse about his conversation in New-England, and concerning the Fifth-Monarchy, and the Testimony within him for above twenty years, with such like impertinent ramble. He confessed he had been in the late rising, but was not guilty of treason, intending not to levy war against the king; and then sallied out into nonsensical pleas, as at first: But the Court pressing him to plead directly to the indictment, he answered, Not Guilty, and put himself upon his country.

"In like manner Hodgkins, after some rambling from the business in hand, and the Court's threatening to record him mute, pleaded to the indictment; the rest of his fellows submitting, after some previous excursions in their frantic way. The witnesses being then sworn, two against every particular person, made it appear, that Venner, Tufney, and Crag, the two last whereof been slain in the action, did several times persuade their congregation to take up arms for king Jesus, against the powers of the earth, which were his majesty, the duke of York, and the general; that they were to kill all that opposed them; that they had been praying and preaching, but not acting for God; that they armed themselves at their meeting-house in Coleman-Street, with blunderbusses, muskets, &c. besides other particular evidence against each of them to matter of fact. The proof against Martin, Hopkins, and Wells, was not so full as against the others, and against Patshal there was but one witness, whereupon they were acquitted by the jury. The other 16 being found Guilty, and brought to the bar, were required to shew cause why judgment should not be given against them, &c. The Lord Chief Justice Foster charging Venner with the blood of his accomplices, by seducing and leading them, he answered, He did not. To which, the witnesses being produced again, he blasphemously quibbled and said, It was not he, but Jesus, that led them. Three of them confessed their crime and error, and begged mercy. All the 16 were condemned to be drawn, hanged, and quartered.

"According to which Sentence on Saturday, January 1667-8, Venner and Hodgkins, both uncured of the wounds they had received in their rebellion, being guarded by two companies of the trained-bands, were drawn on a sledge from Newgate through Cheapside, over against their meeting-house in Swan-alley in Coleman-Street, and there executed. Venner spoke little, and that in vindication of himself and his fact, and something of his opinion, being confident 'the time was at hand, when 'other judgment would be;' and reflecting much upon the government. Hodgkins raved and cursed by way of praying, 'calling down, 'vengeance from heaven upon the king, the 'judges, and the city of London;' nor would he give over, though forbid by the Sheriff, till the hangman was hastened from his employment of quartering Venner, to turn him off. Thus they died in the same mad religion they had lived. Their quarters were set upon the four Gates of the City, by the late executed Regicides, whose quarrel and revenge they had undertaken in this their fanatic attempt. Their heads were also set upon poles, by some of the others, on London-Bridge.

"On Monday the 21st of the same January, nine more of them were executed, all in one morning, at five several places, by the same executioner; two at the West-end of St. Pauls, two at the Bull and Mouth, two at Beech-Lane, two at the Royal-Exchange, and the last, Leonard Gowler, a notable fellow, at Bishops-gate. They all obstinately persisted in their villainy, especially the last, who began with imprecations, like Hodgkins, and was silenced the same way, by the command of the Sheriff. Only one young man, who was hanged in Red-cross-Street, did repent of his sin, and the blood he had spilt; but yet died in his opinion of ley are there alive.) And Venner could not deny he was Guilty of the late rising, but not, forsooth, of treason, intending not to levy war against the king (as if to murder both king and subject were no treason, and to destroy their own and all Christian monarchs by open force, were no levying war against the king.) Afterwards he confessed, he was partly Guilty, and partly not: But being pressed by the Court to give his positive answer, whether he was Guilty in manner and form of the Indictment, he answered, Not Guilty, and at last submitted to a trial by God and the country.

The next was Roger Hodgkin, who said, He had not heard the Indictment; whereupon the Court caused it to be read a second time, and being asked Guilty or Not Guilty, he answered, I am Guilty of no Treason, Not Guilty; and said, he would be tried by the laws of God, whereupon the Court told him, if he would not plead, he must be recorded as a Mute.

Leonard Gowler readily answered, Not Guilty, and that he would be tried by the laws of God and the country.

Jonas Allen said, He had confessed before, but if he must, he would say, Not Guilty, and that he would be tried by the laws of God, but after said by God and the country.

John Pym said, he was Not Guilty, and that he would be tried by God and the country.

William Oxman answered, Not Guilty, and that he would be tried by the laws of God and holy men; but being informed that that was no legal answer, he said, by God and the country.

Giles Pritchard said, he disowned the manner and form; that he was Not Guilty, and would be tried by the Lord of Hosts (and so he is sure to be) but being pressed to give his answer, he said, by God and the country.

The rest, viz. William Ashton, Stephen Fall, John Smith, William Corbet, John Dod, John Elston, Thomas Harris, John Gardner, Robert Brierly, Richard Martin, John Patshall, and Robert Hopkins having heard what others had done, did not put the Court to much trouble, but answered severally, Not Guilty, and that they would be tried by God and the country; so did John Wells, who confessed he was Guilty of many sins before the Lord, and that he would be tried by God and the country.

Roger Hodgkin, who before, as we told you, had shewn so much obstinacy, was now again asked, Whether Guilty or Not Guilty, and how he would be tried? whereupon he followed the examples of his brethren, and answered in form accordingly.

The Jury was now called, and the prisoners informed by the Court of the right they had as Englishmen, to challenge each of them 55 Jurors without giving reason, and more if they shewed cause: But they saw so little exception in the looks of the Jurors, that they excepted against none of them.

The Jury sworn, the witnesses were produced, who made it appear, That at the Meeting-house in Swan-alley in Coleman-street, Venner, Tufnay, and Cragg (which two latter Chilianism. When cut down, the sentence was not executed on them to the full; but only their heads cut off, and set upon London-Bridge.

"This same year, one John James, a small-coal-man by trade, and a Fifth-Monarchy-Man, who had been concerned in Venner's business, but happened to be absent, or made his escape the last day they broke out, but had not shaken off his villainous designs, but continued his meetings and conventicles, with others of that desperate crew, among whom, he was a great Rabby, or teacher, took the liberty of launching out into many traitorous speeches, and malicious invectives against the king's person, government, and family, which relished much of the design couched in Venner's declaration. Having been overheard by some neighbours, living near the conventicle, James was seized, and carried before a justice, who committed him to Newgate, whence, in Michaelmas-Term, he was brought to the King's-Bench bar at Westminster, where the words were proved against him, and he convicted, and condemned as a traitor.

"On the 27th of October he was drawn on a sledge to Tyburn, some of his pernicious sect throwing themselves into his sledge, and embracing him, so fond were they of that silly, though bold, seducer. At the gallows he denied the words; but owned and avowed his Chilianism, and the personal reign of Christ, on which account he prayed not for the king, or any authority; but made an end with the usual confidence of his party. His quarters were disposed of by his majesty's orders, and his head set upon a pole at Whitechapel, near the place of his meeting, for an example to his fellows."

were slain in this rebellion) did several times persuade their congregation to take up arms for king Jesus, against the powers of the earth, (which were the king, the duke of York, and the general). That they were to kill all that opposed them, that they had been praying and preaching, but not acting for God. That divers armed themselves at the Meeting-house in Coleman-street, with musquets, blunderbusses, pistols, buck, breast, and head-piece, with powder and bullet, and other warlike weapons: That in the streets they cried out against the king, and said, they would fetch out the Lord Mayor of London: That Venner and Pritchard were the chief that led them in their engagement. That on Sunday, Jan. 6, they went to St. Paul's, where they broke open a door, but not thinking it a place of safety they went thence. That they fled to St. John's Wood, where they reported they had made an uproar in London, and came thither for safety, That thence they went to Cane Wood, That on Wednesday, Jan. 9, Venner was at the head of a party in Wood-street, with an halbert in his hand, wherewith he struck and (with the rest of the company) killed three men there, That Venner went with a party to the Compter-gate, and demanded of them to turn out the prisoners or else they were dead men; That Corbet being apprehended confessed he was with them, That Elston, being taken by the constable, had in his pocket a pistol loaded with a steel slug, and confessed he had been in Wood-street; That Gardner said, he had been at the killing of three men in Wood-street; That Venner, Hodgkin, Gowler, Allen, Pym, Oxman, Ashton, Pritchard, Hall, Smith, Corbet, Dod, Elston, Harris and Gardner, were all in arms, and that Brierly went with them to Cane-Wood, and was taken with several bullets about him on Wednesday morning coming home. The evidence against Martin, Hopkins, and Wells was not so full; and against Patshal, only one witness, That he went with them in arms from Coleman-street, but was taken that night without arms.

That Evidence being heard, the Court asked the prisoners at the bar, what they had to say for themselves: Venner confessed himself in the insurrection, but said, He did not lead them, and when the witnesses positively swore it, he excused it, and said, it was not he, but Jesus led them; That he could not deny but that most of the things witnessed against him were true, yet pleaded that he could not commit Treason because the king was not yet crowned: But being told by the Court that every Englishman knows the king never dies, and that that opinion of his was first started by Watson the Jesuit, and long since condemned, he pressed it no farther.

Hodgkin, Gowler, Allen, Pym, Oxman, Ashton, Pritchard, Fall, Smith, Corbet, Dod, Elston, Harris and Gardner, seeing the Evidence so clear against them, confessed that they were in arms in the insurrection. Brierly denied it, and said, That he was called up, and went with them, but was not in arms. Martin and Hopkins denied they were in arms. Patshal said, he was taken without arms, and ought not to answer against himself.

Wells said, that Venner called him out in the morning, and bid him take arms to save his throat from cutting, that he was suddenly surprised in his spirit, and went along with them with his sword and pistol to Wood-street, but that his heart was not with them, that with the first opportunity he flung down his arms and ran away, and that he took great shame upon him. The Lord Chief Justice Foster asked him, Whether he took shame upon him for engaging with rebels, or for running away? He said, it was because he had gone so far with them.

This is the substance of all the prisoners answered for themselves: which done, the Lord Chief Justice Foster gave his directions to the jury, telling them of the natural allegiance due to our sovereign lord the king, That no war could be raised without the king's commission and consent, and that any war without such commission was against the king, That to prove treason there must be two witnesses (without the parties confession) with many other material particulars necessary for the jury's information in this case, which his lordship then delivered, wherewith the jury at going forth seemed highly satisfied. After which the Court adjourned till three o'clock that afternoon.

When the Court returned, the jury brought in their verdict, whereby they found Thomas Venner, Roger Hodgkins, Leonard Gowler, Jonas Allen, John Pym, William Oxman, William Ashton, Giles Pritchard, Stephen Fall, John Smith, William Corbet, John Dod, John Elston, Thomas Harris, John Gardner, and Robert Brierly, guilty of the matters charged against them in the indictment; and acquitted Richard Martin, John Patshal, Robert Hopkins, and John Wells.

Whereupon Pym said, he was sorry for what he had done. Smith desired the mercy of the Bench. Corbet said, he knew not what he did, and begged the mercy of the Bench. And Brierly prayed that God would put it into the king's heart to pardon him.

But no cause being shewn by the prisoners why sentence should not be given against them, the Lord Chief Justice Foster made an excellent short material speech to let them see their condition, how highly they had offended God, their king, and country; what a vast measure of pride for so few to attempt to destroy so many; and how ungratefully to so merciful a king that had granted them so much liberty; particularly telling Venner, that he was not only an actor in so wicked a design, but a seducer of those silly men whose blood would lie upon him: After which (and divers other seasonable passages) his lordship pronounced sentence upon as many as the jury had brought in Guilty, to be drawn, hanged, and quartered, &c.

Yet his majesty hath been graciously pleased to pardon part of the sentence; for only two were ordered to be quartered (which were Venner and Hodgkin) who accordingly were executed before their meeting-house in Coleman-street this day, Jan. 9, (it is the very day, 1648, that the worthy Lord Mayor sir Richard Brown (whom these rebels would now have murdered) was sent prisoner for his loyalty to Windsor castle) the rest are to be hanged only and beheaded, whereof two (viz. Oxman and Pritchard) were so executed at Wood-street end the same day. Others must suffer, some before the Old Exchange, some in Redcross and in Whitecross-streets, and other places in the City of London. Two (viz. Pym and Brierly) are for some time reprieved.* Somers' Tracts.

The following is Burnet's Account of Venner's Tumult and its consequences:

"The king had not been many days at Whitehall, when one Venner, a violent fifth monarchy man, who thought it was not enough to believe that Christ was to reign on earth,

* The wild conduct of these crazy people seems to have given occasion to real or pretended apprehensions of alarming and extensive conspiracies. On Nov. 21, 1661, the Lords received a Message from the Commons by Mr. Secretary Morrice to let them know, "That the House of Commons have intelligence that divers male-contents, fanatics, cashiered and disbanded officers and soldiers, and others, have some design amongst them tending to the breach of the peace of this kingdom; therefore they desire their lordships would join with them, to move his majesty that he would please to issue out a Proclamation, that all suspicious and loose persons may be forthwith sent out of these towns of London and Westminster, and the liberties thereof, for some time." And on the 19th of December, The Lord Chancellor acquainted the Lords, "That he had a Message to deliver from the king; which was, to let them know, that besides the apprehensions and fears that are generally abroad, his majesty hath received Letters from several parts of the kingdom, and also by intercepted letters it does appear, that divers discontented persons are endeavouring to raise new troubles, to the disturbance of the peace of the kingdom, as in many particulars was instanced: which matter being of so great consequence, his majesty's desire is, That the House of Commons may be made acquainted with it, that so his majesty may receive the advice and counsel of both houses of parliament what is fit to be done herein; and to think of some proper remedy to secure the peace of the kingdom."—Upon this, a joint Committee of both Houses was appointed to sit, notwithstanding the usual recess at Christmas, in order to make discoveries, and prepare a Report against the next meeting; the substance of which, is delivered by the Lord Chancellor Clarendon and to put the saints in the possession of the kingdom, (an opinion that they were all unpeepably fond of,) but added to this, that the saints were to take the kingdom themselves. He gathered some of the most furious of the party to a meeting in Coleman Street. There was as follows:—"That there was found with salomon a list of 160 officers of the late army: but it was further discovered that there should have been a meeting in London about the 10th of December, and that they intended about the end of January to have made sure of Shrewsbury, Coventry, and Bristol, and that they should rise in several parts at once: that where they were prevalent they should begin with assassination, which moved one of them to relate, 'That some of the late king's judges were entertained in France, Holland and Germany, and held constant correspondence with those, and were fomented by some foreign princes.' That many arms were brought in order to this design, and that they bragged, 'If they once got footing, they should not want means to carry on their work.' That they were discovered by one of their party, and his relation confirmed by such intelligence from abroad, as never failed." He further told them, "That at Huntington many there met under the name of Quakers, that were not so; and rode there in multitudes by night, to the great terror of his majesty's good subjects. That it might be wondered at that some proposals were not made to remedy this impending evil: but the king had advised with the duke of Albemarle, now present at this committee, and has put two troops into Shrewsbury, and as many into Coventry; who by the way, have broken a great knot of thieves, and taken 20. That a rumour was spread, that the appointing of this committee was only a plot to govern by an army; but the committee was very sensible of the real danger, and hoped the Houses would be so too; and that since all their adversaries were united to destroy them, so they should unite to preserve themselves." [See 4 Colib. Parl. Hist. 224, and 226.] Mr. Hatsell (3 Precedents 34,) observes, That though the Report as entered on the Lords' Journals, is very short, there is in Toland's Life of Harrington, as cited in the Biog. Britan. another account said to be given by Lord Chancellor Clarendon at the joint Committee of Lords and Commons: It is as follows:

"That one and twenty persons were the chief managers of it; that they met in Bow-street Covent Garden, in St. Martin's-le-Grand, at the Mill-bank, and in other places; and that they were of seven different parties or interests, as, three for the Common-wealth, three for the Long Parliament, three for the City, three for the Purchasers, three for the Disbanded Army, three for the Independents, and three for the Fifth Monarchy-Men. That their first consideration was how to agree on the choice of Parliament-men against the ensuing session; and that special care ought to be they concerted the day and the manner of their rising to set Christ on his throne, as they called it. But withal, they meant to manage the government in his name; and were so formal, that they had prepared standards and colours with their devices on them, and furnished themselves with very good arms. But when the day came, there was but a small appearance, not exceeding twenty. However they resolved to venture out into the streets and cry out, No king but Christ. Some of them seemed persuaded that Christ would come down and head them. They scoured the streets before them, and made a great progress. Some were afraid ‘had about members for the city of London, as a precedent for the rest of the kingdom to follow, whereupon they nominated the four members after chosen, and then sitting in parliament, but three of these being then present stood up and cleared themselves of this aspersion. Their next care was to frame a Petition to the parliament for a preaching ministry, and liberty of conscience. Then they were to divide and subdivide themselves into several councils and committees, for the better carrying on their business by themselves or their agents and accomplices all over the kingdom. In these meetings Harrington was said to be often in the chair: that they had taken an oath of secrecy, and concerted measures for levying men and money.’ The Chancellor added, that though he had certain information of the times and places of their meetings, and particularly these of Harrington and Wildman, they were nevertheless so fixed in their nefarious design, that none of those they had taken would confess any thing, not so much as that they had seen or spoken to one another at these times or places: which obstinacy he thought must needs proceed from a faithfulness to their oath.

Toland tells us, that upon Harrington’s imprisonment one of his sisters threw herself at the king’s feet, and pressed that her brother might be examined before his majesty or be brought to a speedy trial, and that shortly afterwards, lord Lauderdale, sir George Carteret and sir Edward Walker were sent to the Tower to question him, and that he found means to transmit to his sisters a copy of his Examination; which Toland publishes as follows:

THE EXAMINATION OF JAMES HARRINGTON, taken in the Tower of London, by the Earl of Lauderdale, sir George Carteret, and sir Edward Walker.

Lord Lauderdale. Sir, I have heretofore accounted it an honour to be your kinsman, but am now sorry to see you upon this occasion; very sorry, I assure you.

Harrington. My lord, seeing this is an occasion, I am glad to see you upon this occasion—When he had said this, the Commissioners sat down, and Mr. Harrington standing before them, the Earl began in the following manner.

L. Sir, the king thinks it strange that you, who have so eminently appeared in principles contrary to his majesty’s government, and the laws of this nation, should ever since he came over live so quiet and unmolested, and yet should be so ungrateful. Were you disturbed? Were you so much as affronted that you should enter into such desperate practices?

H. My lord, when I know why this is said I shall know what to say.

L. Well then, without any longer preamble, will you answer me ingenuously, and as you are a gentleman, to what I have to propose.

H. My lord, I value the asseveration, ‘as I am a gentleman,’ as high as any man; but think it an asseveration too low upon this occasion; wherefore, with your leave, I shall make use of some greater asseveration.

L. For that do as you see good: Do you know Mr. Wildman?

H. My lord, I have some acquaintance with him.

L. When did you see him?

H. My lord, he and I have not been in one house together these two years.

L. Will you say so?

H. Yes, my lord.

L. Where did you see him last?

H. About a year ago I met him in a street that goes to Drury Lane.

L. Did you go into no house?

H. No, my lord.

Sir George Carteret. That’s strange!

L. Come, this will do you no good: Had not you, in March last, meetings with him in Bow-street, in Covent Garden? where there were about twenty more of you, where you made a speech about half an hour long, that they should lay by distinguishing names, and betake themselves together into one work, which was to dissolve this parliament and bring in a new one, or the old one again. Was not this meeting adjourned from thence to the Mill-bank? Were not you there also?

H. My lord, you may think, if these things be true, I have no refuge, but to the mercy of God, and of the king.

L. True.

H. Well then, my lord, solemnly and deliberately, with my eyes to Heaven, I renounce the mercy of God and the king, if any of this be true, or if ever I thought or heard of this till now that you tell it me.

Sir G. Carteret. This is strange!

L. Do you know Burebounes?

H. Yes, my lord.

L. When did you see him?

H. I think that I have called at his house or shop thrice in my life.

L. Had you never any meetings with him since the king came over?

H. No, my lord.

Sir G. Carteret. This is strange!

L. Do you know Mr. Neville?

H. Very well, my lord.

and all were amazed at this piece of extravagance. They killed a great many, but were at last mastered by numbers; and were all either killed or taken and executed. Upon this some troops of guards were raised. And there was a great talk of a design, as soon as the army was disbanded, to raise a force that should be so chosen, and modelled, that the king might depend upon it; and that it should be so considerable, that there might be no reason to apprehend new tumults any more. The earl of Southampton looked on a while: And when he

L. When did you see him?

H. My lord, I seldom used to visit him; but when he was in town, he used to see me at my house every evening, as duly almost as the day went over his head.

L. Were you not with him at some public meetings?

H. My lord, the publickest meeting I have been with him at, was at dinner at his own lodging, where I met sir Bernard Gascoigne, and, I think col. Legge.

Sir Edward Walker. They were good safe company.

L. What time was it?

H. In venison time, I am sure, for we had a good venison pasty.

L. Do you know one Portman?

H. No, my lord, I never heard of his name before.

Sir G. Carteret. This is strange!

L. Come, deal ingenuously; you had better confess the things?

H. My lord, you do not look upon me; (for I saw he did not firmly) I pray look upon me. Do you not know an innocent face from a guilty one? Come, you do, my lord; every one does. My Lords, you are great men; you come from the king; you are the messengers of death.

L. Is that a small matter? (at which his lordship gave a shrug.)

H. If I be a malefactor, I am no old malefactor: why am not I pale? why do not I tremble? why does not my tongue falter? why have you not taken me tripping? My lord, these are unavoidable symptoms of guilt. Do you find any such thing in me?

L. No, (which he spoke with a kind of amazement,) and then added, I have said all that I think I have to say.

H. My lord, but I have not.

L. Come, then.

H. This plainly is a practice, a wicked practice, a practice for innocent blood; and as weak a one as it is wicked. Ah, my lord, if you had taken half the pains to examine the guilty, that you have done to examine the innocent, you had found it; it could not have escaped you. Now, my lord, consider if this be a practice, what kind of persons you are that are thus far made instrumental in the hands of wicked men. Nay, whither will wickedness go? Is not the king's authority (which should be sacred) made instrumental? My lord, for your own sake, the king's sake, for the Lord's sake, let such villainies be found out and punished.—At this, lord Lauderdale appearing to be somewhat out of countenance, rose up, and fumbling with his hand upon the table, said:

L. Why, if it be as you say, they deserve punishment enough; but otherwise, look, it will come severely upon you.

H. My lord, I accepted of that condition before.

L. Come, Mr. Vice-Chamberlain, it is late.

H. My lord, now if I might I could answer the preamble.

L. Come, say: so he sat down again.

H. My lord, in the preamble you charge me with being eminent in principles contrary to the king's government, and the laws of this nation. Some, my lord, have aggravated this, saying, that "I being a private man, have been so mad as to meddle with politics: what had a private man to do with government?" My lord, there is not any public man, nor any magistrate, that has written in the politics worth a button. All they that have been excellent in this way, have been private men, as private men, my lord, as myself. There is Plato, there is Aristotle, there is Livy, there is Machiavel. My lord, I can sum up Aristotle's Politics in a very few words: he says, There is the barbarous monarchy, (such a one where the people have no votes in making the laws;) he says, There is the heroic monarchy, (such a one where the people have their votes in making the laws;) and then he says, There is Democracy; and affirms, that a man cannot be said to have liberty, but in a Democracy only.

Lord Lauderdale, who had hitherto been very attentive, at this shewed some impatience.

H. I say, Aristotle says so, I have not said so much. And under what prince was it? Was it not under Alexander, the greatest prince then in the world? I beseech you, my lord, did Alexander hang up Aristotle? Did he molest him? Livy, for a commonwealth, is one of the fullest authors; did not he write under Augustus Cæsar? Did Cæsar hang up Livy? Did he molest him? Machiavel, what a commonwealthsman was he? but he wrote under the Medici, when there were princes in Florence; did they hang up Machiavel, or did they molest him? I have done no otherwise than as the greatest politicians: the king will do no otherwise than as the greatest princes. But, my lord, these authors had not that to say for themselves that I have, I did not write under a prince; I wrote under a Usurper, Oliver. He having started up into the throne, his officers (as pretending to be for a Commonwealth) kept a murmuring, at which he told them, that he knew not what they meant, nor themselves; but let any of them shew him what they meant by a Commonwealth, (or that there was any such thing) they should see that he sought not himself: the Lord knew he sought not himself, but to make good the and how this design seemed to be entertained and magnified, he entered into a very free expostulation with the earl of Clarendon about it. He said, they had felt the effects of a military government, though sober and religious, in Cromwell's army: He believed vicious and dissolute troops would be much worse: The king would grow fond of them: And they would quickly become insolent and ungovernable: And then such men as he was must be only in-

Cause. Upon this some sober men came to me, and told me, if any man in England could shew what a Commonwealth was, it was myself. Upon this persuasion I wrote; and after I had written, Oliver never answered his officers as he had done before, therefore I wrote not against the king's government. And for the law, if the law could have punished me, Oliver had done it; therefore my writing was not obnoxious to the law. After Oliver, the Parliament said they were a Commonwealth; I said they were not, and proved it: insomuch that the Parliament accounted me a Cavalier, and one that had no other design in my writing, than to bring in the king; and now the king, first of any man, makes me a Round-head.

L. These things are out of doors; if you be no plotter, the king does not reflect upon your writings.

Upon this the Commissioners rose up, and went out; but when lord Lauderdale was at the head of the stairs, I said to him, My lord, there is one thing more, you tax me with ingratitude to the king, who had suffered me to live undisturbed: truly, my lord, had I been taken right by the king, it had (by this example already given) been no more than my due. But I know well enough I have been mistaken by the king; the king therefore taking me for no friend, and yet using me not as an enemy, is such a thing as I have mentioned to all I have conversed with, as a high character of ingenuity and honour in the king's nature.

L. I am glad you have had a sense of it; and so he went down.

H. My lord, it is my duty to wait on you no further.

struments to serve their ends. He said, he would not look on, and see the ruin of his country begun, and be silent; a white staff should not bribe him. The earl of Clarendon was persuaded he was in the right, and promised he would divert the king from any other force than what might be decent to make a shew with, and what might serve to disperse unruly multitudes. The earl of Southampton said, if it went no farther he could bear it; but it would not be easy to fix such a number, as would please our princes and not give jealousy. The earl of Clarendon persuaded the king, that it was necessary for him to carry himself with great caution, till the old army should be disbanded: For, if an ill humour got among them, they knew both their courage and their principles, which the present times had for a while a little suppressed: Yet upon any just jealousy there might be great cause to fear new and more violent disorders. By these means the king was so wrought on, that there was no great occasion given for jealousy. The army was to be disbanded, but in such a manner, with so much respect, and so exact an account of arrears and such gratuities, that it looked rather to be the dismissing them to the next opportunity, and a reserving them till there should be occasion for their service, than a breaking of them. They were certainly the bravest, the best disciplined, and the soberest army that had been known in these latter ages: Every soldier was able to do the functions of an officer. The court was at great quiet, when they got rid of such a burden, as lay on them from the fear of such a body of men. The guards, and the new troops that were raised, were made up of such of the army as Monk recommended, and answered for. And with that his great interest at court came to a stand. He was little considered afterwards.*—See, too, 1 Macpherson, 17, 18, 19.

* Ralph, vol. 1, p. 53, gives a curious extract from a work published in 1681, by captain Yarranton (with his name in the title page) to demonstrate, that the whole accusation against the Presbyterians for being engaged in this alleged Plot of 1661, was a forgery.

210. The Trial of Sir HENRY VANE, knt. at the King's-Bench, for High-Treason: 14 CHARLES II. A. D. 1662. [Written by Himself.]

[The points of law determined in this Case are thus noticed by the Reporters of the time:

“Memorandum, That in Trinity term, 14 Car. 2, sir Hen. Vane was indicted at the King's-Bench for compassing the death of king Charles the 2nd, and intending to change the kingly government of this nation; and the overt-acts which were laid, were, that he with divers other unknown persons did meet and consult of the means to destroy the king and government; and did take upon him the government of the forces of this nation by sea and land, and appointed colonels, captains, and officers, and the sooner to effect his wicked design, did actually in the county of Middlesex raise war. And upon his trial, he justified that what he did was by the authority of parliament, and that the king was then out of possession of the kingdom; and the parliament was then the only power regnant; and therefore, no treason could be committed against the king: and he objected, that a levying war in Surrey could not be given in evidence to a jury in Middlesex; and he desired to offer a Bill of Exception, because these things were over-ruled by the Court; and in this case these points were resolved of by the Court.

"1. That by the death of king Charles the 1st, that long parliament was actually determined; notwithstanding the acts of parliament that it should not be dissolved but by consent of both Houses. For every parliament is called to consult with the person of the king who calleth it; and therefore upon his death it is determined; for they can no longer consult with him, for which end they were called. And a case was cited to be resolved, that where, in the 13 of queen Eliz. an act of parliament was made, that a Commission of Sewers should continue for ten years, unless the same be determined or repealed by any new commission, or by supersedeas, king James granted such a commission and died within that time; adjudged, that the commission was determined; for all commissions are determined by the death of the king who grants them, and this point of the actual determination of that parliament by the death of king Charles the 1st, was before that time, resolved by all the judges of England, as my lord Bridgeman told me. But note, there were no special words to continue the parliament upon the king's death.

"2. It was resolved, that the king Charles the 2nd, was de facto kept out of the exercise of the kingly office by traitors and rebels; yet he was king both de facto et de jure. And all the acts which were done to the keeping him out were high treason.*

* Mr. East observes, "the latter part of this Resolution furnishes the true ground of the judgment. Sir H. Vane was actively instrumental in preventing the king from assuming his authority. But it is a misapplication of terms to say that that prince was king de facto before the period of the Restoration." To be sure, if Charles the 2nd was king de facto during the different usurpations which intervened between his father's death and his own Restoration—while he was a wanderer, a beggar and an outcast—it seems idle to talk of any distinction between a king de facto and a king de jure. Still, however, the case is not absolutely clear, and the obscurity has not been diminished by a practice of not attending to the precise force of the terms of the stat. 11 H. 7. c. 1. which is as follows:

"The king our sovereign lord, calling to his remembrance the duty of allegiance of his subjects of this his realm, and that they by reason of the same are bound to serve their prince and sovereign lord for the time being, in his wars, for the defence of him, and the land, against every rebellion, power, and might, reared against him, and with him to enter and abide in service in battle, if case

"3. It was resolved that the very consultation and advising together of the means to destroy the king and his government, was an overt act to prove the compassing of the king's death.

so require; (2) and that for the same service, what fortune ever fall by chance in the same battle against the mind and will of the prince (as in this land some time passed hath been seen,) that it is not reasonable, but against all laws, reason, and good conscience, that the said subjects going with their sovereign lord in wars, attending upon him in his person, or being in other places by his commandment, within this land, or without, any thing should lose or forfeit, for doing their true duty and service of allegiance. (3) It he therefore ordained, enacted, and established by the King our sovereign lord, by the advice and assent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and the Commons, in this present parliament assembled, and by authority of the same, that from henceforth no manner of person or persons, whatsoever he or they be, that attend upon the king and sovereign lord of this land for the time being, in his person, and do him true and faithful service of allegiance in the same, or be in other places by his commandment in his wars, within this land, or without, that for the said deed and true duty of allegiance, he or they be in no wise convict or attain of High Treason, ne of other offences for that cause, by act of parliament,* or otherwise by any process of law, whereby he, or any of them, shall lose or forfeit life, lands, tenements, rents, possessions, hereditaments, goods, chattels, or any other things; but to be for that deed and service utterly discharged of any vexation, trouble, or loss. (4) And if any act or acts, or other process of the law hereafter thereupon for the same happen to be made, contrary to this ordinance, that then that act or acts, or other processes of the law, whatsoever they shall be, stand, and be utterly void. (5) Provided always, that no person or persons shall take any benefit or advantage by this act, which shall hereafter decline from his or their said allegiance."

* "Acts of parliament derogatory from the power of subsequent parliaments bind not. So the statute 11 Hen. 7. c. 1. which directs, that no person for assisting a king de facto shall be attainted of Treason by act of parliament or otherwise, is held to be good only as to common prosecutions for High Treason; but will not restrain or clog any parliamentary attainder. Because the legislature, being in truth the sovereign power, is always of equal, always of absolute authority: it acknowledges no superior upon earth, which the prior legislature must have been, if its ordinances could bind a subsequent parliament. And upon the same principle Cicero, in his letters to Atticus, treats with a proper contempt these restraining clauses, which endeavour to tie up the hands of suc-

"4. It was resolved that in this case, the treason laid in the indictment being the compassing of the king's death, which was in the county of Middlesex, and the levying war being laid only as one of the overt acts to prove the compassing of the king's death,

"From hence," says Hawkins, Pl. Crown, B. i. c. 17. s. 14. "it clearly follows, that one out of possession is so far from having any right to our allegiance, by virtue of any other title which he may set up against the king in being, that we are bound by the duty of our allegiance to resist him." Blackstone (4 Com. 77.) after shewing the illegitimacy and absurdity of this inference, says, "The true distinction seems to be, that the statute of Henry 7th does by no means command any opposition to a king de jure; but excuses the obedience paid to a king de facto." Now, to apply the statute to the case of Charles the 2nd, none of the acts which were done in the interval between the death of his father and his own restoration, and which were alledged to be acts of treason against him, were done in attendance upon, or allegiance to any king for the time being, &c. It seems, therefore, to be very clear, that none of the ceeding legislatures. "When you repeal the 'law itself,' says he, 'you at the same time 'repeal' the prohibitory clause, which guards 'against such repeal. *'" Blackst. Comm. Introduction, vol. i. p. 90.

The citation of authorities to establish this doctrine might appear to be somewhat like the quotation of Seneca or Epictetus to prove the certainty of death, or the instability of fortune; for the maxim 'Leges posteriores priores contrarias abrogant' is, as Blackstone himself has observed, a general principle of universal law. Some allusions to this doctrine were made in the Parliamentary Debates, which took place in 1792, upon a bill respecting the redemption of the National Debt (stat. 32 Geo. 3. c. 55.) It may however be here noticed, that there is not in this statute any attempt to derogate from the power of future parliaments; although some of the arguments employed in those Debates, seem to have supposed that the bill contained matter of that sort. The cases which appear to give room for the most weighty arguments in support of a legal derogation from the power of future parliaments are these two: 1. That of the union of independent legislatures upon certain fundamental and essential conditions. 2. That of an oath prescribed, by act of parliament, to be taken by one or more of the branches of all future parliaments, to preserve and maintain, without alteration, any of the established laws. As to the former of these cases, see Mr. Justice Blackstone's Note, concerning the fundamental and essential conditions of the Union between England and Scotland, (Introd. to the Commentaries, p. 98.) and Bishop Warburton's Alliance between Church and State, as referred to in that Note.

doers of those acts derived a title to impunity from the enacting words of the statute. It is asserted, that the enactment of this statute is declaratory of the common law, and the preamble of the statute seems to prove this: (for as to the authorities from Edward 4's time they are not in point; * nor, indeed, would any

* Of these the chief is the Case of sir Ralph Grey, 4 Ed. 4, cited in 1 Hale's Hist. Pl. Cr. 61, 103. from the Year-Book. This Case is thus related by Stow in his Annals, p. 417, (and an Abridgement of it is given in Selden's Titles of Honour). "The 15th of May 1464, king Henry's power being at Hexham, the lord Montacute with a power came thither, and inclosed them round about. There were taken and slain many lords that were with king Henry, but he himself was fled four days before into Lancashire, where he and others lived in caves, full hardly, unknown more than a year. On Trinity Sunday, king Edward made the lord Montacute earl of Northumberland, and warden of the Marches. The earls of Warwick and Northumberland took Bambrough Castle; and sir Ralph Grey being taken in Bambrough, for that he had sworn to be true to king Henry, was condemned, and had judgment given upon him by the earl of Worcester, High Constable of England, as followeth: 'Sir Ralph Grey, for thy treason, the king had ordained that thou shouldest have had thy spurs taken off by the hard heels, by the hand of the master cook, who is here ready to do as was promised thee, at the time that he put on thy spurs, and said to thee as is accustomed: That an thou be not true to thy sovereign lord, he shall smite off thy spurs with his knife, hard by the heels, and so shewed him the master cook, ready to do his office with his apron and his knife. Moreover sir Ralph Grey, the king had ordained here thou mayest see the kings of Arms and Herald, and thine own proper coat of arms, which they should tear off thy body, and so shouldest thou as well be disgraced of thy worship nobles and arms as of thy order of knighthood. Also here is another coat of thine arms reversed, the which thou shouldest have worn on thy body, going to thy death-wards, for that belongeth to thee after the law: notwithstanding, the disgrading of knighthood, and of thine arms and nobles, the king pardoneth that, for thy noble grandfather, who suffered trouble for the king's most noble predecessors. Now sir Ralph Grey this shall be thy penance: thou shalt go on thy feet unto the town's end, and there thou shalt be laid down and drawn to a scaffold made for thee, and thou shalt have thy head smitten off, thy body to be burnt in the fire, thy head, where the king's pleasure shall be.' This judgment was pronounced at Doncaster, against the said Sir Ralph Grey, for rebelling and keeping though this levying of war be laid in the Indictment to be in Middlesex, yet a war levied by him in Surry, might be given in evidence; for being not laid as the treason, but only as decisions on the subject, arising out of the storms of long civil wars and made before the agitation produced by those storms had subsided, be of very great authority.) But still, unless (which I presume will not be contended) the words 'Prince and Sovereign Lord' have a more extensive signification than the word of the castle of Bambrough, against king Edward."

According to the Year Book it should seem that some particular circumstances of Grey's punishment, and not his conviction and punishment generally, were owing to the perjury, treachery, and duplicity which he had exercised as well to Henry the 6th as Edward the 4th, and if this be the true construction of the book lord Hale seems to have been somewhat wrong in his understanding of it. He twice notices Grey's Case, ubi sup.

In the former of those places he says, "Upon the same account it is, that though there be an usurper of the crown, yet it is treason for any subject, while the usurper is in full possession of the sovereignty, to practise treason against his person; and therefore, although the true prince regain the sovereignty, yet such attempts against the usurper in compassing his death have been punished as treason, unless they were attempts made in the right of the rightful prince, or in aid or assistance of him, because of the breach of ligeance, that was temporarily due to him, that was king de facto; and thus it was done 4 E. 4, 9 E. 4. 1; though H. 6, was declared an usurper by act of parliament 1 E. 4, and therefore king Edward 4, punished Ralph Grey with degradation, as well as death, not only for his rebellion against himself, but also 'pur cause de son perjury et doubleness, qu'il avoit fait al roy H. 6.' 4 E. 4. 20."—In the latter, he says, "A king de facto but not de jure, such as were H. 4, H. 5, H. 6, R. 3, H. 7, being in the actual possession of the crown is a king within this act, so that compassing his death is treason within this law; and therefore the 4 E. 4. 20. a. a person that compassed the death of H. 6, was attainted for that treason in the time of the rightful king; but had it been an act of hostility in assistance of the rightful heir of the crown, which afterwards obtained, this had not been treason."

It is very surprising, that Foster, who seems to have paid much attention to this Case of sir Ralph Grey; see his hooks in p. 397, and the conclusion of his Advertisement prefixed to the editions, subsequent to the first, of his book) should, referring to Hale's account of the Case, express himself, as he does, in the following words.

"It is not to be imagined, that they [princes] will consider the former as traitors for acts of hostility done or attempted in aid of themselves. I verily believe no prince in his right King; it does seem that this "clear and full parliamentary declaration," as Foster calls it, of the ancient law and constitution of England, founded on principles of reason, equity, and good conscience, confers not upon the doers of the before-mentioned acts any better title to impunity than they derived from the enacting part of the statute. Agreeably to this, Foster, when he sets himself to guess, "what did the Court mean by calling Charles the 2nd 'a king de facto?' says, "they could not mean, what every soul before themselves understood, a king in the actual and full exercise of the regal power. They meant, I presume, as his lordship (Hale), upon another occasion," [that of a right heir who once had possession of the crown but is ousted by an usurper, see 1 Hale's P. C. 104.] "is pleased to express himself, one quasi in possession of the crown; since, during the usurpation, no other person did claim to act under the regal title."*

The same, or something very like it in effect, is, I suppose, the meaning of Ilawkins (Book 1. c. 17. s. 18.) where, in order to justify or rather perhaps to account for the resolution that Charles the 2nd was king de facto as well as de jure, from his father's death, he says, "It is apparent, that no other person was in possession of any sovereign power known to our laws." See, too, what the Chief Baron says in the case of Cook the Regicide, ante, vol. 5. p. 1114. "That, that king Henry the 7th did, was to take care of the king de facto against the king de jure; it was for a king, and kingly government: it was not for an antimonarchical government."

senses ever did. His lordship [Hale] doth indeed in the passages just cited mention the case of sir Ralph Grey; and supposeth, that he was punished in the time of Edw. 4. for treasons committed against Henry 6. in aid of Edward. But, I doubt, that case will not warrant any such supposition."

It is observable moreover, that this gross surprising misrepresentation of Hale occurs in a discourse in the revision and completion of which Mr. Justice Foster in his preface gives us to understand, that he spent the leisure of a long vacation; and of which he says, 'that it may at least serve to guard young and inexperienced minds against some impressions, which a modest deference to the opinion of so great an author may have made upon them.'

* Cromwell felt or pretended to feel the importance in this respect of the title of King. See the conference between him and Whitelocke recorded in the Memorials of the latter, under date Nov. 7, 1652. Whitelocke told the Lord General that the 11 Hen. 7, would be little regarded by their enemies if they got the upper-hand.

the overt act to prove the compassing, it is a transitory thing which may be proved in another county. But if an Indictment be for levying war, and that made the treason for

Thus, the statute 11 H. 7. c. 1. does not seem in its enacting or declaratory parts to extend impunity to any who resist a king de jure, unless they do so in adherence to a king de facto: and this was not the case of sir Henry Vane.

Foster does not give a positive opinion for or against the right to impunity of persons who act in adherence to usurpers, not being kings, against kings de jure; but what he does say seems to tend very strongly in favour of such right. He forcibly urges the preamble of the statute as declaratory of the Common Law. He enforces the mutuality of the obligations of protection and allegiance: and all that he says on the grounds of reason and equity is equally applicable to all forms of usurpation. The subject, says he, "entereth not into the question of title, he hath neither leisure nor is he at liberty to enter into that question, but he seeth the fountain from whence the blessings of liberty, peace and plenty flow to him, and there he payeth his allegiance."

Blackstone, in treating of kings de facto and de jure, cautiously avoids all allusion to this case of sir Henry Vane; but upon the principle of the impunity of adherence to an usurper he is at least as strong as Foster.

"When an usurper," he tells us, "is in possession, the subject is excused and justified in obeying and giving him assistance: otherwise, under an usurpation, no man could be safe, if the lawful prince had a right to hang him for obedience to the powers in being, as the usurper would certainly do for disobedience. Nay farther, as the mass of people are imperfect judges of title, of which in all cases possession is prima facie evidence, the law compels no man to yield obedience to that prince, whose right is by want of possession rendered uncertain and disputable; till providence shall think fit to interpose in his favour, and decide the ambiguous claim: and therefore, till he is entitled to such allegiance by possession, no treason can be committed against him."

It may be said; that as by the common law, England is a kingdom, the law can never recognise any other sovereign power than that of a king (agreeably to the expression in Hawkins, ubi sup.) But as this objection is obvious, so likewise is an answer to it. England is not only a kingdom, but it is a kingdom descendible according to certain rules. If, for the purpose of giving effect to the fundamental principles of reason, equity, and good conscience, the law can contemplate and provide for a violation of the constitutional descent of the sovereign power, it surely may in like manner and for the same purpose contemplate and provide for a violation of the constitutional forms of administering the sovereign power.

See, too, on this matter, Marten's Speech, ante, vol. 5. p. 1202.

It is to be hoped that to Englishmen this subject will never again possess any other source of interest than its curiosity. Perhaps therefore, this note should have been spared. It shall now (after referring the reader to Hawkins and Blackstone, ubi sup. 1 Hale's H. P. C. 61, 102, and the elaborate discussion in Foster's fourth Discourse, and recommending to his consideration the effect ascribed by Hawkins and Foster to the Resolution that Charles the 2nd had been king de facto) be concluded in Foster's words.

"Sir Henry Vane's was a very singular case, and the transactions in which he bore a part happened in a conjuncture of affairs which never did exist before, and, I hope, never will again; an usurpation founded in the dissolution of the ancient legal government, and the total subversion of the constitution.

"I will therefore say nothing to the merits of the question, more than that the rule, laid down by the court, involved in the guilt of treason every man in the kingdom who had acted in a public station under a government possessed in fact for twelve years together of sovereign power; but under various forms at different times, as the enthusiasm of the herd or the ambition of their leaders dictated.

"L. C. J. Hale, when of high rank at the bar, took the engagement, (ante, v. 5. p. 211) 'To be true and faithful to the Commonwealth of England without a King or House of Lords.' This, in the sense of those who imposed it, was plainly an engagement for abolishing kingly government, at least for supporting the abolition of it: and with regard to those who took it, it might, upon the principles of sir Henry Vane's case, have been easily improved into an overt-act of treason against king Charles 2."

[This Engagement was, to be true and faithful to the Commonwealth of England, as it is now established without King or house of Lords. See Whitelocke under date June 1649. It is remarkable, that of the "Act for subscribing the Engagement, 2 January, 1649-50," nothing but the title is inserted in Scobell's Acts and Ordinances. On the 23d of February following, farther time was given for subscribing the Engagement. On the 19th of Jan. 1653-4, shortly after the assumption by Cromwell of the Protectorate, the Acts and Resolves of Parliament for taking the Engagement were repealed by an act, which recites, That "many general and promissory oaths and engagements in former times imposed upon the people of this nation have proved burthens and snares to tender consciences." Whitelocke, under date Jan. 22, 1649-50, says, "The taking of the Engagement sticks most with the Presbyterians, who pretend conscience to oppose it, but the Cavaliers in policy subscribe it."

It appears that Chief Justice Vaughan was more scrupulous than Hale. The son of the former in his preface to his father's Reports tells us, that which the party is indicted, in that case it is local, and must be laid in the county where in truth it was.*

"From the year 1641, in which he retired from the parliament, until the year 1660, in which God blessed us with the Restoration of our present king, he did in a manner quit his profession: for in that time he never received a fee from any person whatever, nor could be prevailed with to appear in any court, although exceedingly importuned to it by such as had a desire to make use of his abilities: and the reason I have heard him assign for it, was, 'That it was the duty of an honest man to decline, as far as in him lay, owning jurisdictions that derived their authority from any power, but their lawful prince.'"

* This Mr. East says must be understood to mean, 'that after proof of an overt act in the county in which the treason is laid, evidence may be given of any other overt acts, of the same species of treason in other counties.' Mr. East makes a question (upon the authority as it seems of the MS. compilation, which he cites by the title of MS. Sum. and of which he gives an account at the end of the preface to his own work), whether the distinction laid down in this 4th Resolution, between levying war when laid as the treason, and levying war when laid only as the overt act to prove the compassing, and whether the position that treason in levying war is local, can be right: and he cites the cases of Dammaree and others, (A. D. 1710, post.) where in an indictment for levying war in Middlesex, acts done in London were given in evidence, and the case of Deacon (A. D. 1746, infra. and Foster 9,) where in an indictment for levying war in Cumberland, evidence of acts done in other counties was objected to, but it was held by Mr. Justice Abney and Mr. Justice Foster, 'that it was indeed necessary that some overt act laid, be proved on the prisoner in Cumberland, but that being done, acts of treason tending to prove the overt acts laid, though done in a foreign county,' (perhaps it should rather be that acts of treason though done in a foreign county tending to prove the overt acts laid,) 'may be given in evidence.' On this point it is said, that Lord Chief Justice Willes declined giving any opinion. But as to this (see the Case infra.) Mr. Justice Foster in his Reports adds, That no objection was made during the whole course of the trials, to the giving evidence of overt acts in a county different from that where the fact was laid; an overt act having been first proved in the proper county. And that sort of evidence was given in almost all the trials. In A. D. 1695, sir William Parkyns was indicted (see the Case, infra.) for compassing, &c. the king's death, and all the overt acts were laid in Middlesex. On the trial evidence being given of a conversation in Hertfordshire the prisoner submitted, whether words spoken in Hertfordshire, could be evidence of a treason acted in Middlesex. By

"5. It was resolved, that the stat. of W. 2. c. 31, which giveth the Bill of Exception, extends only to civil causes, and not to criminal; the words of the stat. are, 'Cum aliqua implacitatur coram aliquibus Justiciariis,' &c. And the intention never was to give such persons liberty to put in Bills of Exception, for then there would be no trials of that nature ever dispatched in any time, neither here nor in the Circuits, if every frivolous exception which a prisoner would make, should be drawn up in a Bill of Exception;

18th, Chief Justice; "If there be a design to kill the king, and there are several overt acts to prove that design, and one is in one county and another is in another county, the party may be indicted in either of the counties, and evidence may be given of both those overt acts though in several counties. It is true you being indicted in Middlesex, makes it necessary that some evidence should be given of some things done in Middlesex, as there is, as your meeting at Mrs. Mountjoy's, and at the Nag's Head in Covent Garden, and the Sun in the Strand, where there were several consults, which are overt acts of the same treason. And if treason be committed in several counties, the party may be indicted in any one, and the evidence may be given of facts done in all."

See the Case of Whitbread and others, (A. D. 1679, infra.) Gavan one of the prisoners observed, 'I am accused by one witness concerning one fact, and by another concerning another; the one committed here at London, the other in Staffordshire; I desire, therefore, to know, whether the witness that swears the thing done in Staffordshire, and the other witness, that swears what was done in London, can be esteemed two witnesses, according to the law, to convict me of treason?—L. C. J. North. Yes, I'll tell you, if it were a matter of doubt, it might be found specially, and be argued, but it is a matter that hath been already resolved in the case of sir Henry Vane at the King's-bench bar, who was indicted for levying of war against the king; and there one witness proved the levying of war in one county, and the other proved the levying of war in another county; and so, though they were but single witnesses of single facts, yet being both came up to the indictment, they were adjudged sufficient to maintain it. So it is in your case, here is one witness for the proving your hand to the paper which was for the murder of the king, and there is another witness of your discourse to the same purpose; the fact is your joining and conspiring to destroy the king, and to levy war against him, and both these are proved to the full of the indictment by these witnesses; and though they are to several particular facts, yet they are all overt acts of the same treason.—Gavan. My lord, I have a contrary opinion to that in Serjeant Rolls.—L. C. J. North. But this is a known case, and the law is settled therein.'

nued longer than usual, they should have more power than another parliament, which is but the king's council: And though it is not to be dissolved, but by another act, yet by the king's death it is determined in fact, as marriage enacted not to be divorced till another act, yet it is done by death; and betwixt king and parliament is a like conjunction. And had an army in the life of king Charles the 1st, forced and packed any of the parliament, it had been a suspension of a parliament till it might resort again to its freedom, as is the law of all nations. Twisden ad idem, it had been without question, had not the act been made that it should not be dissolved, which word is not extendable to a discontinuance; so it saith, no act done or to be done shall dissolve it, his death is no such act; Mallet and Foster ad idem, it was only to treat 'nobiscum,' which is meant in the king's political and personal capacity, and so determined by his death, whereby those capacities were severed, which to do, or suppose, by any other, is the greatest treason, the law making no such distinction: but 'eo instante,' that one dieth the other is king. Either House may commit treason, though the parliament, viz. king, lords, and commons cannot. Twisden rebuked the abominable distinction of the king's capacity; and 'per Curiam,' the endeavouring to keep the king out, though he be not in possession, is treason; and counsel, by Twisden, is not to be allowed in things that tend to subvert fundamentals, as Storoy's Case.

"Sir Henry cited Westm. 2, cap. 31, that he bought to have a bill of exception sealed by the Court, and the indictment to that end read in Latin, which the Court denied, as a thing unreasonable, the statute not extending to any indictment, by Glyn the king's serjeant, for this is no supersedeas; but that judgment and execution may be had notwithstanding, and so this would be to no purpose, and no gaol-delivery would ever be if it should be allowed. But by sir Henry Vane, the parliament have declared that execution should be remitted in case judgment passeth: which petition of the houses, and grant of the king, were read. Windham, Did the prisoner not understand English, it ought to be read in Latin; but no copy of the indictment was ever delivered in Latin or English. Twisden, as the rest, delivered his opinion, that a bill of exception is not within the statute, nor ever heard of; and at common law this bill lieth in no case. The chief justice having given judgment, declared that the petition of the houses, was not to be allowed by the king, in case the prisoner were obstinate, as he had been in braching ill documents and fundamentals. 2: Lambert excepted to the indictment that he was named without addition, which was mistaken. And so the court gave judgment, and declared him more capable of the benefit of the houses petition than sir Henry Vane, by his fair carriage: And sir Henry Vane soon after was beheaded on Tower-hill, and Lambert sent to Gersey." Keble. Of this Case of sir Henry Vane some consideration was had in the controversy which was excited by lord Russell's Case, A. D. 1683. See the different articles subjoined to his Trial in this Collection. See also a Note to the Case of Anderton, A. D. 1693, infra.]

SIR Henry Vane being committed for High Treason, had prepared the following Argument for his Defence, before he knew how the Indictment would be laid.

His intended Argument.

The Offence objected against me, is levying War, within the Statute 25 Ed. 3. and by consequence, a most high and great failer in the duty which the subject, according to the laws of England, stands obliged to perform, in relation to the Imperial crown and Sovereign power of England.

The crime, if it prove any, must needs be very great, considering the circumstances with which it hath been accompanied: for it relates to, and takes in a series of public action, of above 20 years continuance. It took its rise and had its root in the being, authority, judgment, resolutions, votes, and orders of a parliament, and that, a parliament not only authorized and commissioned in the ordinary and customary way, by his majesty's writ of summons, and the peoples election and deputation, subject to adjournment, discontinuance, and dissolution, at the king's will; but which, by express act of parliament, was constituted in its continuance and exercise of its power, free from that subjection, and made therein wholly to depend upon their own will to be declared in an act of parliament, to be passed for that purpose, when they should see cause. To speak plainly and clearly in this matter; That which is endeavoured to be made a crime and an offence of such an high nature in my person, is no other than the necessary and unavoidable actings of the representative body of the kingdom, for the preservation of the good people thereof in their allegiance and duty to God and his law, as also from the imminent dangers and destruction threatened them, from God's and their own enemies.

This made both Houses in their Remonstrance, May 26, 1642, protest, if the malignant spirits about the king should ever force or necessitate them to defend their religion, the kingdom, the privileges of parliament, and the rights and liberties of the subjects, with their swords; the blood and destruction that should ensue thereupon, must be wholly cast upon their account, God and their own consciences telling them, that they were clear; and would not doubt, but that God and the whole world would clear them therein.*

In his majesty's Answer to the Declaration of the two Houses, May 19, 1642, he acknowledged his going into the House of Commons to demand the five members, was an error.* And that was it, which gave the parliament the first cause to put themselves in a posture of defence, by their own power and authority, in commanding the Trained-Bands of the City of London to guard and secure them from violence, in the discharge of their trust and duty, as the two Houses of Parliament appointed by act, to continue, as above-mentioned.

The next cause was, his majesty's raising Forces at York, (under pretence of a guard) expressed in the humble Petition of the Lords and Commons, May 23, 1642,† wherein they beseech his majesty to disband all such forces, and desist from any further designs of that nature, otherwise they should hold themselves bound in duty towards God, and the trust reposed in them by the people, and the fundamental laws and constitutions of this kingdom, to employ their care and utmost power to secure the parliament, and preserve the peace and quiet of the kingdom.

May 20, 1642, The two Houses of parliament gave their judgment, in these votes. 1. "That it appears, that the king (seduced by wicked counsels) intends to make war against the parliament, who in all their consultations and actions have proposed no other end to themselves but the care of his kingdoms, and the performance of all duty and loyalty to his person. 2. That whensoever the king maketh war upon the parliament, it is a breach of trust reposed in him by his people, contrary to his oath, and tending to the dissolution of this government. 3. That whosoever shall serve or assist him in such wars, are traitors by the fundamental laws of this kingdom, and have been so adjudged by two acts of parliament, and ought to suffer as traitors."

Die Jovis, Octob. 8, 1642,‡ in the Instructions agreed upon by the Lords and Commons about the Militia, they declare, "That the king (seduced by wicked counsel) hath raised War against the parliament, and other his good subjects."

And by the Judgment and Resolution of both Houses, bearing date Aug. 13, 1642, upon occasion of his majesty's Proclamation for suppressing the present Rebellion, under the command of Robert earl of Essex, they do unanimously publish and declare, "That all they who have advised, declared, abetted, or countenanced, or hereafter shall abet and countenance the said Proclamation, are traitors and enemies to God, the king and kingdom, and guilty of the highest degree of treason that can be committed against the king and kingdom, as that which invites his majesty's subjects to destroy his parliament, and good people, by a civil war; and by that means, to bring ruin, confusion, and perpetual slavery upon the surviving part of a then wretched kingdom."

The Law is acknowledged by the king, to be the only Rule, by which the people can be justly governed; and that, as it is his duty, so it shall be his perpetual, vigilant care, to see to it: therefore he will not suffer either or both Houses by their votes, without or against his consent, to enjoin any thing that is forbidden by the law, or to forbid any thing that is enjoined by the law.

The king does assert in his Answer to the Houses' Petition, May 23, 1642, "That he is a part of the parliament, which they take upon them to defend and secure; and that his prerogative is a part of, and a defence to the laws of the land."

In the Remonstrance of both Houses, (May 26, 1642) they do assert; "that if they have made any precedents this parliament they have made them for posterity, upon the same or better grounds of reason and law, than those were, upon which their predecessors made any for them; and do say that as some precedent, ought not to be rules for them to follow, so none can be limits to bound their proceedings, which may and must vary, according to the different condition of times." And for the particulars with which they were charged, of setting forth Declarations to the people who have chosen and intrusted them with all that is dearest to them, if there be no example for it in former times, They say, "it is because there never were such monsters before, that attempted to disaffect the people towards a parliament."

They further say; "His majesty's towns are no more his care than his kingdom, nor his kingdom than his people, who are not so his own that he hath absolute power over them; or in them, as in his proper goods and estate; but fiduciary, for the kingdom, and in the paramount right of the kingdom. They also acknowledge the law to be the safeguard and custody of all public and private interests. They also hold it fit, to declare unto the kingdom, (whose honour and interest is so much concerned in it) what is the privilege of the great council of parliament, herein; and what is the obligation that lies upon the kings of this realm, as to the passing such bills as are offered to them by both Houses, in the name, and for the good of the whole kingdom, whereunto they stand engaged, both in Conscience and Justice to give their royal assent."

First, In Conscience; in respect of the Oath that is, or ought to be taken by them at their coronation, as well to confirm, by their royal assent all such good laws as the people shall chuse, (whereby to remedy such inconveniences as the kingdom may suffer) as to keep and protect the laws already in being. The form of the Oath is upon record, and asserted by Books of good authority. Unto it relation is had, 25 Ed. 3, entitled, "The Statute of Provisors of Benefices."

Hereupon, the said Commons prayed our said lord the king, (saith the right of the crown of England, and the law of the said realm, is such, that upon the mischiefs and damages which happen to this realm, he ought and is bound by his oath, with the accord of his people in parliament, to make remedy and law, for the removing thereof) That it may please him to ordain remedy.

This right thus claimed by the Lords and Commons, the king doth not deny, in his Answer thereunto.

Secondly, In Justice the kings are obliged as well as in Conscience, in respect of the trust reposed in them, to preserve the kingdom by the making of new laws, where there shall be need, as well as by observing of laws already made; a kingdom being many times as much exposed to ruin for want of a new law, as by the violation of those that are in being.

This is a most clear right, not to be denied, but to be as due from his majesty to his people, as his protection. In all laws framed by both houses, as Petitions of Right, they have taken themselves to be so far judges of the rights claimed by them, That when the king's Answer hath not been in every point fully according to their desire, they have still insisted upon their claim, and never given it over, till the Answer hath been according to their demand, as was done in the late Petition of Right 3 Caroli*.

This shews, the two houses of parliament are judge between the king and people in question of right, as in the case also of Ship Money† and other illegal taxes; and if so, why should they not also be judge in the cases of the common good and necessity of the kingdom, wherein the kingdom hath as clear a right to have the benefit and remedy of the law, as in any other matter, saving pardon and grants of favour?

The Malignant party, are they, that not only neglect and despise, but labour to undermine the law, under colour of maintaining it. They endeavour to destroy the fountain and conservators of the law, the Parliament. They make other judges of the law, than what the law hath appointed. They set up other rules for themselves to walk by, than such as are according to law; and dispense with the subjects obedience, to that which the law calls authority, and to their determinations and resolutions, to whom the judgment doth appertain by law: Yea, though but private persons, they make the law to be their rule, according to their own understanding only, contrary to the judgment of those that are the competent judges thereof.

The king asserts, That the act of sir John Hotham was levying war against the king, by the letter of the statute 25 Ed. 3, cap. 2.

The Houses state the case, and deny it to be within that statute; saying, If the letter of that statute be thought to import this; That no war can be levied against the king, but what is directed and intended against his person; Or, that every levying of forces for the defence of the king's authority, and of his kingdom, against the personal commands of the king, opposed thereunto, (though accompanied with his presence) is treason or levying war against the king; Such interpretation is very far from the sense of that statute, and so much the statute itself speaks, besides the authority of Book-Cases. For if the clause of levying war had been meant only against the king's person, what need had there been thereof, after the other branch in the same statute, of compassing the king's death, which would necessarily have implied this? And because the former doth imply this, it seems not at all to be intended, at least, not chiefly in the latter branch, but the levying war against his laws and authority; and such a levying war, though not against his person, is a levying war against the king; whereas the levying of force against his personal commands, though accompanied with his presence, and not against his laws and authority, but in the maintenance thereof, is no levying of war against the king, but for him, especially in a time of so many successive plots and designs of force against the parliament and kingdom, of probable invasion from abroad, and of so great distance and alienation of his majesty's affections from his parliament and people, and of the particular danger of the place and magazine of Hull, of which the two Houses sitting, are the most proper judges.

In proclaiming sir John Hotham, Traitor, they say, The breach of the privilege of parliament was very clear, and the subversion of the subjects common right. For though the privileges of parliament extend not to these cases, mentioned in the Declaration of Treason, Felony, and breach of the peace, so as to exempt the members of parliament from punishment, or from all manner of process and trial, yet it doth privilege them in the way and method of their trial and punishment, and that the parliament should first have the cause brought before them, that they may judge of the fact, and of the grounds of their accusation, and how far forth the manner of their trial may or may not concern the privilege of parliament: otherwise, under this pretext, the privilege of parliament in this matter, may be so essentially broken, as thereby the very being of parliaments may be destroyed. Neither doth the sitting of a parliament, suspend all or any law, in maintaining that law, which upholds the privilege of parliament, which upholds the parliament, which upholds the kingdom.

They further assert; That in some sense, they acknowledge the king to be the only person, against whom treason can be committed, that is, as he is king, and that treason which is against the kingdom, is more against the king, than that which is against his person, because he is king: for treason is not treason, as it is against him as a man, but as a man that is a king, and as he hath, and stands in that relation to the kingdom, intrusted with the kingdom, and discharging that trust.

They also avow, That there can be no competent judge of this or any the like case, but a Parliament; and do say, that if the wicked counsel about the king could master this parliament by force, they would hold up the same power to deprive us of all parliaments, which are the ground and pillar of the subject's liberty, and that which only maketh England a free monarchy.

The Orders of the two Houses carry in them law for their limits, and the safety of the land for their end. This makes them not doubt but all his majesty's good subjects will yield obedience to his majesty's authority, signified therein by both Houses of Parliament: for whose encouragement, and that they may know their duty in matters of that nature, and upon how sure a ground they go, that follow the judgment of parliament for their guide; They alledge the true meaning and ground of that statute, 11 Hen. 7, cap. 1, printed at large in his majesty's Message, May 4; This statute provides, that none that attend upon the king and do him true service, shall be attainted, or forfeit any thing.—What was the scope of this Statute?

Ans. To provide, that men should not suffer as traitors, for serving the king in his wars according to the duty of their allegiance. But if this had been all, it had been a very needless and ridiculous Statute. Was it then intended (as they seem to make it, that print it with his majesty's Message) that those should be free from all crime and penalty, that should follow the king and serve him in war, in any case whatsoever, whether it was for or against the kingdom, or the laws thereof? That cannot be; for that could not stand with the duty of their allegiance, which in the beginning of this Statute, is expressed to be, 'to serve the king 'for the time being in his wars, for the defence 'of him and the land.' If therefore it be against the land, (as it must be, if it be against the parliament, the representative body of the kingdom) it is a declining from the duty of allegiance, which this statute supposes may be done, though men should follow the king's person in the war. Otherwise, there had been no need of such a Proviso in the end of the Statute, that none should take benefit thereby, that should decline from their allegiance.

That therefore which is the principal verb in this, is, 'the serving of the king for the 'time being,' which cannot be meant of a Perkin Warbeck, or any that should call himself king, but such a one, as (whatever his title might prove, either in himself or in his ancestors) should be received and acknowledged for such, by the kingdom, the consent whereof cannot be discerned but by parliament; the act whereof is the act of the whole kingdom, by the personal suffrage of the peers, and the delegate consent of the Commons of England. Hen. 7th therefore, a wise prince, to clear this matter of contest, happening between kings de facto and kings de jure, procured this Statute to be made, 'That none shall be accounted 'traitor for serving in his wars, the king for the 'time being;' that is, for the present allowed and received by the parliament in behalf of the kingdom. And as it is truly suggested in the preamble of the Statute; it is not agreeable to reason or conscience that it should be otherwise, seeing men should be put upon an impossibility of knowing their duty, if the judgment of the highest court should not be a rule to guide them. And if the judgment thereof is to be followed, when the Question is, Who is king? much more, when the Question is, What is the best service of the king and kingdom? Those therefore that shall guide themselves by the judgment of parliament, ought (whatever happen) to be secure and free from all account and penalties, upon the ground and equity of this Statute.

To make the parliament countenancers of treason, they say, is enough to have dissolved all the bands of service and confidence between his majesty and his parliament, of whom the law says, a dishonourable thing ought not to be imagined.

This conclusion then is a clear result from what hath been argued; That in all cases of such difficulty and unusualness, happening by the over-ruling providence of God, as render it impossible for the subject to know his duty by any known law or certain rule extant, his relying then upon the judgment and reason of the whole realm, declared by their representative body in parliament, then sitting, and adhering thereto, and pursuing thereof, (though the same afterwards be by succeeding parliaments, judged erroneous, factious and unjust) is most agreeable to right reason and good conscience; and in so doing, all persons are to be free and secure from all account and penalties not only upon the ground and equity of that Statute, 11 Hen. 7. but according to all rules of justice, natural or moral.

Afterwards, in Easter Term, Sir Henry Vane was indicted of High-Treason, before the Middlesex Grand-Jury; and the Bill being found by them, he was upon Monday the 2nd of June in Trinity Term, arraigned to this effect;

'That you, as a false Traitor against his most excellent majesty king Charles the 2nd, your supreme and natural lord, not having the fear of God before your eyes, and withdrawing that your duty and allegiance, which a true subject ought to have and bear to our said liege and sovereign lord, the 13th of May, in the 11th year of our said sovereign lord the king, at the parish of St. Martin in the Fields, in the county of Middlesex, did compass and imagine* the death of our said sovereign lord the king, and the ancient frame of government of this realm totally to subvert, and keep out our said sovereign lord from the exercise of his regal government. And the same the better to effect, the said sir Henry Vane, the said 13th day of May, in the said 11th year, &c. at St. Martin's aforesaid, together with other false Traitors, to the jurors unknown, did traitorously and maliciously as-

'assemble and sit together, and then and there consulted to bring the king unto destruction, and to hold him out from the exercise of his regal authority, and then and there usurped the government, and appointed officers, to wit, colonels and captains of a certain army, raised against the king; against the peace of our sovereign lord the king, his crown and dignity, and contrary to the form of the statute in that case made and provided. And the better to effect this, the 20th of December, in the said 11th year, with a multitude, to the number of a thousand persons, to the jurors unknown, in warlike manner assembled, and arrayed with guns, trumpets, drums, &c. did levy war against the peace, &c. and contrary to the form of a statute.'

Which being read, he prayed to have it read a second time, which was granted him. He then prayed to have it read in Latin, which all the court denied, * and Keeling the king's Serjeant said, That though all pleas and entries are set down on record in Latin, yet the agitations of causes in court, ought to be in English.

The prisoner moved several exceptions to the Indictment, as that the 25 E. 3. is not pursued: that he had levied no such force as amounted to a levying of war; Also the place in which persons with whom, are both uncertain; and the particular acts of levying war being not set forth, he thought therefore the indictment was insufficient. Also he said, Here is a long time of action for which I am charged, and I may be concerned for what I acted as a member in that Sovereign Court of Parliament, and if any thing concerns the jurisdiction of that court, I ought not to be judged here. At which the Court and King's Counsel took great offence.

He said also, There hath been an Act of general Pardon since that time, whereby all treasons are put in utter oblivion; and though sir Henry Vane were excepted, yet none consent that he was that sir Henry Vane. But the King's Counsel said, If he would plead that plea, they would join that issue with him, if he pleased; which, if it should be found against him, it would be too late to plead not guilty.

But the Court said, In favour of life a man may plead a double plea, and give in his exception, and plead over to the felony or treason Not-guilty.

But as to the exceptions taken to the Indictment, they give little heed to them, but pressed him to plead or confess.

Whereupon he pleaded Not Guilty; and had four days, to wit till Friday next, for his trial.

*In Charnock's Case, A. D. 1696, infra, at the prisoner's request the Indictment in Latin was read over to him twice. See the Case infra. After Vane's conviction the King's counsel consented that the Indictment in Latin might be read to him. G Memorandums for and towards my Defence.

Upon hearing the Indictment read, and before Pleading.

First, to lay before the court the impossibility that he humbly conceives is already in view, as to the having any such indifferent and equal trial, as the law intends him, and doth require and command on the behalf of all the free people of England. The rise for this conception he takes from what hath been already done in relation to the prisoner himself, unheard, unexamined and yet kept close prisoner for near two whole years. This he shall leave to the judgment of the court, after that he hath made known the particulars thereof unto them, as necessary to precede the thing demanded of him, in pleading Guilty, or Not Guilty.

Secondly, what is the indifferency which the law requires and appoints throughout, as well in matters that go before the trial, as in the proceedings at the trial itself.

Before the trial, and in the first step to it, which is the keeping and securing his person, Magna Charta is clear, and gives this rule, cap. 29. 'Nullus liber homo capiatur.' &c. No Freeman shall be taken or imprisoned, or be disseised of his freehold or liberties, or free customs, or be outlawed or exiled, or any otherwise destroyed; Nor we will not pass upon him, nor condemn him, but by lawful judgment of his Peers, or by the law of the land: We will sell to no man, we will not deny or defer to any man either justice or right.'

Out of this Chapter, as out of a root (saith Sir Edward Coke) do many fruitful branches of the law of England spring. It contains nine branches; some whereof I shall insist upon in my case.

First, That no man be taken or imprisoned but per legem terræ, that is, by the common law or custom of England; which words per legem terræ, though put last, refer to all the precedent branches.

Secondly, The goods of any offender cannot regularly be taken and seized to the king's use before conviction, nor be inventoried, nor the town charged therewith, before the owner be indicted of record.

Thirdly, no man shall be exiled or banished out of his country, nor be in any sort destroyed but by the verdict of his Peers.

This appears by Bracton and other ancient writers, quoted by Coke, in the third part of his Institutes, fol. 228.

Upon the whole matter, saith Coke, These two conclusions are manifestly proved. 1. That before Indictment, the goods or other things of any offender cannot be searched, inventoried or in any sort seized, nor after indictment, seized, removed, or taken away, before conviction or attainder. 2dly, That the begging of the goods or estate of any delinquent, accused or indicted of any treason, felony, or other offence before he be convicted and attained, is utterly unlawful; Stat. Ri. 1, cap. 3.

And besides, it maketh the prosecution against the delinquent, more precipitant, violent and undue, than the quiet and equal proceeding of the law and justice would permit: Or else, by some underhand agreement, stops or hinders the due course of justice, and discourageth both judge, juror and witness to do their duty.

3rdly, The Judges are not to give so much as their opinion before hand, concerning the offence, whether it prove that offence in that case.

Coke in the chapter of Petty-Treason, fol. 29, expressly saith; 'And to the end the trial may be the more indifferent, seeing the safety of the prisoner consists in the indifferency of the court, the judges ought not to deliver their opinions before hand, of any criminal case that may come before them judicially.' And he there cites Humphrey Stafford's case, that arch-traitor, in which Hussey, Chief Justice, besought Hen. 7, not to demand of them their opinions before hand. And in the 4th of his Institutes in the chapter of the high court of parliament, fol. 37, he fully shews the evil of asking the judges opinions before hand.

But instead of this, The judges being assistant in the Lords' House, when all acts of parliament pass and whose advice is taken in them (as appears by what is declared in the said acts) prejudged by their opinions and the opinions of the parliament before hand, the merit of the cause that now appears to be put upon the issue in my trial. Hereby the Judges are rendered ex parte, and the indifferency the law requires, impossible to be afforded.

Nor is this all; but by the rules declared in the Act of Indemnity, all are disenabled to plead, or make use of the ordinances, orders and votes of both, or either Houses of parliament, that may have occasion thereof: and then by excepting the prisoner and his fellows out of the said act, and all benefit thereby, a door is left open to arraign, bring to trial and sentence the whole cause from the beginning to the ending, in the person of the prisoner, and at the same time, deprive him of all means and possibility of justification and defence.

4thly. It is observable how early hard measure appeared in the way wherein the prisoner became excepted out of the Act of Indemnity, when the Commons his proper judges, declared him in their thoughts, not fit to be endangered in the point of life; yet under the judgment of the Lords, (that ought not to judge commoners, unbrought before them by the Commons, much less, in opposite judgment to the Commons) the Commons were necessitated to yield, lest otherwise the Act of Indemnity to the whole nation should stop upon this dispute and essential difference between the two houses; a competition, easily over-ruled; although (as it proves by the sequel) that Act of Indemnity is like to become felo de se, or a destroyer of itself, if your lordships shall conceive yourselves at liberty, (notwithstanding that act) not only to bring anew into memory upon the stage, the state of all the passed differences, from first to last, but to try and judge the merit of them in my person, and therein call in question the validity of that whole act, and make void the benefit intended by it, in case the war undertaken and managed by both or either of the houses of parliament be judged unlawful, and within the statute of 25 Edw. 3. For this adjudges all the people of England morally guilty of the evil of a sin and offence against the law of nature, which once done, whatever promised indemnity be granted for the present, the evil of the action remains upon record; not only to the infamy of the whole people of England, but their future danger, upon pretence they have forfeited the very indemnity granted.

5thly. The length of time taken to search out matter against the prisoner, and the undue practices and courses to find out witnesses, do further evidence how unlike the prisoner is to have an equal and indifferent trial. He doubts not, this will appear in his two years close imprisonment, (six months whereof was banishment) during which time, he was never so much as once examined, or had any question put to him, whereby he might conjecture wherefore he was committed to prison, any further than was expressed in the warrants of commitments.

Now these were so general, that nothing certain or particular could be gathered out of them. But upon the received opinion, that he was excepted out of the act of indemnity, and in the sense of both houses a great delinquent, his estate was attempted to be inventoried, his rentals demanded, his rents were actually seized in the tenants hands, and they forbidden to pay them, His very courts were prohibited by officers of great personages, claiming the grant of the estate, and threatening his officers from doing their duty. By these kind of undue proceedings the prisoner had not wherewithal to maintain himself in prison; and his debts to the value of above 10,000*l.* were undischarged, either principal or interest. The hopes of private lucre and profit hereby, was such in the tenants and other persons, sought out for far and near, to be witnesses, that it is no wonder at last something by way of charge comes to be exhibited.

And as this is the case of the person before his appearance at this bar, with respect to the foresaid unequal proceedings towards him, and the great disadvantages put upon him, and all these, as it were, in a continued series of design; so, the matters and things themselves with which it now appears he is charged in the indictment, make his case still very extraordinary and unusual, involving him in difficulties that are insuperable, unless God's own immediate power do shew itself in working his deliverance.

The things done, are for many years past, in a time of differences between king and parliament, and wars ensuing thereupon. Many extraordinary changes and revolutions in the state and government were necessitated in the course of God's providence, for wise and holy ends of his above the reach of human wisdom.

The authority by which they are done, is prejudged. The Orders, Votes and Resolutions of parliament are made useless, and forbidden to be produced. Hereby, all manner of defence is taken away from the prisoner; and that which was done according to law, as the laws of those times were, is endeavoured to be made unlawful, and so the persons, acting according to such laws, are brought to punishment.

The Judges (as hath been shewed) are forestalled in their judgments, by the declared sense of parliaments, given ex post facto. The jurors are put upon difficulties never known before, for twelve commoners to judge the actions of all the Commons of England, in whom they are included, as to whose judgment is the right, the one or the other's; and whether their representatives be trusty.

The party indicted is under an incapacity to bring witnesses, as well from the nature of the place wherein the things were done, within the walls of the house, as from the shortness of time, having heard nothing of his charge, and being kept a close prisoner, to the last day. His solicitors and persons employed in his law-business, were also restrained from him.

It is also most evident, that the matters for which he is questioned, being the product of so many years agitations of parliamentary councils and arms, cannot be of a single concern, nor be reputed as the actions of a private man, done of his own head, nor therefore come within any of the six classes of Treason, contained in 25 Ed. 3.

It is a case most unusual, and never happening before in this kingdom; yet it is alledged in the Indictment to be a levying war within that statute, and so comes to have the name of High-Treason put upon it, thereby (if possible) to deprive him of the use and benefit of counsel, as also of competent time to prepare for his Defence, and all fitting and requisite means for the clearing of his innocency. Unto this, unless some remedy be afforded by the justice, candor and favour of this Court, it may be better for the prisoner (for ought he yet knows) to be immediately destroyed by special command (if nothing else will satisfy) within any form of law, as one to whom quarter, after at least two years cool blood, is thought fit to be denied in relation to the late wars. This may seem better, than under a colour and form of justice, to pretend to give him the benefit of the law and the king's courts, whose part it is, to set free the innocent, upon an equal and indifferent trial had before them, if their cause will bear it: but it is very visible beforehand, that all possible means of defence are taken and withheld from him, and laws are made ex post facto, to forejudge the merit of the cause, the party being unheard.

And when he hath said all this, that as a rational man does occur to him, and is fit for him to represent in all humility to the court, he craves leave further to add; That he stands at this bar not only as a man, and a man clothed with the privileges of the most sovereign court, but as a Christian, that hath faith and reliance in God, through whose gracious and wise appointment he is brought into these circumstances, and unto this place at this time, whose will he desires to be found resigned up into, as well in what he now calls him to suffer, as in what he hath called him formerly to act, for the good of his country, and of the people of God in it. Upon this bottom (he blesses the name of his God) he is fearless, and knows the issue will be good, whatever it prove. God's strength may appear in the prisoner's weakness; and the more all things carry the face of certain ruin and destruction unto all that is near and dear to him in this world, the more will divine deliverance and salvation appear; to the making good of that Scripture, 'That he that is content to lose his life in God's cause and way, shall save it, and he that instead thereof goes about to save his life upon undue terms, shall lose it.'

Far be it therefore from me, to have knowingly, maliciously or wittingly offended the law, rightly understood and asserted; much less, to have done any thing that is malum per se, or that is morally evil. This is that I allow not as I am a man, and what I desire with steadfastness to resist, as I am a Christian. If I can judge any thing of my own case, The true reason of the present difficulties and straits I am in, is because I have desired to walk by a just and righteous rule in all my actions, and not to serve the lusts and passions of men, but had rather die, than wittingly and deliberately sin against God and transgress his holy laws, or prefer my own private interest before the good of the whole community I relate unto, in the kingdom where the lot of my residence is cast.

On this day, the Sheriff returned forty-eight freeholders of the county of Middlesex. After thirty-two were challenged by the prisoner, he had a jury of twelve men sworn; to wit, sir William Roberts, jun. sir Christopher Abdy, John Stone, Henry Carter, John Leech, Daniel Cole, Daniel Browne, Thomas Chelsam, Thomas Pitts, Thomas Upman, Andrew Bent, and William Smith.

Attorney General. (Sir Geoffry Palmer.) The Indictment is, 'For traitorously imagining and intending, &c. the death of the king.' This very imagination and compassing, &c. is treason. Yet forasmuch as the intentions of the heart are secret, the law cannot take notice of them, till they are declared by Overt-Act. Therefore we shall give in evidence, That for accomplishing of these intentions, the prisoner sat with others in several Councils, or rather confederacies, incroached the government, levied forces, appointed officers, and at last levied open and actual war, in the head of a regiment. If any of these crimes be proved, it is sufficient to make him guilty within this indictment. And the open levying of war, and appearing in the head of a regiment, is not only a treason of itself, but an evidence of all those other treasons he stands charged with in the Indictment.

These things happening before the Act of Oblivion, you will take notice of that act; and that the prisoner being excepted by name from the benefit of that pardon, though he be chargeable for any crime of treason since the beginning of the late war, yet we shall confine the facts of which we charge him, to the reign of his now majesty.

After the House had voted the late king's Concessions in the Isle of Wight to be a good Ground for Peace, many of the members were kept out by force, others turned out; the peers laid aside, and at last the king murdered. The first thing then that we shall lay to the charge of the prisoner, is, That that very day wherein that horrid act was committed, we find his hand and seal to a Warrant to the officers of the navy to issue out stores for a Summer's Guard of the Narrow Seas. This was the first day of the reign of his now majesty. And so he enumerated all the particulars which he intended to charge him with, and proved them, as followeth,

1. The Warrant of the 30th of Jan. 1649 was proved to be the hand of sir Henry Vane by Thomas Lewis and Thomas Turner, as they believe; neither of them affirming that they saw him write it, but knowing his hand, believed it to be so.

2. Ralph Darnel, an Under-Clerk of the House of Commons, proved the Journal-Book of the House, and said, though he will not take upon him to say when sir Henry Vane was there, and when he was absent, yet he said positively, That at what time soever he is set down in the Journal, to have acted or reported any thing, he was there. In which book Febr. 7, 1649, fol. 653, was the Order to set up a Council of State.

Fol. 684, Febr. 13. where the Instructions presented to the House, upon which the Council of State was to act.

1. The first was, 'That you, or any four or more, are to suppress all and every person and persons pretending title to the kingly government of this nation, from or by the late king; Charles Stuart, his son; or any claiming from or by them or either of them, or any other single person whatsoever.'

This the Attorney said, was in the first part of that Instruction, to destroy the king's person, and in the second part, the kingly government.

2. That you, &c. are appointed to direct the forces of this commonwealth, for the preventing and suppressing of tumults and insurrections at home, or invasions from abroad; and for these ends to raise forces, &c.

3. That Feb. 14, 1649. fol. 695. Sir Henry Vane was chosen a member of the Council of State, and acted upon these Instructions: which they proved thus; to wit, 1. That Sir Henry Vane, as fol. 893, 23rd of March 1649, reported from the Council of State, an Estimate of the Number of Ships for the Summer's Guard of the Narrow Seas. 2. March 30, 1649, Sir Henry Vane reports from the Council of State, That 10,000*l*. Parcel of the 20,000*l*. assessed upon South-Wales for their delinquency, be allowed towards the setting out of this Fleet, for the service of the parliament: which was ordered accordingly, and to be paid to sir Henry Vane, as Treasurer of the Navy. 3. That Sir Henry Vane usually sat in Council; but this deponent being never admitted to go in after the Council was sat, proves that he often saw him go in at the fore-door and back-door, and often continue there all the time the Council was sitting.

William Dobbins and Matthew Lock say, That they several times saw sir Henry Vane sit in a Committee of the Council, in the years 1651 and 1652, which consisted only of members of the council; and particularly at the Committee for Scottish and Irish Affairs, where sir Henry Vane was often in the chair, and produced several orders of that Committee.

Fourthly, Feb. 12, 1649, a new Council of State was chosen, of which sir Henry Vane was one: fol. 720.

Feb. 13, 1649. All the Instructions of the former year were read and assented to.

Feb. 22, 1649, (fol. 760.) Sir Henry Vane reported the Form of an Oath of Secrecy to be administered to every of the members of the Council; which was, to keep all things which should be transacted in Council secret, and to be true and faithful to their Instructions: which the Attorney said (since their first Instructions was, to suppress all persons pretending title from the king) was in effect an oath of abjuration.

Fifthly, Anno 1651, sir Henry Vane was President of the Council of State, and several Warrants were produced, to wit, May 20, 1652, and May 22, 1652, to deliver to Major Wigan 200 Firelocks and ten Drums. The other, for the delivery of 500 Foot-Arms, for Recruit of Colonel Ingoldsby's regiment: and these were subscribed, 'By order of the Council, H. Vane President.'

April 2, 1653. A Warrant of that date was produced by the Commissioners of the Navy, of which he was one, for furnishing out the Hampshire frigate with provisions and ammunition for the use of the state.

From this time to 1659, they charge him with nothing; and then the Journal-Book was produced, and attested by Ralph Darnel, wherein, May 7, 1659, an Order was made for appointing a Committee of Safety, (whereof sir Henry Vane was one) 'That they, or any four or more of them, should take care of the Safety of this Commonwealth, and they to sit for eight days and no longer.' fol. 36.

May 13, 1659. Sir Henry Vane reported, That they had conferred with all the Foreign Ambassadors : that the Commonwealth is in amity with all foreign princes, but Spain.

Resolved, That Ch. Fleetwood, J. Lambert, J. Desborough, James Berry, Arthur Haslerig, Edmund Ludlow, and sir Henry Vane, be Commissioners to nominate commission-officers for the army of this Commonwealth. By virtue hereof, they proceeded, June 17, 1659, to nominate commission-officers, appointed Robert Mosse a colonel, presenting a list of his commission officers; and John Mason to be governor of Jersey.

May 31, fol. 158. Sir Henry Vane reports concerning Affairs between the two northern kings in the Sound, wherein the Affairs of this Commonwealth are concerned.

● Sept. 2, 1659. At the Committee of State at Whitehall : an Order was produced for the re-delivery of the City-horses to their respective owners, signed H. Vane, President.

A Warrant was produced under the hand of sir Henry Vane, proved by Thomas Lewis and one Falconer, for so many hangers to col. Thompson, as he shall require for his regiment.

Three several Letters, to deliver 1,200 Arms for the use of my regiment; to wit, to Sam. Linn, my captain-lieutenant, 30 arms for my company; to major Thomas Shurman, major of my regiment, 4 or 5 barrels of powder.

Then one Marsh was produced a witness, who proves, That sir Henry Vane proposed the new Model of Government, Whitlocke being in the chair, in these particulars :

"1. That the Supreme Power, delegated by the people to their trustees, ought to be, in some fundamentals, not dispensed with.

"2. That it is destructive to the people's liberties (to which by God's blessing they are restored) to admit any earthly king or single person, to the legislative or executive power over this nation.

"3. That the Supreme Power delegated, is not entrusted to the peoples trustees, to erect matters of faith or worship, so as to exercise compulsion therein."

Thomas Pury proves, That he was at the debating of the two last of these Propositions, and believes they were proposed to the chairman Whitlocke by sir Henry Vane: but affirms confidently, that sir Henry Vane gave reasons to maintain them.

Tho. Wallis produced, proves sir Henry Vane and col. Rich in the head of a company in Winchester Park in Southwark; and that the captain lieut. Linn said to the soldiers, That sir Henry Vane had given them five pounds to drink; that the said Linn sent home a key to his wife to send him four pounds out of his trunk, to give the soldiers.

John Cook deposeth, That he was sent to the Horseshoe Stairs to meet sir Henry Vane and col. Rich, and that sir Henry Vane delivered five pounds to capt. Linn to reward the soldiers. This was all the Evidence given by the king's counsel; to which sir Henry Vane was required to make his Defence, and to go through with his case all at once, and not to reply again upon the king's counsel, who resolved to have the last word to the jury.

Sir Henry Vane. Coke, in his Pleas of the Crown, fol. 6, saith, King is to be understood of a King regnant, and in actual possession of a crown, and not of a king when he is only rex de jure, and out of possession. Now an interregnum is confessed by the Indictment : all ensigns of authority, and badges of government, were visibly in another name and stile; the king's best friends suing, and being sued, in another name.

The Court told him, he should first make his case out in point of fact, and it would be then seasonable to stand upon matter of law; for (say they) it is a good rule, in facto jus oritur, and enjoined him to call his witnesses, if he had any.

To which sir Henry Vane desired process of court to summon them, and a further time to answer the charge. But it was told him, the Jury were to be kept without meat, drink, fire or candle, till their verdict was delivered in; and therefore that could not be granted. He then cited the fourth part of Coke's Institutes concerning the privilege of parliament, and that many of these things being transacted there—

The Court here interrupted him, and said, If the things charged were done, justify them; if not, disprove them. So he went to give answer to the fact.

And as to the first Warrant, Jan. 30, 1648-9, he said, That his hand had been oftentimes counterfeited, and amongst other occasions, for two great sums, to the value of 10,000*l.*: and that he had great reason to believe, that this warrant was forged, and produced two witnesses to prove it.

Then said Justice Windham: It may be your hand may have been forged for receiving of money, but it is not to be conjectured, that it should be forged to set ships to sea; and directed to the Jury to consider of the circumstances.

Sir Henry Vane. Neither of the witnesses ever saw me set my hand to either of these Warrants or Orders; nor doth one witness prove that he ever saw me sit in the Council of State. He further said, That he absented from the House from December 3, 1648, till February 7. That he was chosen a member of the Council of State without his consent and knowledge; and being demanded to take an oath of approbation of what had been done to the late king, he refused, and caused it to be expunged; That these actings in council, (if any were) were by authority of a parliament, of a parliament constituted in an extraordinary manner, made indissoluble but by act of parliament. He insisted much on the preamble of that act, so as that parliament being co-ordinate with the king, (for the government was in the king and the two houses) whatever he acted by them or their authority cannot be treason within the statute of 25 Ed. 3.

He cited an Ordinance of parliament in 1642, and said, That he hoped these things had been laid asleep by the Act of Oblivion; and if they should now rise in judgment against him, he feared they would shake that security which the people promised themselves under that act. But if he should be now called in question for those things which were transacted in that parliament, of which he was a member, he shall have the comfort and peace of those actions to support him in his greatest sufferings. He added, That if he were excepted, then must he be judged for the crime of the whole nation, and that crime must be ravelled into through him: that the case is such as never yet fell out, to wit, that the government being intrusted to three estates, they should so fall out among themselves, as the people cannot tell which to obey; that where these great changes fall out, it is not possible for any man to proceed according to all formalities of law; that there was a political power by this act of 17 Caroli co-ordinate with the king; and where these powers are not in conjunction, but in enmity to each other, no Court inferior to the parliament, by whose authority these things were acted, ought to be judges of this case, which certainly never happened before.

He farther saith, He was not the first mover in these actions, and that he should be called in question for these matters by a king that was out of possession at a time when these things were acted, would be inconvenient, to say no more; that when the three estates were disjoined, he thought it the best policy to preserve the government in its root, to wit, the Commons; by whom it was preserved, and at last restored to its former course: that as to the regiment that passed under his name, he disowned it; That reports of Messages are not the fault of the reporter; for his judgment does not always go along with them, but he is bound to deliver his message; That he always loved the government as it is set forth in our ancient law-books; and that that parliament (so much decried) at last restored affairs to the posture in which they now are.

As to the Warrants signed by him, he said, they appear to be signed in the name, and by the Order of the Council; and his hand that subscribes, is not so much as active or passive to the commands of the council. If the council, who commanded the signing were unwarrantable, the parliament who appointed the council must be much more unwarrantable.

And here he offered these points to be considered and prayed earnestly to have counsel assigned him to speak to them.*

1. Whether the collective body of the parliament can be impeached of High Treason?

* See a Note to the Case of Don Pantaleon Sa, ante. vol. 5, p. 456, and a Note to the Case of Twyn, Brewster, Doon and Brooks A. D. 1663. post.

2. Whether any person acting by authority of parliament, can (so long as he acteth by that authority) commit treason?

3. Whether matters acted by that authority, can be called in question in an inferior court?

4. Whether a king de jure, and out of possession, can have treason committed against him, he not being king de facto, and in actual possession? and prayed it might be argued by counsel.

5. Whether matters done in Southwark, in another county, may be given in evidence to a Middlesex jury?

As to the last Exception, the Court said, That he was indicted for compassing and imagining the king's death in Middlesex; and any Overt-Act to prove this imagination, may be given in evidence, wheresoever it be acted. To which sir Henry Vane prayed the benefit of a bill of exception, upon the statute of Westminster 2. cap. 31. and prayed that the justices might seal it; which they all refused, and held, it lay not in any case of the crown.

The King's Counsel desired he might call his witnesses, (if any he had) for if they once came to reply to him, he must then be silent; and consented, that (if it would aid him) they would allow his actings to be in the name and by the authority of the council of state; and the actings of the council of state to be by authority of what he called a parliament.

Sir Henry Vane replied, Then what I acted in the Council of State, and Committee of Safety, constituted by the parliament to endure for eight days, you will allow me: then you must prove that I ever acted in the other Council of State, after the parliament was turned out.

Then the King's Counsel produced a Warrant, dated November 3, 1659, which was sent in pursuance of an Order of the Committee of Safety, by sir Henry Vane, as Treasurer of the Navy. This Warrant was for the sending of divers arms Northwards after Mr. Lambert who was gone down to oppose the now duke of Albemarle.—Sir Henry Vane produced William Angel, Brisco, Middleton, &c. officers of that regiment which went under his name; who having recourse unto him for orders about October 1659, he had them desist, and declared his dissatisfaction in their proceedings: and this, after their several importunities to have orders from him. And thus he closed his Defence.

Solicitor Finch. As to pretence of the Power of Parliament, it is to be known, that it was not the eighth part of the House of Commons; such as were let in to do all that hath been complained, and acting under authority of such an end of a parliament, under such a violation, was no excuse, but an aggravation; but that the parliament was in law ended by the death of the late king, notwithstanding that act of 17 Caroli primi, appears thus;—The king's writ for a parliament is ad tractandum nobiscum; which is intended as well of the natural capacity of the king, as of his politic. 2. It is absurd to say, that the acts of Parliament of king Charles the first, should be his acts in the time of king Charles the second. 3. A Commission of Sewers, enacted to be on foot for ten years, expires by the death of the king, and the authority of the commissioners is at an end. 4. It is not possible for one king to impose a parliament upon a successor. So much for his acting by colour of authority of parliament.—And as to the question, Whether an House of Parliament can commit Treason, If they depart from that allegiance which they have sworn at their first meeting, they are impeachable for it. As to a co-ordination in the parliament, he denied it.—As to the question, Whether the king being out of actual possession, can have treason committed against him? he affirmed it, and said, otherwise, if rebellion should be so prosperous as to depose or oppress the king in battle, the offenders are not to be called in question, because they prevailed. He said it was the plea of Watson the Jesuit, who being indicted for compassing the death of king James in Scotland, after he was declared king of England, and before his actual entering into this realm, made this defence, that the king was never in possession of the crown.

Justice Windham. As to the act of 17 Caroli, and the preamble of that act, so much insisted on by the prisoner; 1. He held, that the parliament had not greater authority by it, but was only made more durable than other parliaments have been; but he held, that the parliament was absolutely dissolved by the death of the king; and put this case: if it should be enacted that such a marriage should continue till it was dissolved by act of parliament; if one dies, it is a determination of it in fact, so as no man can say but it is absolutely dissolved. 2. It must continue in the degree and dignity of a parliament. If the House be under a force, and some kept out, some let in, to serve a turn, whatever they act is a nullity in law. For freedom is the principal essence and honour of a parliament; yet though the House be under a force, the House is not dissolved by such force, but the proceedings are to be suspended, till it acquire its former liberty; and this as well by the common law, as by the civil and canon laws of all other countries. 3. The parliament is the king's great council, the peers are conciliarii nati, if they be forced away, or laid aside, as here they were, all the rest is but magni nominis umbra.

Twisden held the same opinion, That it is not the sitting of a few members within those walls, that will continue it a parliament: and though another parliament, a great many years after the king's death, declared it to be at an end; yet that act was but declaration, it was at an end before. Whether a parliament may commit treason, is not the question; but whether a few of the House shutting out their fellows, and usurping the government, were not traitors?

Forster held the same opinion, and said, The distinction between the politic and natural capacity of the king, was the treason of the two Spencers: that privilege of the parliament is no shelter for breach of the peace, much less for treason.

Twisden added, That to compass the death of the king as a natural person, was treason; to compass his death in his political capacity, as to depose him, was treason; and both provided for by the act of 25 Edw. 3. That in the same instant the late king expired, in the very same his now majesty was king de facto; and affirmed the cases of Watson and Clark, 1 Jac. If an army be raised against the king, and the king is slain in the battle, this treason is questionable by the Successor, as Storie's case is in Dyer. 298. b.*

Thus ended the Questions of law proposed.

The Solicitor spake after to the jury concerning the fact, which after they withdrew to consider, and being withdrawn about half an hour, returned with their verdict; which being delivered by the foreman, in the name of his fellows, with their consent found the prisoner Guilty of High Treason from Jan. 30, 1648-9.

They not only found him Guilty according to the Indictment, which was laid for what the prisoner did, 1659; but for a long series of High Treason, as they reckon, from Jan. 30, 1648-9.

A true Copy of the Prisoner's own Papers containing the Substance of what he pleaded on the said day of his Trial, June 6.

That without any seeking of mine, I was chosen by writ under the great seal, to serve as Burgess for the town of Kingston upon Hull, in the parliament that sat down on the 3rd of November, 1640, and having in pursuance thereof taken my seat in the said parliament, I was obliged by law to give my attendance upon the said trust, as well as upon grounds of duty and conscience.

The said parliament was not only called and assembled after the usual manner, and had the power and privileges incident to that high court, but was by express statute and consent of the three estates so constituted, as to its continuance, adjournment, prorogation and dissolution, that in none of these particulars they were subject to alteration, but by their own common assent, declared by act of parliament, to be passed by themselves for that purpose, with the royal assent.

In the Preamble to the Act for Continuance of the said Parliament, these words are contained: "Whereas great sums of money must of necessity be speedily advanced and provided for the relief of his majesty's army and people in the northern parts of this realm, and for preventing the imminent danger this kingdom is in; and for supply of his majesty's present and urgent occasions, which cannot be so timely effected as is requisite, without credit for raising the said monies; which credit cannot be obtained until such obstacles be first removed, as are occasioned by fears, jealousies and apprehensions of divers his majesty's loyal subjects, That this present parliament may be adjourned, prorogued or dissolved, before justice shall be duly executed upon delinquents, and public grievances redressed, a firm peace between the two nations of England and Scotland concluded, and before sufficient provision be made for the repayment of the said monies so to be raised, &c." By all which the very work that was between the three estates agreed to be done for the good and safety of the kingdom, was in sundry particulars declared and expressed; and not only so, but as is acknowledged by the late king himself in his Answer to the Nineteen Propositions, the power which thereby was legally placed in both Houses, was more than sufficient to prevent and restrain tyranny.

So that, by what hath been shewed, the law itself is with me, and for me, enjoining my continued attendance on the trust which by this means was committed to me, and authorised me in particular to effect the things contained in the said preamble; and to act in all matters belonging to the high court of parliament, for the good and safety of the kingdom in time of imminent danger: I had been liable to great punishment by the law, for disattendance and deserting my station therein, till lawfully or by force dismissed therefrom; and this, whatever occasions others might have, by a voluntary or forced departure from attendance upon that trust.

The actions therefore done by me in this capacity, and according to the law, privileges, customs and power of parliament, and that such a one as was thus extraordinarily constituted, neither are nor can be brought within the statute of 25 Edw. 3, c. 2, nor are to be questioned, tried, much less judged and sentenced, in any inferior court. Nay, so far is it from this, that by a declaration and resolution of parliament, August 13, 1642, it is adjudged to be committing Treason in the highest degree, to bring both or either Houses of Parliament under that or such like imputations.

Nor, till of late, have I ever heard but that those who took the judgment of parliament for their rule and guide, (however tortuous or erroneous it might afterwards be accounted in succeeding times) and they that acted by and under the countenance of their declared judgments, orders or ordinances, ever acknowledged binding during the sitting of the parliament, were safe and indemnified from all punishment. And for government-sake itself, it is requisite it should be so; because none are judges of the power and privileges of parliament but themselves. For admit once that their judgment may be called in question, and disputed by private persons, or by inferior courts, whose votes are included in theirs, the fundamentals of government are plucked up by the roots. 'Par in pares non habet imperium, multo minus in eos qui majus imperium habent.' An equal has no command over his equal, much less over those that have a greater command or authority.

His late majesty, in his Answer to the Nineteen Propositions, does very briefly and exactly state the nature and kind of government that is exercised in this kingdom, saying, "The laws of this kingdom are made by a King, a House of Peers, and a House of Commons, chosen by the People, all having free votes, and particular privilege. These three estates making one incorporate body, are they, in whom the sovereignty and supreme power is placed, as to the making and repealing of laws: And the government, according to these laws, is trusted to the king, who in the interval of parliament is sole in the exercise of government, which, the parliament sitting, he is to exercise in conjunction with the two Houses."

And his said majesty asserting three sorts of government, Absolute Monarchy, Aristocracy and Democracy, does most rightly distinguish the Monarchy of England from all those three, and commends the constitution of this kingdom, as it is a mixture of all three, having the conveniences of them all without the inconveniences of any one, as long as the balance hangs even between the three estates, that they run jointly on in their proper channels, and that the overflowing of either on either side, raise no deluge nor inundation.

By the passing of the aforesaid act for the continuance of the fore-mentioned parliament, the intervals of parliament were no longer, as before, at the will and pleasure of the king; but the power to continue in the said parliament, without adjournment, prorogation or dissolution, resided in the two Houses with the king jointly, and in none of them severally: so that in effect the government of the kingdom, during the continuance of that parliament, was in conjunction of the three estates, and in their common consents and agreements among themselves given in parliament; the assembling and meeting whereof was appointed and fixed to a place certain, by law.

By reason hereof, it is not the attendance of any of the members in parliament (for discharge of the trust reposed in them, confirmed and enlarged by the said act) that is faulty or censurable by the law, but those that unwarrantably depart and desert that their trust and station, are to be blamed; 6 Hen. 8, 16.

The king in conjunction with the parliament, is maximè Rex, and is supported in the throne and exercise of his regal power by the joint concurrence of both Houses. And because, as his late majesty well observed, the happiness and good of the constitution of this government lies in keeping the balance even between the three estates, containing themselves within the bounds of their proper channels, therefore in attempts of either to overflow those bounds, they being co-ordinate, the office of a parliament is by the very fundamental constitution of the government, to keep this balance well poised. And to that end, as was before mentioned, his majesty's own words are, in his said Answer to the Nineteen Propositions; 'That there was legally placed in both Houses, a power more than sufficient to prevent and restrain the power of tyranny.' If so, then are they the legal judges, when there is danger of tyranny; and have legal power to require their judgment and resolves to be obeyed, not only when arms are actually raised against them, but when they discern and accordingly declare a preparation towards it; else they may find it too late to prevent the power of tyranny. There is no greater attempt of tyranny, than to arm against the parliament; and there is no visible way for the restraining such tyranny, but by raising arms in their own and the kingdom's defence. Less than this is not sufficient, and therefore far from more than sufficient for the punishment of delinquents, and restraint of tyranny.

Unto the king, in conjunction with his two houses, according as is provided by the law in this capacity of his, as marime Rex, was the duty of allegiance to be yielded by his subjects during the indissolved state of that parliament: for they were the king's great council, and supreme court, exercising the known power and privileges, that time out of mind have appertained to them, and been put forth by them, as the exigents of the kingdom have required, when differences have happened about the very title of the crown, in declaring the duty of the subject, by yielding their allegiance to kings de facto, when kings de jure have been kept out of possession. This our chronicles, and the histories of former times, do plentifully inform.

The causes that did happen to move his late majesty to depart from his parliament, and continue for many years, not only at a distance, and in disjunction from them, but at last, in a declared posture of enmity and war against them, are so well known, and fully stated in print (not to say, written in characters of blood) on both parts, that I shall only mention it, and refer to it.

This matter was not done in a corner: the appeals were solemn, and the decision by the sword was given by that God, who being the judge of the whole world, does right and cannot do otherwise.

By occasion of these unhappy differences thus happening, most great and unusual changes and revolutions, like an irresistible torrent, did break in upon us, not only to the disjoining that parliamentary assembly among themselves (the head from the members, the co-ordinates from each other, and the houses within themselves) but to the creating such formed divisions among the people, and to the producing such a general state of confusion and disorder, that hardly any were able to know their duty, and with certainty to discern who were to command, and who to obey. All things seemed to be reduced, and, in a manner, resolved into their first elements and principles.

Nevertheless, as dark as such a state might be, the law of England leaves not the subject thereof (as I humbly conceive) without some glimpses of direction what to do: in the cleaving to, and pursuing of which, I hope I shall not be accounted nor adjudged an offender; or if I am, I shall have the comfort and peace of my actions to support me in and under my greatest sufferings.

The resolutions of all the judges in Calvin's Case, entitled Post-nati,* in the 7th book of Coke's Reports, and the learned arguments thereupon, afford me instruction even in this matter. It may be it is truly thence affirmed, That allegiance is due only to the king, and how due, is also shewed.

The king is acknowledged to have two capacities in him; one a natural, as he is descended of the blood royal of the realm; and the body natural he hath in this capacity, is of the creation of Almighty God, and mortal. The other is a politic capacity, in respect of which he is a body politic or mystical, framed by the policy of man, which is immortal and invisible. To the king, in both these capacities conjoined, allegiance is due; that is to say, to the natural person of the king, accompanied with his politic capacity, or the politic appropriated to the natural.

The politic capacity of the king hath properly no body nor soul; for it is framed by the policy of man.

In all indictments of treason, when any one does intend the death and destruction of the king, it must needs be understood of his natural body, the other being immortal. The indictment therefore concludes contra ligeantiam suæ debitum, against the duty of his allegiance; so that allegiance is due to the natural body.

Admitting then, that thus by law, allegiance is due to the king, (as before recited) yet it is always to be presumed, that it is to the king in conjunction with the parliament, the law and the kingdom, and not in disjunction from, or opposition to them; and that while a parliament is in being, and cannot be dissolved, but by the consent of the three estates.

This is therefore that which makes the matter in question, a new case, that never before happened in the kingdom, nor was possible to happen, unless there had been a parliament constituted, as this was, unsubjected to adjournment, prorogation, or dissolution, by the king's will. Where such a power is granted, and the co-ordinates thereupon disagree and fall out, such effects and consequences as these that have happened will but too probably follow. And if either the law of nature or England inform not in such case, it will be impossible for the subjects to know their duty, when that power and command which ought to flow from three in conjunction, comes to be exercised by all or either of them, singly and apart, or by two of them against one.

When new and never-heard of changes do fall out in the kingdom, it is not likely that the known and written laws of the land should be the exact rule; but the grounds and rules of justice, contained and declared in the law of nature, are and ought to be a sanctuary in such cases, even by the very common law of England: for thence originally spring the unerring rules that are set by the divine and eternal law, for rule and subjection in all states and kingdoms.

In contemplation hereof, as the Resolve of all the Judges, it was agreed;

1. That allegiance is due to sovereignty by the law of nature; to wit, that law which God, at the creation of man, infused into his heart for his preservation and direction, the law eternal. Yet it is not this law, as it is in the heart of every individual man, that is binding over many; or legislative, but as it is the act of a community, or an associated people, by the right dictates and persuasions of the work of this law in their hearts. This appears in the case of the Israelites, Judges, chap. 20 & 21, cited in the 4th part of Coke's Institutes, where mention is made of a parliament, without a king, that made war, and that with their brethren: they met as one man to do it, in vindication of that justice unto which they were obliged even by the law of nature. This is that which chancellor Fortescue calls political power here in England; by which, as by the ordinance of man, in pursuance of the ordinance of God, the regal office is constituted, or the king's politic capacity, and becomes appropriated to his natural person.

Thus politic power is the immediate efflux and offspring of the law of nature, and may be called a part of it. To this, Hooker in his Ecclesiastical Polity agrees, and Selden on that subject.

The law of nature thus considered, is part of the law of England, as is evident by all the best received law books, Bracton, Fleta, Lamhard upon the Saxon laws, and Fortescue in the praise of the laws of England. This is the law that is before any judicial or municipal law, as the root and fountain whence these and all government, under God and his law, do flow.

This politic power, as it is exercised in conjunction with, and conformity to the eternal law, partakes of its moral and immutable nature, and cannot be changed by act of parliament. Of this law it is that Magna Charta, and the Charter of Forest, with other statutes rehearsed in the Petition of Right, are for the most part declaratory: for they are not introductive of any new law, but confirmations of what was good in all laws of England before. This agrees with that maxim, 'Salus Populi suprema Lex;' that being made due and binding by this law, which in the judgment of the community, declaring their mind by their own free chosen delegates and trustees in harmony with the eternal law, appears profitable and necessary for the preservation and good of the whole society.

This is the law, which is put forth by the common consent of the whole realm, in their representative; and (according to the fundamental constitutions of this kingdom) is that with which the kings of this land, by the joint co-operation of the three estates, do make and repeal laws.

But through the disorders and divisions of the times, these two powers, the regal and political, (which according to the law of England, make up but one and the same supreme authority) fell asunder, and found themselves in disjunction from an opposition to one another. I do not say the question is now, Which of these is most rightly (according to the principles of the law of nature, and the law of England) to be adhered unto and obeyed? but unto whether power adherence is a crime in such an exigent of state? which, since it is such a new and extraordinary case, evidently above the track of the ordinary rules, contained in the positive and municipal laws of England, there can be no colour to bring it within the statute of 25 Ed. 3, cap. 2, forasmuch as all statutes presuppose these two powers, regal and political, in conjunction, perfect unity, and subserviency, which this case does not, cannot admit. So exceeding new and extraordinary a case is it, that it may be doubted whether, and questioned how far any other parliament, but that parliament itself that was privy to all its own actings and intentions, can be an indifferent and competent judge. But however, the point is of so abstruse and high consideration, as no inferior court can or ought to judge of it, as by law books is most undeniable, to wit, Bracton, and others.

This, then, being the true state of the case, and the spring of that contest that ensued, and received its decision by the late war, the next consideration is, how far I have had my share and part therein, that by the laws is not warrantable, or by what appears in way of proof to the jury.

For the first, I shall crave leave to give you this account of myself, who have best known my own mind and intentions throughout, and would not now, to save my life, renounce the principles of that righteous cause, which my conscience tells me was my duty to be faithful unto.

I do therefore humbly affirm, that in the afore-mentioned great changes and revolutions, from first to last, I was never a first mover, but always a follower, chusing rather to adhere to things than persons, and (where authority was dark or dubious) to do things justifiable by the light and law of nature, as that law was acknowledged part of the law of the land; things that are in se bona, and such as, according to the grounds and principles of the common law, as well as the statutes of this land, would warrant and indemnify me in doing them. For I have observed by precedents of former times, when there have arisen disputes about titles to the crown, between kings de facto, and kings de jure, the people of this realm wanted not directions for their safety, and how to behave themselves within the duty and limits of allegiance to the king and kingdom, in such difficult and dangerous seasons.

My lord Coke is very clear in this point, in his chapter of Treasons, fol. 7. And if it were otherwise, it were the hardest case that could be for the people of England: for then they would be certainly exposed to punishment from those that are in possession of the supreme power, as traitors, if they do any thing against them, or do not obey them; and they would be punishable as traitors by him that hath right, and is king de jure, in case they do obey the kings de facto: and so all the people of England are necessarily involved in treasons, either against the powers de facto, or de jure, and may by the same reason be questioned for it, as well as the prisoner, if the Act of Indemnity and the king's pardon did not free them from it. The security then and safety of all the people of England is by this means made to depend upon a pardon, (which might have been granted or denied) and not upon the sure foundations of common law: an opinion, sure, which (duly weighed and considered) is very strange, to say no more.

For I would gladly know that person in England of estate and fortune, and of age, that hath not counselled, aided, or abetted, either by his person or estate, and submitted to the laws and government of the powers that then were: and if so; then by your judgments upon me, you condemn (in effigies, and by necessary consequence) the whole kingdom.

And if that be the law, and be now known to be so, it is worth consideration, whether if it had been generally known and understood before, it might not have hindered his majesty's Restoration.

Besides, although, until this Judgment be passed upon me, the people have apprehended themselves as free from the question, and out of danger, by reason of the act of indemnity and general pardon; yet when it shall appear to them that such their safety is not grounded on the common law, nor upon the law of nature, but that against both these and their actions they are found faulty, and tainted with a moral guilt, and that as principals also, (since in treason there are no accessaries) what terrifying reflections must this needs stir up in the mind of every man, that will be apt to believe his turn will come next, at least once in two years; as hath befallen me in my person, who (however I have been misjudged and misunderstood) can truly affirm, that, in the whole series of my actions, that which I have had in my eye hath been to preserve the ancient well-constituted government of England on its own basis and primitive righteous foundations, most learnedly stated by Fortescue in his book made in praise of the English laws. And I did account it the most likely means for the effecting of this, to preserve it, at least in its root; whatever changes and alterations it might be exposed unto in its branches, through the blustering and stormy times that have passed over us.

This is no new doctrine in a kingdom acquainted with political power, as Fortescue shews ours is, describing it to be in effect the common assent of the realm, the will of the people or whole body of the kingdom, represented in parliament. Nay, though this representation (as hath fallen out) be restrained for a season to the Commons house, in their single acting, into which (as we have seen) when by the inordinate fire of the times, two of the three estates have for a season been melted down, they did but retire into their root, and were not hereby in their right destroyed, but rather preserved, though as to their exercise laid for a while asleep, till the season came of their revival and restoration.

And whatever were the intents and designs of others who are to give an account of their own actions, it is sufficient for me that at a time critical and decisive, though to my own hazard and ill usage, I did, declare my refusal of the Oath of Abjuration, which was intended to be taken by all the members of parliament, in reference to kingly government, and the line of his now majesty in particular. This I not only positively refused to take, but was an occasion of the second thoughts which the parliament reassumed thereof, till in a manner they came wholly at last to decline it: A proof undeniable of the remoteness of any intentions or designs of mine, as to the endeavouring any alteration or change in the government; and was that which gave such jealousy to many in the house, that they were willing to take the first occasion to shew their dislike of me, and to discharge me from sitting among them.

But to return to what I have before affirmed; as to my being no leading or first actor, in any Change; it is very apparent by my deportment at the time when that great Violation of Privileges happened to the parliament, so as by force of arms several members thereof were debarred coming into the House, and keeping their seats there. This made me forbear to come to the parliament for the space of ten weeks, to wit, from the 3rd of December 1648, till towards the middle of February following, or to meddle in any public transactions; and during that time the matter most obvious to exception, in way of alteration of the government, did happen. I can therefore truly say, that as I had neither consent nor vote at first in the Resolutions of the Houses, concerning the Non-Addresses to his late majesty, so neither had I in the least any consent in, or approbation to his death: But on the contrary, when required by the parliament to take an oath, to give my approbation ex post facto to what was done, I utterly refused, and would not accept of sitting in the Council of State upon those terms, but occasioned a new oath to be drawn, wherein that was omitted. Hereupon many of the Council of State sat, that would take the other.

for changing the government into a Commonwealth or Free State were passed, some weeks before my return to parliament: Yet afterwards, so far as I judged the same consonant to the principles and grounds, declared in the laws of England, for upholding that political power which hath given the rise and introduction in this nation to monarchy itself, by the account of ancient writers, I conceived it my duty, as the state of things did then appear to me, notwithstanding the said alteration made, to keep my station in the parliament, and to perform my allegiance therein to king and kingdom, under the powers then regnant, (upon my principles before declared) yielding obedience to their authority and commands. And having received trust in reference to the safety and preservation of the kingdom, in those times of imminent danger, both within and without, I did conscientiously hold myself obliged to be true and faithful therein. This I did upon a public account, not daring to quit my station in parliament by virtue of my first writ: Nor was it for any private or gainful ends to profit myself, or enrich my relations. This may appear as well by the great debt I have contracted, as by the destitute condition my many children are in, as to any provision made for them. And I do publicly challenge all persons whatsoever, that can give any information of any bribes or covert ways used by me, during the whole time of my public acting. Therefore I hope it will be evident to the consciences of the jury, that what I have done hath been upon principles of integrity, honour, justice, reason, and conscience, and not, as is suggested in the Indictment, by 'Instigation of the devil, or want of the fear of God.'

A second great Change that happened upon the constitutions of the parliament, and in them of the very kingdom itself, and the laws thereof, (to the plucking up the liberties of it by the very roots, and the introducing of an arbitrary regal power, under the name of Protector, by force and the law of the Sword) was the usurpation of Cromwell; which I opposed from the beginning to the end, to that degree of suffering and with that constancy, that well near had cost me not only the loss of my estate, but of my very life, if he might have had his will, which a higher than he hindered: yet I did remain a prisoner, under great hardships, four months in an Island, by his orders.

Hereby, that which I have asserted is most undeniably evident, as to the true grounds and ends of my actions all along, that were against usurpation on the one hand, or such extraordinary actions on the other, as I doubted the laws might not warrant or indemnify, unless I were enforced thereunto by an over-ruling and inevitable necessity.

The third considerable Change was the total disappointing and removing of the said Usurpation, and the returning again of the members of parliament to the exercise of their primitive and original trust, for the good and safety of the kingdom, so far as the state of the times would then permit them; being so much, as they were, under the power of an army, that for so long a time had influenced the government. Towards the recovery therefore of things again into their own channel, and upon the legal root of the peoples liberties, to wit, their common consent in parliament, given by their own deputies and trustees, I held it my duty to be again acting in public affairs in the capacity of a member of the said parliament, then re-entered, upon the actual exercise of their former power, or at least struggling for it. In this season I had the opportunity of declaring my true intentions as to the government, upon occasion of refusing the Oath of Abjuration before mentioned.

And whereas I am charged with keeping out his majesty that now is, from exercising his regal power and royal authority in this his kingdom; through the ill-will borne me by that part of the parliament then sitting, I was discharged from being a member thereof about Jan. 9, 1660, and by many of them was charged, or at least strongly suspected, to be a royalist. Yea, I was not only discharged from my attendance in parliament, but confined as a prisoner at my own house, some time before there was any visible power in the nation that thought it seasonable to own the king's interest. And I hope my sitting still will not be imputed as a failure of duty, in the condition of a prisoner, and those circumstances I was then in. This I can say, That from the time I saw his majesty's Declarations from Breda, declaring his intentions and resolutions as to his return, to take upon him the actual exercise of his regal office in England, and to indemnify all those who had been actors in the late differences and wars, (as in the said Declaration doth appear) I resolved not to avoid any public question, (if called thereto) as relying on mine own innocency, and his majesty's declared favour, as before said. And for the future, I determined to demean myself with that inoffensiveness and agreeableness to my duty, as to give no just matter of new provocation to his majesty in his government. All this, for my part, hath been punctually observed, whatever my sufferings have been. Nor am I willing in the least to harbour any discouraging thoughts in my mind as to his majesty's generosity and favour towards me, who have been faithful to the trust I was engaged in, without any malicious intentions against his majesty, his crown, or dignity, as before hath been shewed; and I am desirous for the future to walk peaceably and blamelessly.

Whatever therefore my personal sufferings have been since his majesty's Restoration, I rather impute them to the false reports and calumnies of mine enemies, and misjudgers of my actions, than reckon them as any thing that hath proceeded from his majesty's proper inclination, whose favour and clemency I have had just reason, with all humility, to acknowledge.

First, with regard to his majesty's Speech, made the 27th of July, 1660, in the House of Peers, wherein his majesty expressly declared it to be no intention of his that a person under my circumstances should be excepted out of the Act of Indemnity, either for life or estate.

And Secondly, However it was the parliament's pleasure (myself unheard, though then in the Tower, and ready to have been brought before them) to except me out of the common Indemnity, and subject me to question for my actions, yet they themselves of their own accord (admitting the possibility that in such questioning of me I might be attained) made it their humble desire to his majesty, that in such case execution, as to my life, might be remitted. Upon this his majesty readily gave his grant and assent. And I do firmly believe, if the Houses had pleased to give me the opportunity and leave of being heard, they would never have denied me the Indemnity granted to the rest of the nation.

That which remains of further Charge yet to me is the business of a Regiment, an employment which I can in truth affirm, mine own inclinations, nature, and breeding, little fitted me for, and which was intended only as honorary and titular, with relation to volunteers, who, by their application to the Council of State, in a time of great commotions, did propound their own officers, and, (without any seeking of mine, or not considering any farther of it, than as the use of my name) did, among others, nominate me for a colonel, which the Council of State approved, granting Commissions to myself, and all other officers relating thereto; and the parliament confirmed my said commission, upon report thereof made to them.

This will appear by several witnesses I have to produce in this matter, that will be able to affirm how little I took upon me, or at all, to give any orders, or make use of such my Commission, any otherwise than in name only.

It is true, indeed, that at a certain time, when I was summoned to appear at the Committee of the Militia, in Southwark, whereof I was a member, that which was called my own company of foot, from the respect which they and their officers pretended to me, were desirous to be in a posture fit for me to see them; and as I passed by, I took the opportunity, at their desire, to shew myself to them, and only, as taking notice of their respect, in some few words, expressing the reason I had to receive it in good part, I told them I would no longer detain them from their other occasions. After I was gone from them, I appointed my captain-lieut. to give them from me something to drink, as might be fitting on such an occasion, which, to my best remembrance, was 5*l.*; and he laid it out of his own money.

More than this, as I remember, was not done by me; so much as to the seeing any more the companies of that regiment gathered together, or giving orders to them: Which I publicly and avowedly declined, persuading the officers to lay down their Charges in mine own example, so soon as I discerned the intentions of the sitting down of the Committee of Safety, and the exorbitant power committed to them to exercise, and the way of proceedings by the army, in interesting themselves in the civil government of the nation, which I utterly disliked.

And although I forbore, not to keep my station, in reference to the Council of State, while they sat, or as a Commissioner of the Admiralty, during the time by them appointed to act by parliamentary authority, and so had occasion to be daily conversant with the members of the Committee of Safety (whereof myself, with others that would not accept, were named;). yet I perfectly kept myself disinterested from all those actings of the army, as to any consent or approbation of mine, (however, in many things, by way of discourse, I did not decline converse with them) holding it my duty to penetrate as far as I could into their true intentions and actions; but resolving within myself to hold true to my parliamentary trust in all things wherein the parliament appeared to me to act for the safety and good of the kingdom. However, I was misinterpreted, and judged by them as one that rather favoured some of the army, and their power.

Upon the whole matter, there is not any precedent that ever both or either of the houses of parliament did commit treason: For though privilege of parliament does not so hold in treason, but that particular members may be punished for it, yet it is unprecedented, that both or either houses of parliament, as a collective body, ever did or could commit treason.

All the acts done in parliaments have been reversed indeed, and repealed, as what was done 11 Rd. 2. was repealed 21 Rd. 2. and what was done 21 Rd. 2. was repealed 1 Hen. 4. 3. as appears by the printed Statutes: Yet I do not find that both or either house of parliament were declared traitors for what they did in those parliaments; or that any which acted under them suffered for the same in any inferior Courts. And surely the reason is obvious: For they had a co-ordinancy in the supreme or legislative power for the making altering, and repealing laws. And if so, 'par in parem non habet imperium.' And by authorities out of Bracton, Fleta, and others, it may appear what superiors the king himself hath, (who yet hath no peer in his kingdom, 'nisi curiam baronum,') God, law, and parliament.

And if either or both Houses cannot commit treason, then those that act by their authority cannot: For, 'Plus peccat autor quam actor,' the author offends more than the actor. If those that command do not, nor can commit treason, how can those that act by their authority be guilty of it?

Further, I must crave leave to assert, by reason of what I see opened upon the Evidence, that what is done in parliament, or by their authority, ought not to be questioned in any other Court: For every offence committed in any Court, must be punished in the same, or in some higher, and not any inferior Court. Now the Court of parliament hath no superior Court, as is said in "Coke's Jurisdiction of Courts." And the reason there given that Judges ought not to give any opinion in a matter of parliament, is, Because it is not to be decided by the common laws, but 'secundum legem et consuetudinem parliamenti.' This the Judges in divers parliaments have confessed. And that reason is not to be waved, which the lord Coke gives, That a man can make no defence; for what is said and acted there, is done in council, and none ought to reveal the secrets of the House: Every member hath a judicial voice, and can be no witness.

June the 11th.

After the customary formalities of the Court, The Clerk demanded of sir Henry Vane what he had to say why Sentence of death should not be passed upon him?

Sir Henry Vane first alledged, That he had not yet heard the Indictment read in Latin. The debate upon this took up some time: At length some of the king's counsel desired that the prisoner might be satisfied in that point. Sir Henry desired that counsel then might also be assigned him, to make Exceptions thereto, if they found cause; otherwise he valued not the hearing of it read in Latin. This was overruled by the Court: He soon therefore desisted from any further urging it.

The next thing sir Henry offered in his own Defence was the Bill of Exceptions, which he brought with him ready drawn, and offered it to the Judges, desiring them, according to the Statute of Westm. 2. 31. made 13 Edw. 1, to sign it. This he urged so home, that the Statute was consulted and read in open Court, running in favour of the prisoner to this effect: "That if any man find himself aggrieved by the proceedings against him before any justices, let him write his Exception, and desire the justices to set their seals to it." "This act was made (says Coke) that the party wronged might have a foundation for a legal process against the justices by a Writ of Error, having his Exception entered upon record in the Court where the injury is done, which through the justices overruling it, they could not before procure, so the party grieved was without remedy; for whose relief this statute was made. The justices refusing to set their seals, the party grieved may have a writ grounded on this statute, commanding them to set their seals to his Exception. This Exception extends not only to all pleas dilatory and peremptory, &c. but to all challenges of any jurors, and any material evidence, given to any jury, by which the Court is overruled." As in this prisoner's Case the Testimony about falsifying of his hand to writing, &c. was, by what was offered to the jury by justice Windham.

Further, says Coke on this statute, "If the justice (or justices) die, their executors or administrators may be proceeded against for the injury done. And if the judge (or judges) deny to seal the Exception, the party wronged may in the Writ of Error take issue thereupon, if he can prove by witnesses the judge or judges denied to seal it."

Notwithstanding all this, the judges overruled this plea also, by such interpretation as themselves put upon that statute, to wit, That it was not allowable in criminal cases for life. This makes the law less careful for the preservation of a man's life, than any particulars of his estate, in controversies about which this statute is affirmed by them to hold. Whereas life is the greater, and innocent blood, when spilt, is irreversible, as to the matter, it cannot be gathered up again: The estate is the lesser; and if an erroneous judgment pass about it, it is reversible upon traverse, Writ of Error, or otherwise.

The reason they alledged for their pretended Opinion was this, That if it be held in criminal cases for life, every felon in Newgate might lead the same, and so there would be no Gaol-Delivery.

Sir Henry answered, His case was not the case of common felons, alledging the grant of his majesty to the Petition of both Houses for his life, in case he should be attainted. There is no need therefore sure (said he) of fearing the consequence of spinning out the time a little with a person in his circumstances. Besides, (he said) he had been a prisoner two years, and never called on to give any account of himself and his actions, (so is it not with felons;) which, with other considerations, may sufficiently evince that there is no need of such hastening his death. He told them withal, that he desired not this for his own sake only, but for theirs, and for posterity; that they might, on a more leisurely and unprejudiced hearing of what may be said on all hands, prevent the bringing of innocent blood upon themselves and the land.

But being in this also overruled by the Court, (say what he would) he only desired he might understand whether they would all give it as their common judgment they would stand to, That what he desired was not his due by the law? By this means they were all put upon it, one by one, to declare themselves in that point, unanimously denying him the benefit of that Act. To the by-standers their chief reason seemed to be, That it had not been practised this hundred or two of years.

The third thing sir Henry desired was, That the Petition of both Houses, with his majesty's Answer thereunto, might be read in the Court; which, after some dispute, was concluded to be a thing they were not bound to take notice of, not being an act of parliament. Yet what is any act of parliament, but a bill presented with the Petition of both Houses to his majesty, with his royal assent thereto, upon public record? At length they condescended to read it; and that was all.

The fourth and last thing sir Henry Vane offered to the consideration of the bench was this, That in regard there were Questions touching matter of law in his case, which must receive their determination in parliament, he desired he might have counsel assigned him, to argue them before their lordships. Some of these points he instanced in, to wit ;

1. Whether a parliament were accountable to any inferior Court ?

2. Whether the king, being out of possession, and the power regent in others—

Here they stopped him, not suffering him to proceed, nor admitting that the king was ever out of possession. To which sir Henry replied, The words of his Indictment ran thus, 'That he endeavoured to keep out his majesty ;' and how could he keep him out of the realm, if he were not out ?

But when he saw they would over-rule him in all, and were bent upon his condemnation, he put up his Papers, appealing to the righteous judgment of God, who (he told them) must judge them as well as him, often expressing his satisfaction to die upon this Testimony ; which Keeling, one of the king's counsel, insultingly answered, 'So you may, Sir, in good time, by the grace of God.' The same person had often before shewed a very snappish property towards the prisoner ; and sir Henry sometimes answered him according to his folly : For when he would have had the book out of the prisoner's hand, wherein was the statute of Westminster, 2d. c. 31 ; Sir Henry told him, 'He had a very officious memory, and when he was of counsel for him, he would find him books.' (Whereby was verified what was said to be spoken by him, at first, in answer to one of his brethren, on the Arraignment-day, "Though we know not what to say to him, we know what to do with him.")

The BILL OF EXCEPTIONS, translated out of the best Latin form the prisoner could procure ; no counsellor learned in the law daring to assist him in those circumstances, without assignment from the Court, which was denied.

First, Concerning my Imprisonment.

(1.) I shall here mention my entrance into this new scene of sufferings under the present power (after my having been handled at will and pleasure, under the six years usurpation of Cromwell) which I conceive not to have been at all according to the law of the land, as may appear by the 29th chap. of Magna Charta, and Coke upon it, with many other Statutes and law-books : in all which it appears that the law of England is so tender, not to say curious, in providing for the subject's liberty, that he is not to suffer the least restraint, confinement or imprisonment, but by the lawful judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land. Contrary to all which, I was committed at mere will and pleasure, and have been detained close prisoner these two years, without any cause specified, or any particular crime laid to my charge.

Secondly, Concerning Transactions at the Grand Jury.

(2.) The Grand Jury of Middlesex, without my privity, knowledge or presence (after I had been kept a close prisoner two full years) did meet, take the Depositions of witnesses, and find the Bill against me, which inevitably exposed me to a trial at the King's-Bench bar, for I knew not what : whereas major Rolfe and others have had the right of Englishmen granted them, to be present at the Grand Jury's proceedings ; yea, and to have counsel also present to plead any thing in a way of reason or law, for invalidating the testimony, or disabling the witnesses, whereby the Indictment hath been immediately quashed ; and so the party accused delivered from any shadow of infamy, by so much as appearing in the circumstances of a malefactor at any public bar of justice. That this Prisoner had great need of that privilege of being present himself, or having counsel and other friends present at the Grand Jury, will appear hereafter, by the subdolous and injurious handling of matters there.

Thirdly, Concerning the Jurisdiction of the Court.

(3.) The offences supposed to be committed by me, are things done not of my own head, but as a member of the Long Parliament, or in pursuance of their authority. The matters done by me, in the one respect or other, if they be deemed offences, are punishable only in parliament ; and I ought not to be questioned for them in any inferior court, as Coke shews in the 4th part of his Institutes, chap. 1, concerning the High Court of Parliament. For the parliament is not confined in their actings by the law, which inferior courts are tied up to ; but in divers cases are privileged to act extraordinarily and unaccountably to any but themselves, or succeeding parliaments. Moreover, that parliament was extraordinarily commissioned, qualified and authorized by express act of parliament, beyond all preceding parliaments, for the causes and ends declared in the preamble of the Act for their establishment, accorded and passed by the joint consent of King, Lords and Commons, whereby they became unsubjected to adjournment, prorogation or dissolution, but by their own respective voluntary consents, to be by them expressed and passed for that purpose, with the royal assent ; which occasioned his late majesty, in his Answer to the Nineteen Propositions, to say, "That the power hereby legally placed in both houses, was more than sufficient to prevent and restrain the power of tyranny."

And further, the bringing of this case under the jurisdiction of this court, or of any other but a parliament, may prove of very dangerous consequence, in point of precedent, and most disagreeing to all rules of justice. For, First, By the same reason that I am questioned in this court, not only every member of parliament, but the very houses themselves, with all their debates, votes and orders, may not only be questioned, but referred to a petty-jury, and so come to be judged and sentenced by a court inferior to themselves ; which judges in all times have disclaimed and acknowledged to be out of their power, according to the known rule, "Par in pares non habet imperium, multo minus in eos qui majus imperium habent."—Secondly, In such case the parties accused will be debarred of evidence or witness for their justification and defence. For no members, &c. present at debates in parliament, (who are the only eye and ear-witnesses of what is said and done there) ought to discover the counsels of the House.

Fourthly, Concerning the Indictment.

1. I have not been permitted to have a copy or sight of the Indictment, nor so much as to hear it read in Latin, which is the original record of the court, and ought to be the foundation of their whole proceeding with me. I often desired these things of the court; yea, or at least to have but the transcripts of some particular clauses in the Indictment, to enable me to shew the deficiencies thereof in law, (all which, others in such cases have often obtained) but nothing would be granted herein.

This then was my hard lot and usage; I was put (after two years close imprisonment) to answer for my life to a long Indictment read in English, which whether it were rightly translated how should I know, that might not hear the original record in Latin? Counsel also learned in the law were denied me, though pressed for by me again and again, before I pleaded. And had they been granted, what could they have said as to defects of law in the Indictment, unless they might have a copy of it? What can any counsel say to any petty business concerning any part of a man's estate that is in controversy, unless they may have a leisurely view and perusal of the writings thereabouts? Much more sure will it appear requisite to the reason of all mankind, when a man's whole estate, life and all, are at stake. It is true, before I pleaded, the Court promised I should have Counsel assigned me after pleading ["God defend else," said the Lord Chief Justice] but it is as true, I never could yet see that promise made good. All things tending to a fair trial were promised me in general before pleading, but every material particular for the just defence of my life, hath been denied me ever since. And my trial for life was huddled up the next day of my appearing before you: the Jury (as was told me) must not eat nor drink till they had done their work: (so the more than forty Jewry-men that resolved to kill Paul, Acts xxiii. 21.) But why such haste and precipitancy for a man's life, that is more than meat or estate, when you can let civil causes about mens estates depend many years? And if an erroneous judgment be passed in such matters, it is reversible; but if innocent blood be spilt, it cannot be gathered up again, as the wise woman of Tekoah said, 2 Sam. xiv.

2. But secondly, then, as to Defects in the Indictment, which I was in some measure enabled to observe from that broken hearing thereof, that was afforded me here in the court; I say there are many, and those very considerable: and by the law of England I ought not to have been urged to plead or make answer to any such an illegal and defective indictment.

1. There is no sufficient Overt-Act therein alledged of the prisoner's imagining the king's death, or that he had any the least intention that way.

2. The Levying of a War is alledged in Southwark, and cannot therefore be tried by a jury of Middlesex, Dyer, fol. 234. and the 3d part of Coke's Institutes, fol. 34.

3. There is uncertainty and obscurity in the main thing alledged against me in the indictment; to wit, "That I, together with a multitude of persons, to the number of a thousand, unknown to the jury, &c." whereas no criminal act can be tried that is not certain; 'Certa res debet esse quæ deducitur in judicium.'

4. The treason laid to my charge, is alledged to have been committed with a multitude of other false traitors, which were pardoned by the Act of Indemnity; Such supposed crimes therefore of theirs cannot be remembered or alledged, without a manifest breach of the Act of Indemnity and Oblivion.

The Indictment is, or ought to be founded on some clause or branch of 25 Edw. 3, c. 2, but no such overt-act is alledged in the indictment, or proved by witnesses, as doth discover that I had any intention to kill, depose, or hold out the king from the possession and exercise of his regal power. Whereas I am accused of 'compassing or imagining the death of the king,' this must be understood of his natural or personal *, not politic capacity, for in this latter sense the law says, 'The king cannot die.'

First then, to compass only the deposition of the king, is not within the words of that statute (several kings have been deposed by parliament since the Conquest); and as to my compassing or designing the natural death of the king's person, with what colour can I be accused of such intentions, in the circumstances the king at that time was in beyond the seas?

Secondly, The assembling of men together without any hostility or injury offered to any person, but for a man's own security and defence in a time of confusion and distraction, is not levying war, or treason at the common law, or by that statute. Yea, in this case, and at the season wherein such an act as this is alledged, it might be supposed to be done for the king's restoration, as well as in opposition thereunto: and the most favourable and advantageous construction ought to be made and put upon the prisoner's actings or words, where there is ambiguity, so that they may be taken or interpreted divers ways. For the law always presumeth actions to be innocent, till the contrary be manifestly proved. However, in a time of vacancy or an interregnum, when the foundations of government are out of course, by the law of reason, nature, and common prudence, every man may stand upon his own guard, endeavouring his own security and protection from injury and violence.

Thirdly, To be adherent to the king's enemies within this realm, &c. cannot, ought, not to be understood of any adhesion to a parliament, wherein the king by law is supposed always present, as a part thereof. Nor can the Long Parliament be called the king's enemies, without overthrowing the Act of Indemnity, which the king hath declared to be the foundation of the nations' present peace and security.

Lastly, The Treasons alledged in the Indictment are said to have been committed when the king was out of possession: So the Indictment runs, "To keep out the king," &c. Now my lord Coke in the third part of his Institutes, fol. 7. saith, 'A king de jure, and not de facto, is not within the statute; against such a one no treason can be committed. For if there be a king regnant in possession, though he be rex de facto, and not de jure, yet he is Seigneur le Roy, within the purview of this statute; and the other that hath right, and is out of possession, is not within this act. Nay, if treason be committed against a king de facto et non de jure, and after the king de jure cometh to the crown, he shall punish the treason done to the King de facto.'

And after, in the same place he saith, 'That by law there is always a king, in whose name the laws are to be maintained and executed, otherwise justice would fail.' The act also of 11 Hen. 7, was made for security of the subject on this behalf. The word 'King' also may and ought to be taken largely for any sovereign power in a king or queen, as Coke in the place fore-quoted shews; and why not, by the same reason, in a Protector, though an usurper, or any other persons, one or more, in whom sovereignty is lodged, or that have all the badges of sovereignty; as the calling of parliaments, enacting of laws, coining of money, receiving foreign ambassadors, &c. His majesty that now is, is granted by the very Indictment to have been then out of possession: if so, then was there either some other king, or what was equivalent, some sovereign power in actual possession and exercise, or none. If the former, then was there a king de facto, so no treason, could be committed against him that was king de jure, only. If the latter, then the government was dissolved, no allegiance was due to any persons, and so no offence could be properly treason within the statute.

But had the late Protector had the name and style of a king, no treason could have been committed against the king de jure only. Now God forbid that you should give away any life, upon such niceties, because an usurping Protector was not clothed with the title as well as power of a king. The Protector or any usurper's taking or not taking the title of a king, in case he have the power, cannot alter the state of my supposed crime. You ought not to be biassed by popular reports concerning me. It is easier to be innocent, than so reported: The one is in our power, not the other.

Fifthly, Concerning the Evidence.

1. No allegation was directly proved by two positive lawful witnesses, as in this case it ought.

2. One of the witnesses for the king confessed in open Court, That to his knowledge my hand had been counterfeited, to my prejudice and damage in great sums of money; yet Orders pretended to be signed by me (wherein my hand may as well be counterfeited), are taken as evidence against me.

3. The issue of the whole cause depended on the solution of some difficult Questions of so high a nature, and great importance, as could not safely be determined but in the high-court of parliament: As,

1. Whether the Long Parliament called in November 1640, were dissolved by the late king's death?

2. Whether the successive remaining powers that exercised the royal supreme authority from 1648, to the Restoration of his now majesty, were not within the true sense and meaning of 25 Edw. 3, and 11 Hen. 7.

REASONS FOR AN ARREST OF JUDGMENT, writ by the Prisoner, but refused to be heard by the Court.

I. I have been denied so much as to hear the Indictment read in Latin, as it is the original record of the Court: yea, so much as a copy of it in English hath been denied me during the whole time of my trial; by the sight whereof I might be able to assign the defects of law that may be in it.

Counsel also hath been denied, not only before I pleaded, but after; and all points by me offered in law to the Judges of the Court have been over-ruled, without admitting me counsel to argue the same, and better inform the judgment of the court. I have demanded that I might put in a Bill of Exceptions upon the Statute of Westminster. 2. cap. 31. This likewise is denied me, over-ruled, and judged as out of that Statute. Neither will counsel be allowed me in this, to shew cause why it ought to be admitted as of right. And as no counsel was allowed, so neither were the judges counsel to me, as they said themselves they would and ought to be, but rather suffered me to wrong and prejudice myself; some of them saying, 'Let him go on, the worst will be his own at last.' And they neither checked nor restrained the king's counsel in their high and irritating expressions to the jury, to find me guilty: one of whom was seen to speak privately with the foreman of the jury, immediately before the jurors went from the Bar, after he had spoken openly, 'That the prisoner was to be made a public sacrifice, in reference to the actions done against his majesty that now is.'

afford me; besides the undue proceedings in the business of the Petty Jury. A list of forty-eight persons was presented to me, who being to me unknown, and no time allowed me to gain any knowledge of them, though I was permitted to challenge, and refuse three juries, without shewing cause, yet could not that refusal be upon such rational grounds as the law supposes, which doubtless intends substantial relief to the prisoner, in allowing him the liberty of such refusal; whereas, through my ignorance of the persons, I might refuse the best, and chuse the worst, as to my safety. And then whereas the law further allows me the refusal of any other beyond the thirty-five, on just and exceptionable cause shewn, what just exception was I capable to alledge in a sudden hurry against persons to me altogether unknown, unless it would be taken for a just one, that they were unknown to me?

All these things being so contrary to the right which the Judges stand obliged to do every one, as they are for that purpose intrusted by God and the king, is just cause for an Arrest of Judgment, and a good reason why they should yet at length allow me a copy of the Indictment, and assign counsel to argue for the prisoner against the defects in law that may be found therein. Without this, law is denied me, which is my birthright and inheritance; the best birthright a subject hath, says Coke on Magna Charta: for thereby (says he) his goods, lands, wife, children, his body, life, honour, and estimation, are protected from injury. The life, birthright, or inheritance, we have from our parents, may soon be gone, if this fence thereof be broken down. How great a wrong then, it is for the court to withhold it from me, is manifest. Are they not therefore in effect chargeable with my blood, by such unequal proceedings as I have had in my trial?

II. My Second Reason for an Arrest of Judgment is drawn from the issue that is joined in my case, which seems to depend chiefly upon matter of law; and that in such tender and high points, as are only determinable in the high court of parliament.

For it is become the question, Whether I am guilty or not guilty, according as these Propositions following are truly or erroneously resolved.

1. Whether the parliament that began November 3, 1640, were dissolved by the king's death? and whether this court may judge things done in parliament?

2. Whether the powers regnant, and de facto that successively were in being, from Jan. 30, 1649, to Decemb. 20, 1659, were such powers, de facto, as are the king, or Seigneur le Roy, within the purview of the Statute of 25 Edw. 3. having the exercise of regal power in all the particulars of it, though not the name?

3. Whether during that time fore-mentioned his majesty that now is were properly king de facto? or whether he were not out of possession and without all exercise of his regal authority within the realm?

4: Whether the case now in question be a Treason literally within the words of the Statute 25 Edw. 3, or at most, any other than an interpretative and new treason, not declared before the very time of my trial; and that only by the judgment of the court, or opinion of my judges, eleven years after some of the things charged on me, are alledged to have been committed?

As for the first of these, the Act for continuance of the Long Parliament is express: 'That all and every thing or things whatsoever, done or to be done, for the adjournment, proroguing or dissolving of that parliament, contrary to that act, shall be utterly void and of none effect.' I then thus argue:

The Judges do upon occasion of this trial resolve, That the king's death dissolved that parliament. No act of parliament hath yet declared it to be so; and the Judges ought to have some law for their guide, as Coke well says. To be sure, if in process of time the parliament shall expressly declare, That not the king's death, but the Act for the dissolution of that parliament, did dissolve it; in such case, these Judges resolution by virtue of such act is absolutely void. But innocent blood in the mean time may be shed, and an estate wrongfully taken away. And in case what the Judges assert herein were law, it is law not known or declared till many years after the fact committed. At this rate, who is secure of estate or life?

As to the second and third Queries or Propositions, it does appear out of the third part of Coke's Institutes, fol. 7. and the statute 11 Hen. 7. cap. 1. that actings for the king in fact, are not to be questioned by the king in right. If it be said, That there was no king in this case; it may be replied, That they who had the power and exercise of the royal jurisdiction, as to peace and war, coinage of money, power of life and death, &c. which are the highest ensigns of regal authority, must needs be the powers regnant, though not under the name of king, as are within the statute of 25 Edw. 3, c. 2. as a queen also is adjudged, and any sovereign prince, though under the title only of lord, as was the case of Ireland before it was a kingdom. And if so, why not in more such persons as well as one, that de facto exercise the royal power and sovereign authority, under what name or title soever? If upon this nicety, judgment be given against me, because the powers regnant wanted the name and formality of a king, I shall doubtless have very hard measure. For the reason and equity is the same, if the powers regnant had the thing, though not the title. And where there is the same reason, there is the same law, as is a known rule. Now there is the same reason the subject should be equally indemnified, that acteth under any sovereign authority that hath not the name of a king, as if it had. If there had been many kings, as a Heptarchy hath been in England heretofore, those would have been understood to be within the statute; and the reason and equity of the statute is the same in all cases. For the law is made for the benefit and security of the subject, whom the law requires not to examine the right of sovereignty. Nor is the danger less under one government than another.

The statute is, for securing the subjects from all dormant titles, that they may safely pay their allegiance when they receive protection, and that they may not be in danger of being destroyed by two powers at the same time. For that power which is supreme and de facto, will be obeyed, and make it treason to do otherwise, be it right or wrong. And if the subject be at the same time in danger of committing treason against the power de jure, then is he in a miserable condition, and state of unavoidable necessity, which is provided against by the laws of the land. Otherwise, if he be loyal to the king de jure, he shall be hanged by the king de facto; and if he be faithful to the king de facto, he shall die by the king de jure, when he recovers possession.

Against this it was, that the statute of 11 Hen. 7. was provided, in the difference betwixt the two Houses of York and Lancaster. My case is either the same with that, and then I desire the benefit of that statute; or else it is new, and then I desire as is provided, 25 Edw. 3, that it be referred to the parliament. So that it is either within the equity of the statute 11 Hen. 7. or else it is a new case, and not to be judged by this court.

If the Judges in the Resolves by them delivered, upon any of the particulars before alledged, have not declared that law that ought to guide them, but their particular Judgments or Opinions, as undertaking to guide the law, and that in points of so grand concern as to touch the subjects life, in case their judgments after should prove erroneous, the verdict given upon such errors must needs be illegal and void. Judgment therefore ought to be suspended, till such time as the truth and certainty of the law may be fully argued and cleared, and that in the proper court for the hearing and judging of this case. If this be not done, but I be forthwith proceeded against (notwithstanding any thing however rationally or legally alledged to the contrary) by such undue precipitation and given sentence, I am (contrary to Magna Charta, or law of the land) run upon and destroyed, without due form and course of law. And I am like to be deprived of estate and life upon no law or certain rule, which was declared before the fact; no, nor before the trial.

Upon these considerations, I desire an Arrest of Judgment, and that counsel may be assigned me, and competent time allowed to make good my averments.

As an argument to press this, I desire leave of the Court, That the Petition of the two Houses, and the king's assent to it, may be read in open court, attested by one that is present, who examined and compared it with the book of Record in the Lords' house; by which it evidently appears, that as well the king as both houses of parliament were agreed, that admitting I were attainted, yet execution, as to my life, should be remitted. And if so, there is no cause to precipitate the passing sentence; especially when also such weighty points in the law are yet to be argued and cleared, unless the Judges will evidently charge themselves with my innocent blood.

III. My third Reason for an Arrest of Judgment, is the manifest newness of this case, being such as never happened before in the kingdom; which withal is of so vast a consequence to people of all sorts and conditions within this realm, as nothing more. And being so, (as I doubt not with your lordships patience I shall make it appear) it is the known law, witnessed by Bracton, and ancient approved law-books, That in such cases the Judges in the inferior courts ought not to proceed, but bring it before the high court of parliament.

To prove therefore the newness of this case, besides what I have already alledged in my Defence, before the verdict, give me leave to add that, which yet further shews the newness and extraordinariness thereof. And I beseech your lordships to let me go on without interruption, in my endeavouring to make it out as clearly as God shall enable me, and as briefly also, not to spend too much of your time.

In general, I do affirm of this case, That it is so comprehensive, as to take in the very interests of heaven and earth: First, Of God the Universal Sovereign and King of Kings: Secondly, That of earthly sovereigns, who are God's viceregents: As also the interests of all mankind, that stand in the relation of subjects to the one or both those sorts of sovereigns.

This in general. More particularly: Within the bowels of this case is that cause of God, that hath stated itself in the late differences and wars that have happened and arisen within these three nations, and have been of more than 20 years continuance: which, for the greater certainty and solemnity, hath been recorded in the form of a National Covenant, in which the generality of the three nations have been either implicitly involved, or expressly concerned, by the signing of their names.

The principal things contained in that Covenant, were the known and commonly-received duties, which either as men or as Christians we owed and stood obliged to perform either to God, the highest and universal King in church or state, or to our natural lord and sovereign, the kings of this realm, in subordination to God and his laws.

Again, It contains as well the duties which we owe to every particular and individual person, in their several stations and callings, as to the king in general, and our representative body in parliament assembled. These duties we are thereby obliged to yield and perform, in consistency with, and in a just subordination and manifest agreeableness to the laws of God, as is therein expressed: And this also, in a disagreement to the laws of the land as they then were.

By this solemn Covenant and Agreement * of the three nations, giving up themselves in subjection to God and to his laws, in the first place, as the allegiance they owe to their highest Sovereign, (as the Creator, Redeemer, Owner, and Ruler of all Mankind) they have so far interested the Son of God in the supreme rule and government of these nations, that nothing therein ought to be brought into practice, contrary to his revealed will in the Holy Scriptures, and his known and most righteous laws.

This duty which we owe to God, the universal King, nature and Christianity do so clearly teach and assert, that it needs no more than to be named. For this subjection and allegiance to God and his laws, by a right so indisputable, all are accountable before the judgment seat of Christ.

It is true, indeed, men may de facto become open rebels to God and to his laws, and prove such as forfeit his protection, and engage him to proceed against them as his professed enemies. But, with your lordship's favour, give me leave to say, that that which you have made a rule for your proceedings in my case, will indeed hold, and that very strongly, in this; that is to say, in the sense wherein Christ the Son of God; is king de jure, not only in general, over the whole world, but in particular, in relation to these three kingdoms. He ought not to be kept out of his throne, nor his visible government, that consists in the authority of his word and laws, suppressed and trampled under foot, under any pretence whatsoever.

And in the asserting and adhering unto the right of this highest sovereign, as stated in the Covenant before-mentioned, the Lords and Commons jointly, before the year 1648, and the Commons alone afterwards, to the very times charged in the Indictment, did manage the war and late differences within these kingdoms. And whatever defections did happen by apostates, hypocrites, and time-serving worldlings, there was a party amongst them that continued firm, sincere and chaste unto the last, and loved it better than their very lives; of which number I am not ashamed to profess myself to be: not so much admiring the form and words of the Covenant, as the righteous and holy ends therein expressed, and the true sense and meaning thereof, which I have reason to know.

Nor will I deny, but that, as to the manner of the prosecution of the Covenant to other ends than itself warrants, and with a rigid oppressive spirit, to bring all dissenting minds and tender consciences under one uniformity of church-discipline and government, it was utterly against my judgment. For I always esteemed it more agreeable to the Word of God, that the ends and work declared in the Covenant should be promoted in a spirit of love and forbearance to differing judgments and consciences, that thereby we might be approving ourselves 'in doing that to others which we desire 'they would to us;' and so, though upon different principles, be found joint and faithful advancers of the reformation contained in the Covenant, both public and personal.

This happy union and conjunction of all interests in the respective duties of all relations, agreed and consented to by the common suffrage of the three nations, as well in their public parliamentary capacity, as private stations, appeared to me a rule and measure approved of, and commanded by parliament, for my action and deportment, though it met with great opposition, in a tedious, sad, and long war; and this under the name and pretext of royal authority. Yet, as this case appeared to me in my conscience, under all its circumstances of times, of persons, and of revolutions inevitably happening by the hand of God and the course of his wise providences; I held it safest and best to keep my station in parliament to the last, under the guidance and protection of their authority, and in pursuance of the ends before declared in my just Defence.

This general and public case of the kingdoms, is so well known by the declarations and actions that have passed on both sides, that I need but name it; since this matter was not done in a corner, but frequently contended for in the high places of the field, and written even with characters of blood. And out of the bowels of these public differences and disputes doth my particular case arise, for which I am called into question. But admitting it come to my lot to stand single, in the witness I am to give to this glorious cause, and to be left alone, (as in a sort I am) yet being upheld with the authority before asserted, and keeping myself in union and conjunction therewith, I am not afraid to bear my witness to it in this great presence, nor to seal it with my blood, if called thereunto. And I am so far satisfied in my conscience and understanding, that it neither is nor can be treason, either against the law of nature, or the law of the land, either malum per se, or malum prohibitum; that on the contrary, it is the duty I owed to God the universal King, and to his majesty that now is, and to the Church and People of God in these nations, and to the innocent blood of all that have been slain in this quarrel. Nothing it seems will now serve, unless by the condemnation passed upon my person, they be rendered to posterity murderers and rebels, and that upon record in a court of justice in Westminster-hall. And this would inevitably have followed, if I had voluntarily given up this cause, without asserting their and my innocence; by which I should have pulled that blood upon my own head, which now I am sure lie at the door of others, and in particular, of those that knowingly and precipitately shall embroil their hands in my innocent blood, under whatsoever form or pretext of justice.

My case is evidently new and unusual, that which never happened before; wherein there is not only much of God and of his glory, but all that is dear and of true value to all the good people in these three nations. And, as I have said, it cannot be treason against the law of nature, since the duties of the subjects in relation to their sovereigns and superiors, from highest to lowest, are owned and conscientiously practised and yielded by those that are the assertors of this cause.

Nor can it be treason within the statute of 2. of Edw. 3. since besides what hath been said of no king in possession, and of being under powers regnant, and kings de facto, as also of the fact in its own nature, and the evidence as to overt-acts pretended; it is very plain it cannot possibly fall within the purview of that statute. For this case, thus circumstantiated, as before declared, is no act of any private person, of his own head, as that statute intends; nor in relation to the king there meant, that is presumed to be in the exercise of his royal authority, in conjunction with the law and the two houses of parliament, if they be sitting, as the fundamental constitutions of the government do require.

My lords, if I have been free and plain with you in this matter, I beg your pardon: For it concerns me to be so, and something more than ordinarily urgent, where both my estate and life are in such eminent peril; nay, more than my life, the concerns of thousands of lives are in it, not only of those that are in their graves already, but of all posterity in time to come. Had nothing been in it; but the care to preserve my own life, I needed not have staid in England, but might have taken my opportunity to withdraw myself into foreign parts, to provide for my own safety. Nor needed I to have been put upon picaing, as now I am, for an arrest of judgment; but might have watched upon advantages that were visible enough to me, in the managing of my trial, if I had consulted only the preservation of my life or estate.

No, my lords, I have otherwise learned Christ, than to fear them that can but kill the body, and have no more that they can do. I have also taken notice, in the little reading that I have had of history, how glorious the very Heathens have rendered their names to posterity, in the contempt they have shewed of death, (when the laying down of their life has appeared to be their duty) from the love which they have owed to their country.

Two remarkable examples of this, give me leave to mention to you upon this occasion. The one is, of Socrates the divine philosopher, who was brought into question before a judgment-seat, as now I am, for maintaining that there was but one only true God, against the multiplicity of the superstitious heathen Gods; and he was so little in love with his own life upon this account, (wherein he knew the right was on his side) that he could not be persuaded by his friends to make any defence, but would choose rather to put it upon the conscience and determination of his judges, to decide that wherein he knew not how to make any choice of his own, as to what would be best for him, whether to live or to die; he ingenuously professing that for ought he knew, it might be much to his prejudice and loss, to endeavour longer continuance in this bodily life.

The other example is that of a chief governor, (Codrus,) that, to my best remembrance, had the command of a city in Greece, which was besieged by a potent enemy, and brought into unimaginable straits. Hereupon the said governor makes his address to the Oracle, to know the event of that danger. The answer was, 'That the city should be safely preserved, if the chief governor were slain by the enemy.' He understanding this, immediately disguised himself, and went into the enemy's camp, amongst whom he did so comport himself, that they unwittingly put him to death; by which means, immediately safety and deliverance arose to the city, as the Oracle had declared. So little was his life in esteem with him, when the good and safety of his country required the laying of it down.]

As to other pertinent Queries, thou mayest see them, Reader, in other parts of this Trial.

That which remains as an Appendix to the Bill of Exceptions, is to lay before thee the grounds which plainly shew that there was a downright conspiracy in sir Henry Vane's tenants and others, to prosecute him for life and estate, under colour and pretence of justice.

1. Presently after I was committed to the Tower for High-Treason, and made a close prisoner, Mr. O'Neale, sir William Darcy, and Dr. Cradock, obtained an order from the king to seize and take into their possession all the estates of such persons that were already, or should be forfeited to his majesty.

Hereupon the said Mr. O'Neale and sir Wm. Darcy appointed some under them, in the bishoprick of Durham, (by name Thomas Bowes, esq. now deceased, and capt. William Darcy) to join with the said Dr. Cradock, to put in execution the said Warrant, as their deputies; who thereupon went to Raby-Castle, and demanded the Rent-Books of Thomas Mowbray my steward, offering him his place under them, which he refused.

Contrary to this proceeding, sir Edward Coke expressly declares, 'That before indictment, the goods or other things of any offender cannot be searched, inventoried, or in any sort seized; nor after indictment, seized, moved or taken away before conviction or attainer, Instit. Part. 3. c. 133, concerning the Seizure of Goods, &c. for offences, &c. before conviction.'

2. At the instance and prosecution of my tenants and others, an Order was made by the House of Commons (not of the Lords) requiring the tenants of such persons as were excepted out of the General Pardon, to detain their rents in their own hands. By pretence of this Order, (though that parliament that made it were dissolved) the tenants refused to pay their respective rents as they grew due, contrary to all law and equity; and joined together in open defiance and conspiracy against their landlord.

3. The said Tenants (when legally prosecuted in his majesty's courts at Westminster, for the recovery of the said rents out of their hands) did petition the said House of Commons to put a stop to such legal prosecution and suits, which motion of theirs put the House into a great heat and violence against me, insomuch as that they had almost passed a Vote to sequester all my estate, though unheard or unconvicted.

4. William Watson, of Cockfield, and other of the said tenants, have continued in London to carry on this conspiracy against me; by whose means, with others, the king hath been importuned to send for men from the isle of Scilly, in order to this trial.

5. By common fame (which at least affords a strong presumption) my goods and estate have been long begged by several persons, and granted: whereas the begging of the goods and estate of any delinquent, accused or indicted of treason, before he be convicted and attainted, is utterly unlawful; because till then nothing is forfeited to the king, and so not his to dispose of; as sir Edward Coke shews in the fore-mentioned chapter about the Seizure of Goods, &c.

6. I am credibly informed, that about December last a certain captain came from the duke of Albemarle to captain Linn, with threatening language, that if he would not confess things against sir Henry Vane, he should be fetched up before the Council, and made to do it. Linn answered, He knew nothing against sir Henry Vane, nor had any orders from him, but from the parliament and council.

The same captain came again, about a fortnight after, from the duke of Albemarle, with a parcel of fine words, That if he the said Linn would testify, That sir Henry Vane was in the head of his regiment, and that he received orders from him, the duke of Albemarle would gratify him with any civility he should desire. Linn replied, he knew no regiment sir Henry Vane had; but that it was the parliament's and council of state's regiment. The same captain came again to him from the duke of Albemarle, and told him, the duke desired him to testify sir Henry Vane's being in the head of his regiment, and that he received orders from him to fight sir George Booth. Linn replied, He knew no such things. The captain told him as from the duke, he should have any place or office in the court: Be not afraid to speak, said he, I warrant you we shall hang sir Henry Vane, for he is a rogue.

7. I am credibly informed, That one of the grand jury declared, That after the bill of indictment against me was brought, in, some from the king's council came to desire them, they would please to come into the inward Court of Wards: Upon which, one of the jury said, They were there to judge of matters brought before them, and ought not to go in thither; but if the counsel had any thing to say, they ought to come to them. This was seconded by some; others said, They were the king's Counsel, and it was but matter of civility to grant them their request. Whereupon they went into the inward court of wards, where the king's Counsel were, to wit, attorney-general Palmer, solicitor-general Finch, serjeant Glynn and serjeant Keeling. After a while they caused all to withdraw but the jury. Then the clerk read the Indictment in the usual form for levying war from 1659. After it was read, one of the counsel told them, It was a bill of high treason against his majesty, and they were to consider of it according to their evidence. Then they proceeded to examine their witnesses.

Jefford said sir H. Vane offered him a commission to go against sir George Booth; which, said serjeant Keeling, was to go against the king.

Wright being examined, whether he saw sir Henry Vane in the council, said yes. The attorney-general replied, That if he was amongst them, they might find the bill upon that.

Upon this the jury withdrew, and were by themselves. Then sir John Cropley, the Foreman, said, We must pass this bill: At which all the jury were silent. At last, one stood up and said; 'This bill contains matter of fact, and matter of law. Some of this jury, to my knowledge, were never of any jury before, as well as I, therefore ignorant of the law, (in so difficult and unusual a point as this is) and consequently could not give in their verdict, as to law, but only fact.' Several others of the jury seconded him in this; and protested against giving in their verdict, as to matter of law: Notwithstanding all which, the bill was carried up to the King's bench.

8. On the day of my arraignment, an eminent person was heard to say, I had forfeited my head, by what I said that day, before ever I came to my defence: What that should be, I know not, except my saying in open court, 'Sovereign Power of Parliament,' which the attorney general writ down, after he had promised, at my request, no exceptions should be taken at words. And whole volumes of lawyers books pass up and down the nation with that title, Sovereign Power of Parliament.

9. Six moderate men that were like to consider of what they did, before they would throw away my life were summoned to be of my petty jury; which the king's counsel, hearing, writ a letter to one of the sheriffs not to summon them: And a new list was made the night immediately before the day of verdict, on purpose that the prisoner might not have any knowledge of them, 'till presented to his view and choice in Westminster-hall. Yet one of the forty-eight of this list (who said, He would have starved himself before he would have found sir Henry Vane guilty of treason) was never called, though he walked in the hall all the while. And in that hurry of those that compassed him about, he being alone stripp'd of all assistance, sir William Roberts, foreman, and sir Christopher Abdy, were sworn by the court, before I was aware; so my challenging them might seem a personal disobliging and exasperation of them against me, after they were sworn and fixed.

The Solicitor also had a long whisper with the Foreman of the Jury in the court, before they went to verdict, telling him, 'The prisoner must be sacrificed for the nation,' &c.

Suddenly after which, I am here called to receive my Sentence.

10. After the day of my trial, the Judges went to Hampton court.

11. None were more forward to absolve the king from his grant about my life, than they that had appeared most forward in promoting the bill by way of Petition to the king for it. This grant being upon record, may seem to have the same validity that other acts of parliament have: which are still but the two Houses Petition to the king for his assent to the bills by them drawn up and passed. They used this as a means to induce the king to exempt me from all benefit of the act of indemnity and oblivion; and then at last persuade and absolve him from making good this grant also, thereby depriving me of all visible relief for my life. I conceived my life as secure by that grant, as others lives or estates are by the Act of Indemnity itself; for what is that, but the bill of both Houses, with the king's assent to it, upon their Petition.

The PETITION of both Houses of Parliament to the King's most excellent Majesty, on the behalf of Sir HENRY VANE, and Colonel JOHN LAMBERT, after they left them incapable of having any benefit of the Act of Indemnity.

'To the King's most excellent majesty;

The humble Petition of the Lords and Commons assembled in parliament, sheweth; That your majesty having declared your gracious pleasure to proceed only against the immediate murderers of your royal father; we your majesty's most humble subjects, the Lords and Commons assembled, not finding sir Henry Vane nor col. Lambert to be of that number, are humble suitors to your majesty, that if they shall be attainted, That execution, as to their lives, may be remitted. And as in duty bound, &c.'

The said Petition being read, it was agreed to, and ordered to be presented to his majesty by the Lord Chancellor.

The Lord Chancellor reported, That he had presented the Petition of both Houses to the king's majesty, concerning sir Henry Vane and col. Lambert, and his majesty grants the desires in the said Petition*.

JOHN BROWN, Cler. Parliamentorum.

* Harris, in his Life of Charles 2, vol. 2. p. 34, gives the following copy of an Original Letter, written from 'Hampton Court, Saturday two in the afternoon.'

'The relation that hath been made to me of Whereupon the usual Sentence was pronounced against him.

After Sentence, chief justice Forster endeavoured to persuade the king, that he lay under no obligation by granting the Petition of both Houses, saying, 'That God, though full of mercy, yet intended his mercy only for the penitent.'—By which means the king was wrought on (notwithstanding his engagement to the contrary) to sign a Warrant for his Execution, that he should be beheaded on Tower-Hill, the 14th of June.

The day before his Execution his friends had liberty to visit him, he received them with very great cheerfulness*; and when they would have

'sir H. Vane's carriage yesterday, in the Hall, is the occasion of this letter; which if I am rightly informed, was so insolent as to justify all he had done, acknowledging no supreme power in England, but a parliament; and many things to that purpose. You have had a true account of all; and if he has given new occasion to be hanged, certainly he is too dangerous a man to let live, if we can honestly put him out of the way. Think of this and give me some account of it to-morrow: till when I have no more to say to you. To the Chancellor.' In the possession of James West, esq. of Covent garden.

* Burnet, upon hearsay, imputes to Vane the want of natural bravery. This imputation it is scarcely fair to admit in opposition to the testimony of Ludlow, and of Vane's public conduct recorded in history. The Bishop represents him to be "a very fearful man, who, when he saw his death was designed, composed himself to it with a resolution that surprised all, who knew how little of that was natural to him." And this composure it seems prompted him to "some very extraordinary acts of resolution; though they cannot be mentioned with decency."

["It is said, the Lady Vane began her reckoning for her son, the Lord Barnard, from the night before Sir Henry lost his head on Tower Hill." Oldmixon.]

From adopting the ludicrous parts of Burnet's story, Hume's taste prevented him. But when he was to paint the character of Vane, a contrast between constitutional cowardice and enthusiastic courage, imparted by the fanaticism of glory and religion, at the approach of death, presented an occasion, which he has not neglected, at once to heighten the effect of his colouring, and to exhibit an eloquent though concise display of philosophical reflection.

Certainly through the whole of these proceedings Vane betrayed no want of courage. Nor was his conduct towards Cromwell that of a timid man; see the proceedings against him A. D. 1654. supra, vol. 5. p. 791. See also the accounts given by the historians of his conduct when Cromwell by force ejected the parliament on the 19th of April 1653. Hume, in his abstract, somewhat overstates parts of Vane's speeches on his trial.

Ludlow, who must have known Vane as well persuaded him to make some submission to the king, and to endeavour the obtaining of his life; he said, 'If the king did not think him' self more concerned for his honour and word,

' than he did for his life, he was very willing
' they should take it. Nay, I declare, said he,
' that I value my life less in a good cause, than,
' the king can do his promise.' And when some others were speaking to him, of giving some thousands of pounds for his life; he said,

If a thousand farthings would gain it, he would ' not give it: and if any should attempt to make ' such a bargain he would spoil their market :
' For I think the king himself so sufficiently ' obliged to spare my life, that it is fitter for him
' to do it, than myself to seek it.'

On Saturday the day of his Execution, he said to a friend, God bid Moses go to the top of Mount Pisgah and die; so he bid him go up to the top of Tower-hill and die.

as any man did, writes thus: "In the month of July 1662, I received letters from England with an account of the trial, sentence, and death of sir Henry Vane: of which I shall only say, that he behaved himself on all those occasions in such a manner, that he left it doubtful, whether his eloquence, soundness of judgment, and presence of mind, his gravity and magnanimity, his constant adherence to the cause of his country, and heroic carriage during the time of his confinement, and at the hour of death; or the malice of his enemies, and their frivolous suggestions at his trial, the breach of the public faith in the usage he found, the incivility of the bench, and the savage rudeness of the sheriff, who commanded the trumpets several times to sound that he might not be heard by the people, were most remarkable.

"The following account of this (and another transaction, which I care not to insist upon) being sent to me at Geneva, I may not omit to insert in this place; because it seems to give the true reasons of the court of England for hurrying sir Henry Vane out of the world.

"On Friday last, being the 16th of this instant June 1662, sir Henry Vane pleaded for his life, and maj.-gen. Lambert for his: or rather, the first pleaded for the life and liberties of his country, and the other for his own.
The issue in all appearance will be, that sir Henry will be put to death, and Lambert pardoned, though both are under sentence of condemnation. The reason of this distinction is no other than the manner of their defence; the one alledging the authority of the great parliament for his justification, and that he was indemnified by the act of amnesty; the other meanly extenuating and excusing what he did against sir George Booth and Monk, (which was the principal part of the accusation against him), by pleading ignorance of their intentions, neither of them having declared that they designed to restore the king; and Monk, on the contrary, having openly declared for the restitution of the parliament.
Sir Henry Vane was long in his defence, but not tedious. He much perplexed both court and counsel; and has acquired eternal reputation, by nobly pleading for the dying liberties of his country; it being clear, that all the party which seemed to be indemnified by the act of amnesty, shall be punished in his person; and that for this cause only, That, in his pleading, he undertook, by the authority of the said parliament, to justify what he had done; maintaining, that the House of Commons, representing the whole body of the people, in case of difference between the authority royal and politic, possesses a just power to defend the rights of the people, and to authorise the people of England, and every one of them, to defend them.

"Sir Henry Vane was a gentleman of an ancient family in the county of Durham; eldest son to sir Henry Vane, who had been secretary of state, and comptroller of the household, to the late king. Being scandalized with the innovations brought into the public worship, he went to New England, and remained there for the space of five or six years; the two last of which he was consecutively chosen governor of that country, though not exceeding the age of 24 years. In the beginning of the great parliament, he was elected to serve his country among them, without the least application made on his part to that end. And in this station he soon made appear how capable he was of managing great affairs; possessing, in the highest perfection, a quick and ready apprehension, a strong and tenacious memory, a profound and penetrating judgment, a just and noble eloquence, with an easy and graceful manner of speaking. To these were added, a singular zeal and affection for the good of the commonwealth, and a resolution and courage not to be shaken or diverted from the public service. He had been removed by the late king from being treasurer of the navy, for performing his duty in the House of Commons; and being restored to that employment by the parliament, he freely contributed one half of the profits, amounting to the sum of 2,000*l*. yearly, towards carrying on the war for the liberties of England. When that war was ended, he put the receipt for the navy in such a way, that, by order of the parliament, the whole expence of that office exceeded not 1,000*l*. by year; men being brought by this means to understand, that they were not placed in employments to serve themselves, but, to serve the public. And that this conduct was not mistaken, the successes of our arms by sea against Portugal, France, Holland, and other enemies, did abundantly manifest. When Cromwell had treacherously advanced himself upon the ruins of the commonwealth, he would not be induced by any means to favour or countenance his usurpation; chusing rather to suffer imprisonment and other hardships, than to comply with tyranny under any form. Upon the return of king Charles, being conscious to himself of having done nothing in relation to public

Several friends being with him in his chamber this morning, he oft encouraged them to chearfulness, as well by his example as expression. In all his deportment, he shewed himself marvellously fitted to meet the King of Terrors, without the least affrightment. But to shew where his strength lay, he said, He was a poor unworthy wretch, and had nothing but the grace and goodness of God to depend upon. He said moreover, Death shrunk from him, rather than he from it. Upon the occasion of parting with his relations, he said; There is some flesh remaining yet, but I must cast it behind me and press forward to my Father.

Then one of the Sheriff's men came in and told him, There was no sledge to come, but he was to walk on foot. A circumstance very singular, and never used to those who were executed at that place.

He told his friends, the Sheriff's chaplain came to him at twelve of the clock that night, with an order for his Execution, telling him, he was come to bring him that fatal message of death. I think, friends, that in this message was no dismalness at all. After the receipt of which, I slept four hours so soundly, that the Lord hath made it sufficient for me, and now I am going to sleep my last, after which I shall need sleep no more.

Then Mr. Sheriff coming into the room, was friendly saluted by him, and after a little pause communicated a prohibition that he said he had received, which was, That he must not speak any thing against his majesty or the government. His answer to this he himself relates on the Scaffold. He further told Mr. Sheriff, he was ready; but the Sheriff said he was not, nor could be this half hour yet: Then, sir, it rests on you, not on me (said sir Henry,) for I have been ready this half hour. Then the Sheriff, at his request, promised him his servants should attend him on the Scaffold, and be civilly dealt with; neither of which were performed: (notwithstanding this promise) they were beaten and kept off the Scaffold, till he said, What, have I never a servant here?

After this, one of the Sheriff's men came affairs, for which he could not willingly and chearfully suffer, he continued at his house in Hampstead near London; where, under false and unworthy pretences, that he had engaged in counsels with some of the army to drive him out of England again, he was seized and imprisoned in the Tower: from whence he was carried from one place to another for the space of about two years; after the expiration of which, they who feared his abilities, and knew his integrity, thought convenient to violate the public faith, and, under a form of law, to put him to death."

A Life of Vane was published in the year of his execution, 1668. And he has an article in the Biographia Britannica. Some curious particulars of him are also to be found in 1 Hutchinson's Hist. of Massachusetts Bay 41—47.

and told him, there must be a Sledge, to which Sir Henry replied, Any way, how they please, for I long to be at home, to be dissolved and to be with Christ, which is best of all. He went very chearfully and readily down the stairs from his chamber, and seating himself on the sledge (friends and servants standing about him) then he was forthwith drawn away towards the Scaffold. As he went, some in the Tower (Prisoners as well as others) spake to him, praying the Lord to go with him. And after he was out of the Tower, from the tops of houses, and out of windows, the people used such means and gestures as might best discover, at a distance, their respects and love to him, crying aloud, 'The Lord go with you, the great God of Heaven and Earth appear in you, and for you;' whereof he took what notice he was capable in those circumstances, in a chearful manner accepting their respects, putting off his hat and bowing to them. Being asked several times, how he did, by some about him, he answered, Never better in all my life. Another replied, How should he do ill that suffers for so glorious a cause? To which a tall black man said, Many suffered for a better cause; and may for a worse, said sir Henry; wishing, that when they come to seal their better cause (as he called it) with their blood (as he was now going to seal his) they might not find themselves deceived; and as to this cause, said he, it hath given life in death to all the owners of it, and sufferers for it.

Being passed within the rails on Tower-Hill, there were loud acclamations of the people, crying out, The Lord Jesus go with your dear soul, &c. One told him, That was the most glorious seat he ever sat on; he answered, It is so indeed, and rejoiced exceedingly.

Being come to the Scaffold, he chearfully ascends, and being up, after the crowd on the Scaffold was broken in two pieces, to make way for him, he shewed himself to the people on the front of the Scaffold, with that noble and christian-like deportment, that he rather seemed a looker on, than the person concerned in the Execution, insomuch that it was difficult to persuade many of the people that he was the prisoner. But when they knew that the gentleman in the black suit and cloke (with a scarlet silk waistcoat, the victorious colour shewing itself at the breast) was the prisoner, they generally admired that noble and great presence he appeared with. How chearful he is! said some: He does not look like a dying man! said others; with many like speeches, as astonished with that strange appearance he shined forth in.

Then (silence being commanded by the Sheriff) lifting up his hands and eyes towards Heaven, and resting his hands on the rails; and taking a very serious, composed, and majestic view of the great multitude about him, he spake as follows:

"Gentlemen, Fellow Countrymen, and Christians:

"When Mr. Sheriff came to me this morning, and told me he had received a command from the king, that I should say nothing reflecting upon his majesty or the government; I answered, I should confine and order my Speech, as near as I could, so as to be least offensive, saving my faithfulness to the trust reposed in me, which I must ever discharge with a good conscience unto death; for I ever valued a man according to his faithfulness to the trust reposed in him, even on his majesty's behalf, in the late controversy. And if you dare trust my discretion, Mr. Sheriff, I shall do nothing but what becomes a good Christian and an Englishman; and so I hope I shall be civilly dealt with.

"When Mr. Sheriff's chaplain came to me last night about twelve of the clock, to bring me, as he called it, the fatal message of death, it pleased the Lord to bring that scripture to my mind in the 3d of Zechariah, to intimate to me, that he was now taking away my filthy garments, causing my iniquities to pass from me, with intention to give me change of rayment, and that my mortal should put on immortality.

"I suppose you may wonder when I shall tell you that I am not brought hither according to any known Law of the Land. It is true, I have been before a court of justice (and am now going to appear before a greater Tribunal, where I am to give an account of all my actions;) under their Sentence I stand here at this time. When I was before them, I could not have the liberty and privilege of an Englishman, the grounds, reasons, and causes of the actings I was charged with duly considered; I therefore desired the Judges that they would set their seals to my Bill of Exceptions; I pressed hard for it again and again, as the right of myself and every free-born Englishman by the Law of the Land, but was finally denied it—

Here sir John Robinson (lieutenant of the Tower) interrupted him, saying; Sir, you must not go on thus, and (in a furious manner, generally observed even to the dissatisfaction of some of their own attendants) said that he railed against the Judges, and that it was a lye, and I am here, says he, to testify that it is false.

Sir Henry Vane replied, "God will judge between me and you in this matter. I speak but matter of fact, and cannot you bear that? 'Tis evident the Judges have refused to sign my Bill of Exceptions"—Then the trumpets were ordered to sound or murre in his face, with a contemptible noise, to hinder his being heard: At which sir Henry (lifting up his hand, and then laying it on his breast) said, "What mean you, Gentlemen? Is this your usage of me? Did you use' all the rest so? I had even done, as to that, could you have been patient, but seeing you cannot bear it, I shall only say this, That whereas the Judges have refused to seal that with their hands that they have done, I am come to seal that with my blood that I have done. Therefore leaving this matter, which I perceive will not be borne, I judge it meet to give you some account of my life.

"I might tell you I was born a gentleman, had the education, temper, and spirit of a gentleman, as well as others, being (in my youthful days) inclined to the vanities of this world, and to that which they call Goodfellowship, judging it to be the only means of accomplishing a gentleman. But about the 14th or 15th year of my age (which is about 34 or 35 years since) God was pleased to lay the foundation or ground work of Repentance in me, for the bringing me home to himself, by his wonderful, rich, and free grace, revealing his Son in me, that by the knowledge of 'The only true God, and Jesus Christ whom he hath sent,' I might (even whilst here in the body) be made partaker of eternal life in the first fruits of it.

"When my conscience was thus awakened, I found my former course to be disloyalty to God, profaneness, and a way of sin and death, which I did with tears and bitterness bewail, as I had cause to do. Since that foundation of repentance laid in me, through grace I have been kept steadfast, desiring to walk in all good conscience towards God and towards men, according to the best light and understanding God gave me. For this I was willing to turn my back upon my estate, expose myself to hazards in foreign parts; yea, nothing seemed difficult to me, so I might preserve faith and a good conscience, which I prefer before all things; and do earnestly persuade all people rather to suffer the highest contradictions from men, than disobey God, by contradicting the light of their own conscience. In this it is I stand with so much comfort and boldness before you all this day, and upon this occasion, being assured that I shall at last sit down in glory with Christ, at his right hand. I stand here this day to resign up my spirit into the hands of that God that gave it me. Death is but a little word, but it is a great work to die; it is to be but once done, and after this cometh the judgment, even the judgment of the great God, which it concerns us all to prepare for. And by this act I do receive a discharge once for all out of prison, even the prison of the mortal body also, which, to a true Christian, is a burdensome weight.

"In all respects, where I have concerned and engaged, as to the public, my design hath been to accomplish good things for these nations. Then (lifting up his eyes, and spreading his hands) he said, I do here appeal to the great God of Heaven, and all this assembly, or any other persons, to shew wherein I have defiled my hands with any man's blood or estate, or that I have sought myself in any public capacity or place I have been in. The Cause was three times stated. First, In the Remonstrance of the House of Commons. Secondly, In the Covenant, the Solemn League and Covenant."

Upon this the trumpets sounded, the Sheriff caught at the Paper in his hand; and sir John Robinson, who at first had acknowledged that he had nothing to do there, wishing the Sheriff to see to it, yet found himself something to do now, furiously calling for the writers books, and saying, He treats of Rebellion, and you write it. Hereupon six Note-Books were delivered up. The Prisoner was very patient and composed under all these injuries, and soundings of the trumpets several times in his face, only saying, It was hard he might not be suffered to speak; but, says he, my usage from man is no harder than was my Lord and Master's; and all that will live his life this day, must expect hard dealing from the worldly spirit.

The trumpets sounded again, to hinder his being heard, then again Robinson, and two or three others, endeavoured to snatch the Paper out of sir Henry's hand; but he kept it for a while, now and then reading part of it; afterwards, tearing it in pieces, he delivered it to a friend behind him, who was presently forced to deliver it to the Sheriff. Then they put their hands into his pockets for papers (as was pretended), which bred great confusion and dissatisfaction to the spectators, seeing a prisoner so strangely handled in his dying words.

The Prisoner suspecting beforehand the disorder aforementioned, writ the main substance of what he intended to speak on the scaffold in that Paper they caught at, and which he tore in pieces, delivering it to a friend, from whom the Sheriff had it, as abovesaid; the true copy whereof was, by the Prisoner, carefully committed to a safe hand before he came to the scaffold, which take as follows:

"The work which I am at this time called unto, in this place (as upon a public theatre) is to die, and receive a discharge once for all, out of prison, to do that which is to be done; the doing or not doing of which well, and as becomes a Christian, does much depend upon the life we have been taught of God to lead, before we come to this: They that live in the faith do also die in it; Faith is so far from leaving Christians in this hour, that the work of it breaks forth then into its greatest power, as if till then it were not enough at freedom to do its office, that is, to look into the things that are unseen with most steadfastness, certainty, and delight, which is the great sweetener of death and remover of its sting.

"Give me leave therefore, in a very few words, to give you an account of my life, and of the wonderful great grace and mercy of God, in bringing me home to himself, and revealing his son in me; that by the knowledge of the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom he hath sent, I might (even whilst here in the body) be made partaker of eternal life, in the first fruits of it, and at last sit down with Christ in glory at his right hand.

"Here I shall mention some remarkable passages and changes of my life; in particular, how unsought for by myself I was called to be a Member of the Long Parliament, what little advantage I had by it, and by what steps I became satisfied with the cause I was engaged in, and did pursue the same.

"What the cause was, did first shew itself in the first Remonstrance of the House of Commons. Secondly, In the Solemn League and Covenant. Thirdly, In the more refined pursuit of it by the Commons House, in their Actings single; with what result they were growing up into, which was in the breast of the House, and unknown; or what the three proposals, mentioned in my Charge, would have come to at last, I shall not need now to say; but only, from all put together, to assert, That this cause which was owned by the parliament, was the cause of God, and for the promoting of the kingdom of his dear Son Jesus Christ, wherein are comprehended our liberties and duties, both as men and as Christians.

"And since it hath pleased God, who separated me from the womb to the knowledge and service of the Gospel of his Son, to separate me also to this hard and difficult service at this time, and to single me out to the defence and justification of this his cause, I could not consent, by any words or actions of mine, that the innocent blood that hath been shed in the defence of it, throughout the whole war (the guilt and moral evil of which must and does certainly lie somewhere), did lie at my door, or at theirs that have been the faithful adherers to this cause. This is with such evidence upon my heart that I am most freely and cheerfully willing to put the greatest seal to it I am capable, which is, the pouring out of my very blood in witness to it; which is all I shall need to say in this place and at this time, having spoken at large to it in my defence at my trial, intending to have said more the last day, as what I thought was reasonable for arrest of the Judgment, but I was not permitted then to speak it; both which may, with time and God's providence, come to the public view.

"And I must still assert, that I remain wholly unsatisfied that the course of proceedings against me at my Trial were according to law, but that I was run upon and destroyed, contrary to right, and the liberties of Magna Charta, under the form only of justice; which I leave to God to decide, who is the Judge of the whole world, and to clear my innocence; whilst in the mean time I beseech him to forgive them; and all that have had a hand in my death; and that the Lord, in his great mercy, will not lay it to their charge.

"And I do account the lot of mine no other than what is to be expected by those that are not of the world, but whom Christ hath chosen out of it; for the servant is not greater than his lord: And if they have done this to the green tree, they will do it much more to the dry.

"However, I shall not altogether excuse myself. I know, that by many weaknesses and failures, I have given occasion enough of the ill charge I have met with from men, though in the main, the Lord knows the sincerity and integrity of my heart, whatever aspersions and reproaches I have or do lie under. I know also that God is just in bringing this sentence and condemnation upon me for my sins; there is a body of sin and death in me deserves this sentence; and there is a similitude and likeness also, that, as a christian, God thinks me worthy to bear with my Lord and head, in many circumstances, in reference to these dealings I have met with; in the good I have been endeavouring for many years to be doing in these nations, and especially now at last, in being numbered among transgressors, and made a public sacrifice, through the wrath and contradictions of men, and in having finished my course, and fought the good fight of faith, and resisted in a way of suffering, as you see, even unto blood.

"This is but the needful preparation the Lord hath been working in me, to the receiving of the crown of immortality, which he hath prepared for them that love him. The prospect whereof is so chearing, that through the joy (in it) that is set before the eyes of my faith, I can, through mercy, 'endure the cross, despise this shame,' and am become 'more than conquerer,' through Christ that hath loved me.

For my Life, Estate and all, is not so dear to me as my service to God, to his cause, to the kingdom of Christ, and the future welfare of my country; and I am taught, according to the example, as well as that most christian saying of a noble person,* that lately died after this public manner in Scotland; 'How much better it is to choose affliction and the cross, than to sin or draw back from the service of the living God, into the ways of apostacy and perdition!'

"That noble person, whose memory I honour, was with myself at the beginning and making of the Solemn League and Covenant; the matter of which, and the holy ends therein contained, I fully assent unto, and have been as desirous to observe; but the rigid way of prosecuting it, and the oppressing uniformity that hath been endeavoured by it, I never approved. This was sufficient to vindicate me from the false aspersions and calumnies which have been laid upon me, of Jesuitism and Popery, and almost what not, to make my name of ill savour with good men; which dark mists do now dispel of themselves, or at least ought, and need no pains of mine in making an apology. For if any man seek a proof of Christ in me, let him read it in this action of my death, which will not cease to speak when I am gone: And henceforth let no man trouble me, for I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus.

"I shall not desire in this place to take up much time, but only, as my last words, leave this with you: That as the present storm we now lie under, and the dark elonds that yet hang over the reformed churches of Christ, (which are coming thicker and thicker for a season) were not unforeseen by me for many years past (as some writings of mine declare :) So the coming of Christ in these clouds, in order to a speedy and sudden revival of his cause, and spreading his kingdom over the face of the whole earth, is most clear to the eye of my faith, even that faith in which I die, whereby the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdom of our Lord, and of his Christ. Amen. Even so, come, Lord Jesus."

Before the stroke, he spake to this effect: 'I bless the Lord, who hath accounted me worthy to suffer for his name.—Blessed be the Lord that I have kept a conscience void of offence to this day. I bless the Lord I have not deserted the righteous cause for which I suffer.' When he laid his neck on the block he concluded his life with these words: 'Father, glorify thy servant in the sight of men, that he may glorify thee in the discharge of his duty to thee and to his country.' Upon which the executioner did his office.*

Hume, speaking of Vane, says, "This man, so celebrated for his parliamentary talents, and for his capacity in business, has left some writings behind him: They treat, all of them, of religious subjects, and are absolutely unintelligible, no traces of eloquence, or even common sense appears in them: a strange paradox! did we not know, that men of the greatest genius, where they relinquish by principle the use of their reason, are only enabled, by their vigour of mind, to work themselves the deeper into error and absurdity." Burnet, after noticing the mercy shewn to Martin, Goodwin and Milton, says, "But as the sparing these persons was much censured, so on the other hand the putting sir Henry Vane to death was as much blamed: For the Declaration from Breda being full for an indemnity to all, except the Regicides, he was comprehended in that; since, though he was for changing the government, and deposing the king, yet he did not approve the putting of him to death, nor of the force put on the parliament, but did for some time, while these things were acted, withdraw from the scene. This was so represented by his friends, that an address was made by both houses on his behalf, to which the king gave a favourable answer, though in general words. So he reckoned that he was safe, that being equivalent to an act of parliament, though it wanted the necessary forms. Yet the great share he had in the attainder of the earl of Strafford, and in the whole turn of affairs to the total change of government, but above all the great opinion that was had of his parts and capacity to embroil matters again, made the Court think it was necessary to put him out of the way. He was naturally a very fearful man: This one who knew him well told me, and gave me eminent instances of it. He had a head as darkened in his notions of religion, as his mind was clouded with fear: For though he set up a form of religion in a way of his own, yet it consisted rather in a withdrawing from all other forms, than in any new or particular opinions or forms; from which he and his party were called Seekers, and seemed to wait for some new and clearer manifestations. In these meetings he preached and prayed often himself, but with so peculiar a darkness, that though I have sometimes taken pains to see if I could find out his meaning in his works, yet I could never reach it. And since many others have said the same, it may be reasonable to believe he hid somewhat that was a necessary key to the rest. His friends told me, he leaned to Origen's notion of a universal salvation of all, both of devils and damned, and to the doctrine of pre-existence. When he saw his death was designed, he composed himself to it, with a resolution that surprised all who knew how little of that was natural to him. Some instances of this were very extraordinary, though they cannot be mentioned with decency. He was beheaded on Tower-hill, where a new and very indecent practice was begun. It was observed, that the dying speeches of the Regicides had left impressions on the hearers, that were not at all to the advantage of the government. So strains of a peculiar nature being expected from him, to prevent that, drummers were placed under the scaffold, who as soon as he began to speak to the public, upon a sign given, struck up with their drums. This put him in no disorder. He desired they might be stopped, for he understood what was meant by it. Then he went through his devotions. And, as he was taking leave of those about him, he happening to say somewhat with relation to the times, the drums struck up a second time: So he gave over and died with so much composure, that it was generally thought, the government had lost more than it had gained by his death."

* "He died in the very same place on Tower-hill (says that great dealer in judgments, Mr. Echard) with the famous earl of Strafford. And it is farther observed, that as he was the first man that opened the fountain of blood that over-run the English nation, so he was the last that closed it up in his own execution." Ralph. The latter observation Mr. Hume has thought worth insertion in his History, without notice of its antiquity. It has been said with sufficient probability, that Vane owed his doom to his share in the proceedings against Strafford. See vol. 3. p. 1442.

* He seems to intend the marquis of Argyle, who spake to that effect.

Among those that censured the mercy shewn to Milton, we may suppose the author of "Regii Clamor Sanguinis, &c." to be one. After citing a very obnoxious passage of Cromwell's, he says, "Ejusmodi sesamo et papavera conspersa sunt infames Milton paginæ, à carnifice Parisiensi, supremi senatus auctoritate, nuperrime crematæ, utinam et scriptor." The admirers of Paradise Lost have no obligations, for the pleasure which they have enjoyed from that work, to Peter du Moulin the younger.

Oldmixon thinks that Burnet, in saying, "Some extraordinary instances of Vane's resolution cannot be mentioned with decency," is too delicate.*

"Among the foremost rank of those heroic characters who sat at the helm during the short period of the much execrated Long Parliament," says Mrs. Macaulay, "stands sir Henry Vane, whose honesty was too pure to be corrupted by the rigour of persecution, or the emoluments of office and the enjoyment of power, whose judgment was too sound to be depraved by that high enthusiasm in religion into which a fine imagination is so apt to deviate, when in contemplating divine subjects it ranges beyond the bounds of human knowledge and experience, whose resolution was so philosophical as in the sufferance of his martyrdom to conquer the almost irresistible influence of natural timidity, and whose abilities were so eminent as when reduced to the state of a prisoner to give terror to a powerful government. With the highest degree of enthusiasm in religion he preserved the liberality of sentiment, and candour of a philosopher in the important point of a philosopher, and he is perhaps a singular instance in the being equal to the most important transactions of this world whilst his thoughts were constantly bent on the sublimest concerns of another state."

Clarendon, after mentioning that Vane was the principal contriver of the Covenant, and that the Commissioners in Scotland were entirely and stupidly governed by him, adds,

"He was indeed a man of extraordinary parts, a pleasant wit, a great understanding, which pierced into, and discerned the purposes of other men with wonderful sagacity, whilst he had himself vultum clausum, that no man could make a guess of what he intended. He was of a temper not to be moved, and of rare dissimulation, and could comply when it was not reasonable to contradict, without losing ground by the condescension; and if he were not superior to Mr. Hampden, he was inferior to no other man, in all mysterious artifices. There need no more be said of his ability, than that he was chosen to cozen, and deceive a whole nation that was thought to excel in craft and cunning: which he did with notable pregnancy and dexterity, and prevailed with a people, that could not otherwise be prevailed upon than by advancing their idol presbytery, to sacrifice their peace, their interest, and their faith, to the erecting a power and authority that resolved to persecute presbytery to an extirpation; and, in process of time, very near brought their purpose to pass." And in another place he says, "Vane was a man not to be described by any character or religion; in which he had swallowed some of the fancies, and extravagancies of every sect, or faction; and was become (which cannot be expressed by any other language than was peculiar to that time) a man above ordinances, unlimited, or unrestrained by any rules, or bounds prescribed to other men, by reason of his perfection. He was a perfect enthusiast; and, without doubt, did believe himself inspired; which so far corrupted his reason and understanding (which in all matters without the verge of religion was superior to that of most men) that he did at some time believe, he was the person deputed to reign over the saints upon earth for 1,000 years."

* See p. 188. note *.

Of the execution of Argyle, Vane, and the Regicides, Mr. Fox writes thus:

"The first years of this reign, under the administration of Southampton and Clarendon, form by far the least exceptionable part of it; and even in this period, the executions of Argyle and Vane, and the whole conduct of the government with respect to church matters, both in England and Scotland, were gross instances of tyranny. With respect to the execution of those who were accused of having been more immediately concerned in the king's death, that of Scrope, who had come in upon the proclamation, and of the military officers who had attended the trial, was a violation of every principle of law and justice. But the fate of the others, though highly dishonourable to Monk, whose whole power had arisen from his zeal in their service, and the favour and confidence with which they had rewarded him, and not perhaps very creditable to the nation, of which many had applauded, more had supported, and almost all had acquiesced in the act, is not certainly to be imputed as a crime to the king, or to those of his advisers who were of the cavalier party. The passion of revenge, though properly condemned both by philosophy and religion, yet when it is excited by injurious treatment of persons justly dear to us, is among the most excusable of human frailties; and if Charles, in his general conduct, had shown stronger feelings of gratitude for services performed to his father, his character, in the eyes of many, would be rather raised than lowered by this example of severity against the Regicides." Respecting the alleged injunctions of king Charles the 1st, that vengeance should not be taken for his death, See the note to vol. 4, p. 1140, of this Collection.

211. The Trial of JOHN CROOK, ISAAC GREY, and JOHN BOLTON, Quakers, at the Old Bailey, for refusing to take the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy.* 14 CHARLES II. A. D. 1662. [Related by John Crook.]

I BEING in John's Street, London, about the 13th day of the 3d month called May, with some others of the people of God to wait upon him, as we were set together, there came in a rude man called Miller with a long cane in his hand, who laid violent hands upon me, with some others; who having no warrant were not willing to meddle, but as his threatenings pre-

* Mr. East in his Treatise of the Pleas of the Crown, ch. 1, s. 19, gives the following summary of the Statutes now in force respecting the not taking the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, and making the Declaration against Popery. "By the act of the 1 Eliz. c. 1, all ancient ecclesiastical jurisdictions were restored and united to the crown, and its supremacy in such matters was finally asserted and established; and an oath to that effect appointed to be taken by all officers and ministers ecclesiastical and civil, on pain, in case of refusal, of the party forfeiting for life every promotion, benefice and office, spiritual and temporal, which he had at the time of such refusal, and being disabled from taking any such preferment to which he was then promoted. This oath was abrogated by the stat. 1 W. and M. c. 8, and another appointed to be taken in lieu of it under the same penalties. By s. 37, of the said stat. of Eliz. the offence must be proved by two witnesses at least.

court, &c. attorneys, sheriffs, and officers belonging to the common or any other law, or to the crown, or to any court whatever, shall, by stat. 5 Eliz. c. 1, s. 5, take the said oath in open court before they shall be admitted to any such vocation or office, &c.; and if they belong not to any court, then they shall take the same before such person as shall admit them to such vocation, &c. or before commissioners appointed under the great seal, &c.

"By s. 6, any bishop may tender the said oath to any spiritual person within his diocese, as well in places exempt as others; and by s. 7, commissioners may be appointed by the lord chancellor to tender the same to such persons as by their commission they shall be authorised to do. And by s. 8, if any person compellable by either of the said acts, or appointed by such commissioners to take the said oath, shall refuse to take it on a tender thereof, he shall incur a præmunire. And by s. 9, such refusal shall be certified within 40 days if in term, or otherwise at the first day of the full term next following the 40 days, into B. R. by the persons having authority to tender such oath, under the penalty of 100*l.*; and the sheriff of the county where the court sit may impanel a jury to inquire of such refusal, in such manner as if it had happened in the same county; which jury may, upon such certificate and other evidence, indict the offender in such sort as if the offence had been done in the same county. But though such a jury may find the indictment, still it is said, that the trial must be by a jury of that county wherein the oaths were refused.

"By stat. 30 Car. 2, stat. 2, c. 1, and 1 Geo. 1, stat. 2, c. 1, s. 16, 17. and 22. "No peer or member of the House of Peers shall vote, or make his proxy, or sit there during any debate; and no member of the House of Commons shall vote or sit there during any debate, after the Speaker is chosen; until such peer or member shall take the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, and make a declaration (therein specified) of his belief that there is no transubstantiation in the sacrament of the Lord's supper, and that the invocation or adoration of the virgin Mary, or any other saint, and the sacrifice of the mass as they are now used in the church of Rome, are superstitious and idolatrous, &c. on pain that every such offender shall be adjudged a popish recusant convict, and disabled to hold or execute any office, &c. or from thenceforth to sit or vote in either house of parliament, or to sue in law or equity, or to be guardian, executor, or administrator, or capable of any legacy or deed of gift, and shall forfeit for every such wilful offence 500*l*."

"The 9th, 12th, and 13th clauses of the same statute, which require that "every sworn servant to the king shall take the said oaths, and make and subscribe the said declaration," are repealed by the stat. 2 Geo. 2, c. 31, s. 9.

"By stat. 1 W. and M. c. 9. "Every justice of peace in London and Westminster, and within ten miles thereof, shall cause to be arrested and brought before him all reputed papists, (except foreigners, being merchants or menial servants to some ambassador or public agent, &c.) and shall tender the above mentioned declaration to every such person; and every such person refusing the same, and afterwards remaining within the above limits, or being certified by justices out of those limits to B. R. or the quarter sessions for such refusal, and neglecting to make the said declaration in such court, shall suffer as a popish recusant convict." Supposed papists, required by two justices of peace to make the said declaration, and neglecting so to do, are, by stat. 1 W. and M. c. 15, restricted in the privilege of keeping arms, ammunition, and horses at their pleasure; and by stat. 1 W. and M. c. 26, from presenting to any benefice. And by the land-tax acts papists in general are liable to pay double land-tax if they do not conform. But now, by 31 Geo. 3, c. 32, s. 18, no papist making and subscribing the oath and declaration therein contained shall be prosecuted on the former statutes.

"Also by stat. 7 and 8 W. 3. c. 24, any serjeant or counsellor at law, barrister, advocate, attorney, solicitor, proctor, clerk, or notary, practising as such in any court whatsoever, not having before taken, in the court of chancery, or king's bench, or quarter sessions of the county wherein he lives, the oath required by the stat. 1 W. and M. c. 8, and made and subscribed the declaration appointed by the stat. 25 Car. 2, c. 2, (to prevent danger from popish recusants) shall incur a præmunire. This, so far as respects Roman Catholics, is repealed by stat. 31 Geo. 3, c. 32, s. 22, as to such as bring themselves within the same.

"By stat. 7 and 8 W. 3, c. 27, any person refusing to take the said oaths of allegiance and supremacy when tendered, or refusing or neglecting to appear, when lawfully summoned, in order to have the said oaths tendered to him, shall, until he shall have taken the same, incur all the pains and penalties of popish recusants convict: and the person so tendering the said oaths shall, on every such refusal or default, record and enter in parchment the christian and surname and place of abode of the party together with the time of tender and refusal or default, and shall certify the said record or entry to the justices of assise, oyer und terminer or gaol delivery at their next session, who shall estreat and certify the same into the court of exchequer, who may award such process against the lands and goods of the party as in the case of a popish recusant convict. Bys. 12, quakers, who scruple to take an oath, may make a declaration of fidelity to the same effect.

"The stat. 1 Geo. 1, st. 2, c. 13, gives the form of the oaths of allegiance and alijuration required to be taken by all officers civil and military, and all ecclesiastical persons, and members of colleges (being of the age of 18 years), and by all teachers or readers in any university or elsewhere, and by all schoolmasters and ushers, and all teachers and preachers of separate congregations, all constables, serjeants at law, counsellors, barristers, advocates, attornies, solicitors, proctors, clerks, or notaries, practising in any court; which oaths are to be taken within three (by 9 Geo. 2, c. 26, s. 4,) six months after they have been admitted into or entered upon any such preferment, benefice, office, or place, or come into such capacity, or taken upon themselves such employment, practice, or business in one of the courts at Westminster, or at the quariar sessions of the county where they reside, under pain of disability to hold or exercise the said offices, &c. upon neglect or refusal to take the said oaths. And persons convicted in any of the courts at Westminster, or at the assizes, of exercising such offices or employments without taking the oaths within the time specified, shall be disabled to sue, or to be guardian, or executor, or administrator, or capable of any legacy upon, yet notwithstanding they committed me, together with Isaac Grey and John Bolton, to New-Prison, where we continued for some days, and were then removed to Newgate, where we remained until the sessions at the Old Bailey; when I was brought to the bar.

Chief Judge, (Sir Robert Forster.) John Crook, when did you take the oath of Allegiance?

J. Crook. I desire to be heard.

C. Judge. And to the question, and you shall be heard.

Crook. I have been about six weeks in prison, and am I now called to accuse myself? For the answering to this question in the negative is to accuse myself, which you ought not to put me upon; for, 'Nemo debet seipsum prodere.' I am an Englishman, and by the law of England I ought not to be taken nor imprisoned, nor disseized of my freehold, nor called in question, nor put to answer, but according to the law of the land; which I challenge as my birth-right, on my own behalf, and all that hear me this day (or words to this purpose). I stand here at this bar as a delinquent, and do desire that my accuser may be brought forth to accuse me for my delinquency, and then I shall answer to my charge (if any I be guilty of).

C. Judge. You are here demanded to take the Oath of Allegiance, and when you have done that, then you shall be heard about the other; for we have power to tender it to any man.

Crook. Not to me upon this occasion, in this place; for I am brought hither as an offender already and not to be made an offender here, or to accuse myself; for I am an Englishman, as I have said to you, and challenge the benefit of the laws of England, for by them is a better inheritance derived to me as an Englishman, than that which I receive from my parents; for by the former the latter is preserved: and this the 29th chapter of Magna Charta, and the Petition of Right, mentioned or deed of gift, or to be in any office within Great Britain, or to vote for members of parliament; and shall forfeit 500*l.*, to be recovered by any informer. And by s. 10. two justices or other persons specially commissioned, may tender the said oaths to any person whom they suspect to be dangerous or disaffected to his majesty or his government, and on their neglect or refusal to take the said oaths, may certify the same to the next quarter sessions; which being there recorded, shall be from thence certified by the clerk of the peace into the courts of Chancery or King's Bench; and every person so neglecting or refusing to take the said oaths shall, from the time of his neglect or refusal, be adjudged a popish recusant convict, and as such to forfeit and be proceeded against. The same punishment is denounced by s. 11, against such as, being lawfully summoned to appear and take the oaths, neglect or refuse to do so." See also ch. 1, s. 5, of the same work.

in the 3d of Car. 1. and in good laws of England; and therefore I desire the benefit and observance of them: And you that are Judges upon the bench ought to be my counsel, and not my accusers, but to inform me of the benefit of those laws, and wherein I am ignorant you ought to inform me, that I may not suffer through my own ignorance of those advantages which the laws of England afford me as an Englishman.

C. Judge. We sit here to do justice, and are upon our oaths, and we are to tell you what is law, and not you us: Therefore, Sirrah, you are too bold.

Crook. Sirrah is not a word becoming a Judge; for I am no felon; neither ought you to menace the prisoner at the bar: for I stand here arraigned as for my life and liberty, and the preservation of my wife and children, and outward estate (they being now at the stake); Therefore you ought to hear me to the full what I can say in my own defence, according to law, and that in its season, as it is given me to speak: Therefore I hope the Court will hear with me, if I am bold to assert my liberty as an Englishman and as a Christian: and if I speak loud, it is my zeal for the truth, and for the name of the Lord; and mine innocency makes me bold.

Judge. It is an evil zeal. [interrupting John Crook.]

Crook. No, I am bold in the name of the Lord God Almighty, the everlasting Jehovah, to assert the truth, and stand as a witness for it: let my accuser be brought forth, and I am ready to answer any Court of Justice.

Then the Judge interrupted me, saying, 'Sirrah,' with some other words I do not remember: But I answered, You are not to threaten me, neither are those menaces fit for the mouth of a Judge: for the safety of a prisoner stands in the indifference of the Court; And you ought not to behave yourselves as parties; seeking all advantages against the prisoner, but not heeding any thing that may make for his clearing or advantage.—The Judge again interrupted me, saying,

Judge. Sirrah, you are to take the oath, and here we tender it you [bidding me to read it].

Crook. Let me see mine accuser, that I may know for what cause I have been six weeks imprisoned, and do not put me to accuse myself by asking me questions; but either let my accuser come forth, or otherwise let me be discharged by proclamation, as you ought to do.—Here I was interrupted again.

Judge Twisden. We take no notice of your being here otherwise than of a straggler, or as any other persons, or of the people that are here this day; for we may tender the oath to any man.—And another Judge spake to the like purpose.

Crook. I am here at your bar as a prisoner restrained of my liberty, and do question whether you ought in justice to tender me the oath on the account I am now brought before you, because I am supposed to be an offender, or else why have I been six weeks in prison already? Let me be cleared of my imprisonment, and then I shall answer to what is charged against me, and to the question now propounded; for I am a lover of justice with all my soul, and am well known by my neighbours where I have lived, to keep a conscience void of offence both towards God, and towards man.

Judge. Sirrah, leave your canting.

Crook. Is this canting, to speak the words of the Scripture?

Judge. It is canting in your mouth, though they are St. Paul's words.

Crook. I speak but the words of the Scripture, and it is not canting though I speak them; but they are words of truth and soberness in my mouth, they being witnessed by me, and fulfilled in me.

Judge. We do ask you again, whether you will take the Oath of Allegiance? It is but a short question, you may answer it if you will.

Crook. By what law have you power to tender it? [Then, after some consultation together by whispering, they called for the Statute-Book, and turning over the leaves, they answered,] Judge. By the 3d of king James.*

* By st. 3 Jac. 1, c. 4, for the better trial how his majesty's subjects stand affected in point of their loyalty and due obedience: it was enacted, "That from, and after the end of this present session of parliament, it shall be lawful to and for any bishop in his diocese, or any two justices of the peace, whereof one of them to be of the Quorum within the limits of their jurisdiction, out of the sessions, to require any person of the age of 18 years or above, being, or which shall be convict or indicted of or for any recusancy, other than noblemen or noblewomen, for not repairing to divine service according to the laws of this realm, or which shall not have received the said sacrament twice within the year next passed, noblemen and noblewomen excepted, or any person passing in or through the county, shire, or liberty and unknown, except as is last before excepted, that being examined by them upon oath, shall confess or deny himself or herself to be a recusant, or shall confess or not deny that he or she had not received the sacrament twice within the year then last past, to take the oath hereafter following, upon the Holy Evangelist: which the said bishop or two justices of the peace shall certify in writing, subscribed with his or their hands at the next general or quarter-sessions for that shire, limit, division or liberty within which the said oath shall be so taken, the Christian name, surname and place of abode of every person which shall so take the said oath, which certificate shall be there recorded by the clerk of peace or town clerk, and kept amongst the records of the said session."

And further, "That if any such person or persons other than noblemen or noblewomen, shall refuse to answer upon oath to such bishop or justices of peace examining him or her as aforesaid, or to take the said oath so duly tendered unto him or her by such bishop, or two such justices of peace out of sessions, that then the said justices of peace shall and may commit the same person to the Common Gaol, there to remain without bail or mainprise until the next assizes, or general or quarter-sessions to be holden for the said shire, division, limit or liberty, where the said oath shall be again in the said open assizes or sessions, required of such person by the said justices of assize, or justices of peace then and there present, or the greater number of them. And if the said person or persons, or any other person whatsoever, other than noblemen or noblewomen, of the age of 18 years or above, shall refuse to take the said oath, being tendered unto him or her by the justices of assize and gaol delivery, in their open assizes, or the justices of peace or the greater part of them, in their said general or quarter-sessions, every person so refusing shall incur the danger and penalty of Præmunire, mentioned in the statute of Præmunire, made in the 16th year of the reign of Richard the 2nd, except women covert, who upon refusal of the said oath shall be by the said justices of assize in their open assize, or justices of peace in their general or quarter-sessions, for the said offence committed only to the Common Gaol, there to remain without bail or mainprise, till they will take the said oath. The tenor of which said oath hereafter followeth:

"I A. B. do truly and sincerely acknowledge, profess, testify and declare in my conscience before God and the world, That our sovereign lord king James is lawful and rightful king of this realm, and of all other his majesty's dominions and countries; and that the Pope neither of himself, nor by any authority of the church or see of Rome, or by any other means, with any other, hath any power or authority to depose the king, or to dispose any of his majesty's kingdoms or dominions, or to authorise any foreign prince to invade or annoy him, or his countries, or to discharge any of his subjects of their allegiance and obedience to his majesty, or to give licence or leave to any of them to bear arms, raise tumult, or to offer any violence or hurt to his majesty's royal person, state or government, or to any of his majesty's subjects within his majesty's dominions. Also I do swear from my heart, that notwithstanding any declaration or sentence of excommunication or deprivation made or granted, or to be made or granted by the Pope or his successors, or by any authority derived, or pretended to be derived from him or his see, against the said place upon this occasion, as a delinquent already; and therefore I desire the Judgment of the Court in this case, and that the statute may be read.

Then they took the Statute-Book and consulted together upon it, and one said; We are the Judges of this land, and do better understand our power than you do, and we do judge we may lawfully do it.

Crook. Is this the Judgment of the Court?

Judge. Yes.

'king his heirs or successors, or any absolution of the said subjects from their obedience, I will bear faith and true allegiance to his majesty his heirs and successors, and him or them will defend to the uttermost of my power, against all conspiracies and attempts whatsoever which shall be made against his or their persons, their crown and dignity, by reason or colour of any such sentence or declaration, or otherwise, and will do my best endeavour to disclose and make known unto his majesty, his heirs and successors, all treasons and traitorous conspiracies, which I shall know or hear of, to be against him or any of them. And I do further swear, that I do from my heart abhor, detest and abjure as impious and heretical, this damnable doctrine and position, That princes which be excommunicated or deprived by the Pope, may be deposed or murdered by their subjects, or any other whatsoever. And I do believe and in my conscience am resolved, that neither the Pope nor any person whatsoever, hath power to absolve me of this oath, or any part thereof, which I acknowledge by good and full authority to be lawfully ministered unto me, and do renounce all pardons and dispensations to the contrary. And all these things I do plainly and sincerely acknowledge and swear, according to these express words by me spoken, and according to the plain and common sense and understanding of the same words, without any equivocation or mental evasion, or secret reservation whatsoever. And I do make this recognition and acknowledgement heartily, willingly and truly, upon the true faith of a Christian. So help me God.'

The following Report of a Case upon this statute is in Kelyng, p. 38. "At the same time and sessions (Dec. 7, 1664, Old Bailey), one Isaac Marriot and others were committed, and the mittimus was for refusing to take the Oath of Allegiance, and so the justice of the peace thought to bring them into a Præmunire, but the Court discharged him and the rest, because the Oath intended was the Oath enjoined by the statute of 3 Jac. 1, c. 4, and it is not an Oath of Allegiance, though it be commonly so called; but in truth it is an Oath of Obedience, and so the Court discharged them because there was no such Oath of Allegiance, &c."

How the law stands at present, is stated in the preceding note.

Crook. I desire the statute to be read that empowers you to tender the oath to me upon this occasion in this place; for, 'Vox audita perit, sed litera scripta manet,' therefore let me hear it read.

Judge. Hear me.

Crook. I am as willing to hear as to speak.

Judge. Then hear me: You are here required to take the oath by the court, and I will inform you what the penalty will be in case you refuse: for, your first denial shall be recorded, and then it shall be tendered to you again at the end of the sessions, and upon the second refusal you run a Præmunire,* which is the forfeiture of all your estate, if you have any, and imprisonment during life.

Crook. It is justice I stand for; let me have justice, in bringing my accuser face to face, as by law you ought to do, I standing at your bar as a delinquent; and when that is done, I will answer to what can be charged against me, as also to the question; until then I shall give no other answer than I have already done, at least at present.

Then there was a cry in the court, 'Take him away,' which occasioned great interruption, and J. Crook spake to this purpose, saying, Mind the fear of the Lord God, that you may come to the knowledge of his will,

* Præmunire is a law corruption of Præmonere. The words 'Præmunire facias' being in the writ of citation or warning (garnishment, it is called, in 27 E. 3. st. 1, c. 1, which is the first stat. of Præmunire. See Barrington's Observations on the Statute of Provisors, 27 E. 3. st. 6. though the stat. of 16 R. 2. c. 5. is usually called the stat. of Præmunire, 4 Blackst. Commen. 412.) for the execution of certain statutes against the Papal power, have caused to be given, not only to the writ, but to the offence itself of maintaining the Papal power, the name of Præmunire. The punishment is thus shortly summed up by lord Coke: From the conviction the defendant shall be out of the king's protection, and his lands and tenements, goods and chattels forfeited to the king, and his body shall remain in prison at the king's pleasure, (or as other authorities, says Blackstone, quoting Bulstrode's Reports, have it, during life). Imprisonment for life, Blackstone notices, amounts to no more than imprisonment during the king's pleasure, since the king has the prerogative of remitting the whole or any part of the punishment, except indeed, in the case of a Præmunire incurred by offending against the Habeas Corpus Act, st. 31. C. 2. s. 2. Prosecutions on a Præmunire are, as Mr. Christian mentions, unheard-of in our courts. And accordingly in Mr. East's copious 'Treatise of the Pleas of the Crown,' there is no such title as 'Præmunire,' nor is the word to be found in the Index to that work. See more learning respecting Præmunire in Blackst. Commen. Book 4. ch. 8.; Barrington's Observations on the Statute of Provisors; and Co. Litt. 391, a, and the notes to the last edition.

and do justice; and take heed of oppressing the innocent, for the Lord God of heaven and earth will assuredly plead their cause: and for my part, I desire not the hurt of one of the hairs of your heads, but let God's wisdom guide you.—These words he spake at the bar, and as he was carrying away.

On the Sixth Day of the Week, in the forenoon, the Court being sate, John Crook was called to the Bar.

Chief Judge. Friend Crook, We have given you time to consider of what was said yesterday to you by the court, hoping you may have better considered of it by this time: therefore, without any more words, will you take the Oath? [and called to the clerk, and bid him read it.]

Crook. I did not, neither do I deny allegiance, but do desire to know the cause of my so long imprisonment; for, as I said, I stand at your bar as a delinquent, and am brought hither by force, contrary to the law; therefore let me see my accuser, or else free me by proclamation, as I ought to be, if none can accuse me: For the law is grounded upon right reason, and whatsoever is contrary to right reason, is contrary to law; and therefore if no accuser appear, you ought to acquit me first, and then I shall answer, as I have said, if any new matter appear; otherwise it is of force, and that our law abhors, and you ought not to take notice of my so being before you; for what is not legally so, is not so; and therefore I am in the condition, as if I were not before you: and therefore it cannot be supposed in right reason, that you have now power at this time, and in this place, legally to tender me the oath.

Judge. Read the oath to him. [And so the clerk began to read.]

Crook. I desire justice according to the laws of England: for you ought first to convict me concerning the cause of my so long imprisonment: for you are to proceed according to laws already made, and not to make laws; for you ought to be the ministers of the law.

Judge. You are a saucy and an impudent fellow; will you tell us what is law in our duties? Then said he to the clerk, Read on; and when the clerk had done reading, Crook said, Read the preface to the Act: I say again, read the title and preamble to the act; for titles to laws are Claves Legum, as keys to open the law: For by their titles laws are understood and known, as men by their faces.—Then the judges would have interrupted me, but I said as followeth, If you will not hear me, nor do me justice, I must appeal to the Lord God of heaven and earth, who is judge of quick and dead, before whom we shall all appear to give an account for the deeds done in the body; for he will judge between you and me this day, whether you have done me justice or not.

These words following, or the like, I spake as going from the bar, being pulled away, viz.

Mind the fear of the Lord God, that you may do justice, lest you perish in his wrath: For some time the Court cried, 'Pull him away,' and then said, 'Bring him again:' and thus they did several times, like men in confusion and disorder.

The same day in the afternoon, silence being made, John Crook was called to the bar before the Judges and Justices aforesaid: the Indictment* being read,

* The Indictment was as follows:

The Judge said, Mr. Crook, You have heard your Indictment, what say you, are you Guilty, or Not Guilty?

J. Crook. I desire to speak a few words in humility and soberness, in regard my estate and liberty lies at stake, and am like to be a precedent for many more; therefore I hope the court will not deny me the right and benefit of the law, as being an Englishman; I have some reason, before I speak any thing to the Indictment, to demand and tell you, that I desire to know mine accusers; I have been kept this six weeks in prison, and know not, nor have seen the faces of them.

Judge. We shall afford you the right of the law as an Englishman, God forbid you should be denied it; but you must answer first, Guilty, or Not Guilty, that so in your trial you may have a fair hearing and pleading : but if you go on as you do (and will not answer Guilty, or Not Guilty) you will run yourself into a Premunire, and then you lose the benefit of the law, and expose yourself, body and estate, to great hazards; and whatever violence is offered to your person or estate, you are out of the king's protection, and lose the benefit of the law, and all^e this by your not answering Guilty, or Not Guilty: if you plead Not Guilty, you may be heard.

J. Crook. It is recorded in the Statutes of the 28 Edw. 3 and 3, and 42 Edw. 3 and 3, in these words, 'No man is to be taken, or imprisoned, or be put to answer without pre-sentment before justices, or matter of record, or by due process, or writ original, according to the old law of the land; and if any thing from henceforth be done to the contrary, it shall be void in law, and holden for error:' and also in the 25 of Edw. 1, 2, and the 3 Car. 1, and the 29 cap. Mag. Chart. 'No freeman shall be taken and imprisoned but by the law of the land:' these words ['the law of the land'] are explained by the statute of 37 Edw. 3, 8, to be 'without due process of law:' and if any judgments be given contrary to Mag. Chart. they are void, 25 Edw. 1, 2.

Judge. Mr. Crook, you are out of the way, and do not understand the law; though you adore the Statute Law so much, yet you do not understand it.

Cr. I would have you tell me the right way.

Judge. Mr. Crook, hear me. You must say, Guilty, or Not Guilty; if you plead Not Guilty, you shall be heard, and know how far the law favours you. And the next thing is, there is no circumstance whatsoever that is the cause of your imprisonment that you question, but you have, as a subject, your remedies, if you will go this way, and waive other things, and answer Guilty, or Not Guilty; and what the law affords you, you shall have, if you do what the law requires you, or else you will lose the benefit of the law, and be out of the king's protection.

Crook. Observe how the judge would draw me into a snare, viz. by first pleading Guilty, or Not Guilty; and when I have done so, he and his brethren intend suddenly to put me (as an out-lawed person) out of the king's protection; and how then can I have remedy for my false imprisonment? Therefore first clear me, or condemn me for my false imprisonment, while I am in a capacity to have the benefit of the law, and not to out-law me for an offence created by yourselves; and then to stop my mouth, you tell me, that if I have been wronged or false imprisoned, I may have my remedy^a afterwards; this is to trepan me, and contrary to both law and justice, &c.

Judge. You must plead Guilty, or Not Guilty.

Crook. I do desire in humility and meekness to say, I shall not, I dare not betray the honesty of my cause, and the honest ones of this nation, whose liberty I stand for as well as my own, as I have cause to think I shall, if I plead to the present Indictment before I see the faces of my accusers; for truly, I am not satisfied in my judgment and conscience that I ought to plead to a created offence by you, before I be first acquitted of the cause of my being brought prisoner to your bar, and therefore it sticks with me to urge this further, viz. That I may see my accusers. (Interruption)

Judge. The arrantest thief may say he is not satisfied in his conscience.

Crook. My case is not theirs, yet they have their accusers; and may not I call for mine? And therefore call for them, for you ought to do so, as Christ said to the woman, ('Woman, where are thine accusers?') so you ought to say to me, ('Man, where are thine accusers?')

Judge. Your Indictment is your accuser, and the Grand Jury hath found you Guilty, because you did not swear; what say you, Mr. Crook, are you Guilty or Not Guilty? If you will not answer, or what you have said be taken for your answer, as I told you before, you lose the benefit of the law; and what I tell you is for your good.

Crook. What is for good I hope I shall take it so.

Judge. If you will not answer, you run yourself into a Premunire, and you will lose the benefit of the law, and of the king's protection, unless you plead Guilty, or Not Guilty.

Crook. I stand as brought forcibly and violently hither, neither had I been here but by a violent action, and that you should take no notice of it, seems strange to me; and not only so, but that you should hasten me so fast into a course that I should not be able any ways to help myself, by reason of your so hasty and fast proceedings against me to put me out of the king's protection, and the benefit of all law; was ever the like known in a court of justice!

Judge. Friend, this is not here in question, whether you are unjustly brought here, or not: do you question that by law, but not disable yourself to take advantage by the law; if brought by a wrong hand, you have a plea against them, but you must first answer Guilty, or Not Guilty.

Crook. How can I help myself when you have out-lawed me? Therefore let proclamation be made in the court, that I was brought by force hither, and let me stand cleared by proclamation, as you ought to do: for you are 'discernere per legem, quid sit justum,' and not to do what seems good in your own eyes. [Here I was interrupted again, but might have spoken justice Crook's words in Hampden's Case,* who said, 'That we who are judges speak upon our oaths, and therefore must deliver our judgments according to our consciences; and the fault will lie upon us if it be illegal, and we deliver it for law: and further said, 'We that are judges must not give our judgments according to policy, or rules of state, nor conveniencies, but only according to law.' These were his words, which I might have spoken, but was interrupted.]

Judge. What though no man tendered the oath to you when you were committed (as you say), it being now tendered to you? From the time you refused it, being tendered to you by a lawful authority, you refusing, are indicted; we look not upon what you are here for, but here finding you, we tender you the oath, and you refusing it, your imprisonment is now just and according to law.

Crook. How came I here, if you know not? I have told you it is by force and violence, which our law altogether condemns; and therefore I not being legally before you, am not before you; for what is not legally so, is not so; and I not being legally brought to your bar, you ought not to take notice of my being here.

Judge. No, no, you are mistaken: so you may say of all the people gazing here, they not being legally here, are not here. I tell you, a man being brought by force hither, we may tender him the oath, and if he take it not, he may be committed to prison; authority hath given us the power, and the statute-law hath given us authority to tender the oath to any person, and so have we tendered it you, and for your not taking of it, you are indicted by the Grand Jury: answer the accusation, or confute the indictment, you must do the one or the other; answer Guilty, or Not Guilty.

[J. Crook. Here I was interrupted, but might have said, that the people that were spectators, beholding and hearing the trials, are not to be called gazers, as the judge terms them, because it is their liberty and privilege as they are Englishmen, and the law of England allows the same; so that they are not to be termed gazers upon this account, but are legally in that place, to hear trials and see justice done, and might have spoken (if occasion had been) any thing in the prisoner's defence, tending to clear up matter in difference, and the court must have heard them or him, and this as a stander-by or Amicus Curia, so saith Coke.]

Crook. The law is built upon right reason, or right reason is the law: and whatever is contrary to right reason, is contrary to law, the reason of the law being the law itself. I am no lawyer, and my knowledge of it is but little, yet I have had a love to it, for that reason I have found in it, and have spent some leisureable hours in the reading thereof; and the law is that which I honour, and is good in its place; many laws being just and good (not all) but I say a great part of it, or much of it, and that is not my intention in the least to disparage or derogate from.

Judge. Mr. Crook, You have been told you must plead Guilty, or Not Guilty, or else you will run yourself into a Premunire; be not your own enemy, nor be not so obstinate.

Crook. I would not stand obstinately before you, neither am I so; if you understand it otherwise, it is a mistake indeed.

Judge. Will you speak to the Indictment? and then you may plead: if you will not answer Guilty, or Not Guilty, we will record it, and judgment shall go against you.—Clerk, enter him.

Recorder. Mr. Crook, If you will answer you may plead for yourself, or will you take the oath? The court takes no notice how you came hither? What say you, will you answer? For a man may be brought out of Smithfield by head and shoulders, and the oath tendered to him, and may be committed, without taking notice how he came here.

Crook. That kind of proceeding is not only unjust but unreasonable also—(here was some interruption) and against the laws aforesaid, which say, 'No man shall be taken, or imprisoned, but by warrant or due process of law;' so that this speech of the recorder's favours more of passion than justice, and cruelty than due observance of law: for every forcible restraint of a man's liberty is an imprisonment in law. Besides, this kind of practice, to take men by force and imprison them, and then ask them questions, the answering of which makes them guilty, is not only unrighteous in itself, but against law, and makes one evil act the ground of another, and one inquiry offered to one the foundation of another; and this is my case this day—(Interruption.)

Judge. Mr. Crook, you must not be your own judge, we are your judges; but for our parts we will not wrong you: will you answer Guilty or not Guilty? If not, you will run yourself into a premunire unavoidable, and then you know what I told you would follow; for we take no notice how you came hither, but finding you here we tender you the oath.

Crook. Then it seems you make the law a trepan to ensnare me, or as a nose of wax, or what you please: Well! I shall leave my cause with the Lord God, who will plead for me in righteousness. But suppose I do take the oath now at this time, you may call me again to morrow and make a new tender; or others may call me before them.

Judge. Yes, if there be new matter; or if there fall out any emergent occasion, whereby you minister on your part new occasion: Mr. Crook, will you swear?

Crook. If I do take it to day, it may be tendered me again to morrow, and so next day, ad infinitum; whereby a great part of my time may be spent and taken up in taking the oath and swearing.

Chief Judge. When you have once sworn, you may not be put upon it again, except you minister occasion on your part.

Crook. Is this the judgment of the court, that the oath once taken by me is sufficient, and ought not to be tendered a second time, without new matter ministered on my part?

Judge. Yes, you making it appear you have once taken it.

Crook. Is this the judgment of the whole Court? for I would not do any thing rashly.

Judges. Yes, it is the judgment of the Court, —To which they all standing up said, Yes.

Crook. Then it seems there must be some new occasion ministered by me after I have once taken it, or it ought not to be tendered to me the second time?

Judges. Yes.

Crook. Then by the judgment of this Court, if I make it appear that I have taken the oath once and I have ministered no new matter on my part, whereby I can be justly charged with the breach of it, then it ought not to be tendered me the second time; but I am the man that have taken it once being a freeman of the City of London, when I was made free, witness the Records in Guildhall, which I may produce, and no new matter appearing to you on my part, if there do, let me know it; if not, you ought not by your own judgment to tender me it the second time; for, 'De non apparentibus et non existentibus, eadem Ratio est'—Interrupted by the shout of the Court, when these last words might have been spoken.

Judge. Mr. Crook, you are mistaken, you must not think to surprize the court with criticisms, nor draw false conclusions from our judgments.

Crook. If this be not a natural conclusion from the Judgment of the Court, let right reason judge; and if you recede from your own judgments in the same breath (as it were) given even now, what justice can I expect from you? for, if you will not be just to yourselves and your own judgments, how can I expect you should be just to me?

Judge. Mr. Crook, If you have taken it, if there be a new emergency, you are to take it again; as for instance, the king hath been out of England, and now is come in again; there be many have taken it 20, 30, or 40 years since, yet this new emergency requires it again; and although you have taken it, yet you must not make it appear before you answer Guilty, or Not Guilty; therefore do not wrong yourself, and prejudice yourself and family: do you think that every fellow that comes hither shall argue as you do? We have no more to do but to know of you whether you will answer Guilty or Not Guilty or take the Oath, and then you shall be freed from the indictment; if you will not plead, Clerk record it; what say you? are you Guilty or not Guilty?

Crook. Will you not stand to your own judgments? Did you not say even now, that if I had once taken the oath, it ought not to be tendered to me the second time, except I administered new matter on my part that I have not kept, &c. but no such matter appearing, you ought not to tender it to me the second time by your own confession, much less to indict me for refusal.

Judge. If you will not plead, we will record it, and judgment shall be given against you; therefore say, Guilty or Not Guilty, or else we will record it. [The Clerk beginning to record it.]

Crook. Before I answer, I demand a copy of my Indictment; for I have heard it affirmed by counsel learned in the law, that if I plead before I have a copy, or have made my exceptions, my exceptions afterwards against the Indictment will be made void: Therefore I desire a copy of the Indictment.

Judge. He that said so, deserves not the name of a Counsel: for the law is, You must first answer, and then you shall have a copy. Will you plead Guilty or not Guilty?

Crook. If my pleading Guilty, or Not Guilty, will not deprive me of the benefit of quashing the Indictment for insufficiency, or other exceptions that I may make against it, I shall speak to it.

Judge. No, it will not. Will you answer Guilty or not Guilty? If you plead not, the indictment will be found against you: Will you answer? We will stay no longer.

Crook. I am upon the point: Will not my pleading deprive me of the benefit of the law? for I am tender in that respect, because it is not my own case only, but may be the case of thousands more; therefore I would do nothing that might prejudice others or myself, as a Christian, or as an Englishman.

Judge. Understand yourself, but we will not make a bargain with you, said another Judge, you shall have the right done you as an Englishman, the way is to answer, Guilty, or Not Guilty: If you plead, and find the indictment not good, you may have your remedy; answer, Guilty, or Not Guilty.

Crook. As to the indictment it is very large, and seems to be confused, and made up of some things true, and some things false: my answer therefore is, what is true in the indictment I will not deny, because I make conscience of what I say, and therefore, of what is true, I confess myself Guilty, but what is false I am Not Guilty of that.

Judge. That is not sufficient: either answer Guilty, or Not Guilty, or judgment will be given against you.

Crook. I will speak the truth as before the Lord, as all along I have endeavoured to do, I am Not Guilty of that which is false contained in the indictment, which is the substance thereof.

Judge. No more ado, the form is nothing, Guilty, or Not?

Crook. I must not wrong my conscience, I am Not Guilty of what is false, as I said before, what is true I am Guilty of; what is not true, I am Not Guilty of that, which is the substance thereof, as I said before.

Recorder. It is enough, and shall serve turn. Enter that, Clerk.

Isaac Grey being called to the Bar.

Judge. Will you take the Oath of Allegiance?

Grey. I have been near five weeks in prison, I desire to know for what.

Judge. We take no notice of your imprisonment, nor how you came here; will you take the oath?

Grey. I desire to know for what I am imprisoned, and then I am ready to answer: for no man (in this particular) hath received so much wrong as myself, having received a wound whereby I was in jeopardy of my life.

Judge. If any have wronged you, take your course in law. Will you swear?

Grey. I am a man of a tender conscience, and do desire time to consider.

Judge. Take him away. Which was accordingly done.

The next day Isaac Grey was called to the Bar, and asked by the Judge, if he would yet take the oath? Recorder speaking unto him on this wise; Mr. Grey, you are a wise understanding man, and a scholar; be advised what you do, and do not ruin yourself, but take the oath.

Grey. I desire time to consider, and to do nothing rashly.

Then in the afternoon were all three again called to the bar, and the indictment read.

Judge. Mr. Grey, will you take the oath? Crier, hold him the book.

Grey. I desire to know the cause of my first imprisonment, and to discharge me of the same before I give my answer to the oath; for I do not know myself guilty of any crime.

Judge. The law supposeth you to be disaffected to the present government, and therefore the oath is tendered to you.

Grey. I understand that the fundamental law of England alloweth no man to be accused or condemned upon supposition: I do further affirm, and that in the light of God, that I am not an enemy to the king, nor to any man living upon the face of the earth.

Judge. Will you answer, Guilty, or Not Guilty?

Grey. I desire time to consider of the truth of the matter; the indictment being large, and having much contained in it which indeed I do not well understand.

Judge. Will you yet swear, or plead to the indictment?

Grey. I have told you, and that for conscience sake, I dare do nothing rashly.

Judge. What do you talk to us of conscience? Every fellow may plead conscience.

Grey. Do you use to swear such as make no conscience?

Judge. Guilty, or Not Guilty? When you have answered to this, you may plead what you can in your own defence; but first answer Guilty, or Not Guilty: The rule of the law is, you must first answer.

Grey. Would you have men swear whether they will or nay, especially when against their consciences?

Judge. We have consciences as well as you: if there be any thing as to matter of conscience, it is nothing! you must plead Guilty or Not Guilty, that we may not spend time any longer.

Grey. Truly, I desire not that the time should be taken up in any thing that may not advantage the good of the people; therefore before I plead, give me a copy of the Indictment and then I shall plead.

Judge. Sirrah, Guilty, or Not Guilty?

Grey. I desire first to be heard as a Christian, and then as an Englishman.

Judge. Do not I tell you sirrah, if you will plead Not Guilty, you shall be heard; but if you will not, you will run yourself into a Pre-munire?

Grey. I appeal then to God Almighty, for I shall not wrong my conscience.

Judge. It is no matter of conscience: Guilty, or Not Guilty?

Grey. Not Guilty.

John Bolton having made the same objections, was at last obliged to plead Not Guilty.

The Seventh Day of the Week called Saturday.

Silence being made, Isaac Grey, John Bolton, and myself were brought to the Bar.

The Clerk of the Sessions read something concerning the Jury, which was empanelled on purpose (as was said) the Jury being discharged who were eye-witnesses of what passed between us and the court: And this jury being divers of them soldiers, some of whom did by violence and force pull and hale friends out of their meetings, and some of us out of our houses; and these were of the Jury by whom we were to be tried. The Clerk reading the indictment (as I remember.)

J. Crook. I desire to be heard a few words, which are these, That we may have liberty till the next quarter-sessions to traverse the indictment, it being long, and in Latin, and like to be a precedent; and I hope I need not press it, because I understood that you promised, (and especially the recorder, who answered (when it was desired) 'you shall') that we should have counsel also, the which we cannot be expected to have had the benefit of, as yet, the time being so short, and we kept prisoners that we could not go forth to advise with counsel, neither could we tell how to get them to us: we having no copy of the indictment before this morning, and because so suddenly hurried down to the sessions, we cannot reasonably be supposed to be provided (as to matter of law) to make our defence.

C. Judge. We have given you time enough, and you shall have no more; for we will try you at this time; therefore swear the jury.

J. Crook. I desire we may have justice, and that we may not be surprised in our trial, but that we may have time till the next quarter sessions, our indictment being in Latin, and so large as it is; and this is but that which is reasonable, and is the practice of other courts; for, if it be but an action above 40s. it is not ordinarily ended under two or three terms. And in the quarter-sessions, if one be indicted for a trespass, if it be but to the value of 5s. he shall have liberty to enter his traverse, and, upon security given to prosecute, he shall have liberty untill the next sessions, which is the ordinary practice; which liberty we desire, and we hope it is so reasonable it will not be denied, especially upon this occasion, we being like to be made a precedent; and courts of justice have used to be especially careful in making of precedents, for we are not provided according to law to make our defence at this time, and therefore if we be put upon it, it will be a surprisal.

Judge. There is no great matter of law in the case, it is only matter of fact, whether you have refused to take the oath or not; that is the point in issue: and what law can arise here?

Recorder. Mr. Crook, the keeper of the prison was spoken to, to tell you that we intended to try you this day, and therefore ordered him that counsel might come to you if you would, and also that the clerk should give you a copy of your indictment: this is fair, therefore we will go on to swear the jury; for the matter is whether you refuse the oath or not? And that is the single point, and there needs neither law nor counsel in the case; and therefore we considered of it last night, when we sent you word and did determine to try you, and therefore it is in vain to say any thing, for the courts resolved to try you now, therefore swear the jury, crier.

J. Crook. I hope you will not surprize us. Then the other prisoners (who also were indicted cried out (having spoke something before). Let us have justice, and let not the jury be sworn till we be first heard; so there was a great noise, the court being in a confusion, some crying, Take them away; others, Stay, let them alone; others saying, Go on to swear the jury, which the Crier in this uproar and confusion, did do something, as if he had done it; then we all cried out for justice, and liberty till the next sessions; the court being in a confusion, some crying one thing, and some another, which now cannot be called to mind, by reason of the great distrattion that was in the court, neither what we said to them, nor they to us, the noise was so great, and the commands of the court so various to the officers, some commanding them to take us away, others, to let us alone, others to bring us nearer, others cried, put them into the Bail-dock, others, to put them within the furthest bar where the felons used to stand, where we were forced into accordingly; and in this hurly-burly and confusion that was among them, some men were sworn to testify that we refused to take the oath, which we never positively did; other officers of the court whom they would have sworn, refused to swear; though pressed to it by the Chief Justice, they desired to be excused. Then spake one of the prisoners again pretty much, but could hardly be understood by reason of the noise in the court, but the people, to whom he spake with a loud voice by way of exhortation, might hear the substance of what he said, which cannot now particularly be called to mind; but it was to express the presence and love of God to himself, and to exhort others to mind his fear, that they also might be acquainted with God, &c.

Judge. Stop his mouth, Executioner; which was accordingly done.

Prisoners. Then we cried out, Will you not give us leave to speak for ourselves? We except against some of the jury, as being our enemies, and some of them who by force commanded us to be pulled out of our meetings, contrary to law, and carried us to prison without warrant, or other due process of law; and shall these be our judges? We except against them.

Judge. It is too late now, you should have done it before they had been sworn jury-men. Jury, go together; that which you have to find, is, whether they have refused to take the oath or no, which hath been sworn before you that they did refuse. You need not go from the bar; and like words said the recorder and others, there being a confusion and noise in the Court, many speaking together.

Prisoners. Then we cried for justice, and that we might be heard, to make our defence before the jury gave their verdict: but the Judge and Recorder said, we should not be heard, (making good by their practice what the Chief Judge had said the day before, viz. That if we had liberty to speak, we would make ourselves famous and then odious) crying again, Stop their mouths, executioner; which was done accordingly with a dirty cloth, and also endeavoured to have gagged me (J. Crook,) striving to get hold of my tongue, having a gag ready in his hand for that purpose, and so we were served several times; then I called out with a loud voice, Will you condemn us without hearing? This is to deal worse with us than Pilate did with Christ, who though he condemned him without a cause, yet not without hearing him speak for himself; but you deny us both.

Grey. I desire to know whether according to law and the practice of this Court, myself, and my fellow prisoners, may have liberty to put in bail to prosecute our traverse at the next sessions?

Court. No, we will try you presently.

Judge. Stop their mouths, Executioner: And this was the cry of many upon the bench, they being still in a continued confusion, some crying to the jury, Give in your Verdict, for we will not hear them; with other words which could not be heard for the noise, the Court being in confusion.

Crook. You might as well have caused us to have been murdered before we came hither, as to bring us hither under pretence to try us, and not give us leave to make our defence; you had as good take away our lives at the bar, as to command us thus to be abused, and to have our mouths stoped: Was ever the like known? Let the righteous God judge between us, Will you hear me? You have often promised that you would.

Judge. Hear me, and we will hear you; then he began to speak, and some others of the bench interrupted him, sometimes they speaking two or three at a time, and a noise amongst the officers of the Court; but the Judge said, we may give you liberty till the next sessions, but we may chuse; and therefore we will try you now.

Crook. I bade the people take notice of their promise, that I should have liberty to speak, saying, See now you be as good as your words.

Judge. The law of England is not only just but merciful, and therefore you shall not be surprized, but shall have what justice the law allows—(Interruption.)

Crook. I remember what the judge said even now, that the law of England was a merciful law, that the Court had said before, they might, if they would, give us liberty till the next sessions, but they would not; and the maxim of the law also is, 'Summum Jus est summa Injuria;' therefore I hope your practice will make it good, that it is a merciful law, and not to execute 'Summum Jus, &c.' upon me, and thereby condemn yourselves out of your own mouths.

Judge. Jury, give in your Verdict.

Crook. Let me have liberty first to speak, it is but few words, and I hope I shall do it with what brevity and pertinency my understanding will give me leave, and the occasion requires; it is to the point in these two heads, viz. matter of law and matter of conscience: to matter of law I have this to say, first, as to the statute itself, it was made against papists, occasioned by the Gunpowder-Plot; and is entitled, 'For the better discovery and sup'pressing of popish recusants:' but they have liberty, and we are destroyed, what in you lies—(Interrupted by the Judges and disturbance of the Court.)—As to conscience, I have something to say, and that is, it is a tender thing, and we have known what a thing it is to offend it, and therefore we dare not break Christ's commands, who hath said, 'Swear not at all;' and the apostle James said, 'Above all things, my brethren; swear not—(interrupted) the Court calling again to the executioner to stop my mouth, which he did accordingly with his dirty cloth as aforesaid, and his gag in his hand.

Judge. Hear the Jury: who said something to him, which was supposed to give in the Verdict according to his order, for they were fit for his purpose, as it seems, they beginning to lay their heads together before he had spoke any thing to them, only upon his words.

Judge. Crier, make silence in the Court; then the Recorder taking a paper into his hand read to this purpose, viz. 'The Jury for the king do find that John Crook, John Bolton, and Isaac Grey are Guilty of refusing to take the Oath of Allegiance, for which you do incur a Premunire, which is the forfeiture of all your real estates during life, and your personal estates for ever, and you to be out of the king's protection, and to be imprisoned during his pleasure; and this is your Sentence.'

Crook. But we are still under God's protection.

Recorder. Adjourn the Court: which was done accordingly, and we remanded to Newgate, where we remain prisoners.

212. The Trial of THOMAS TONGE, GEORGE PHILLIPS, FRANCIS STUBBS, JAMES HIND, JOHN SELLERS, and NATH. GIBBS,* at the Old Bailey, for High Treason: 14 CHARLES II. A. D. 1662.

THE Commission of Oyer and Terminer being read, and proclamation made, the grand jury were sworn: whose names are, Arthur

Jourdan, John Freestone, Thomas Fawson, Thomas Coney, George Compere, Isaac Rutter, Chris. Rigby, Rowland Steed, William

* Kelyng's Report of this Case is as follows:

"Memorandum, That at the sessions at Newgate, Dec. 11, 14 Car. 2, Tho. Tong, Geo. Philips, Francis Stubbs and several others, were indicted for High Treason, for compassing the king's death, and the overt acts laid in the Indictment, were assembling themselves together, and consulting and agreeing to destroy the king, 'Ac ad easdem prodiones perim-plendas,' the consulting to seize Whitehall, where the king was resident.

"1. And in this case, it was resolved by all the judges, that the meeting together of persons, and consulting to destroy the king, was of itself an overt act to prove the compassing the king's death.

"2. It was resolved that where a person knowing of the design does meet with them, and hear them discourse of their traitorous designs, and say or act nothing; this is High Treason in that party, for it is more than a bare concealment, which is Misprision; because it sheweth his liking and approving of their design; but if a person not knowing of their design before, come into their company and hear their discourses, and say nothing, and never meet with them again at their consultations, that concealment is only Misprision of High Treason. But if he after meet with them again, and hear their consultations, and then conceal it, this is High Treason. For it sheweth a liking, and an approving of their design; and so was sir Everard Digby's Case, who in the Powder Treason met with the Traitors, and heard their design, but upon the evidence it was not proved that he said any thing, or acted any thing, and he had Judgment of High Treason.

"3. It was resolved that some of those persons who are equally culpable with the rest, may be made use of as witnesses against their fellows, and they are lawful accusers, or lawful witnesses within the stat. 1 Ed. 6, 12, 5 and 6 Ed. 6, c. 11, and 1 Mqr. 1, and accordingly, at the Trial of these men, some of their partners in the treason were made use of against the rest; for lawful witnesses within those statutes are such as the law alloweth; and the law alloweth every one to be a witness who is not convicted, or made infamous by some crime. And if it were not so, all Treasons would be safe; and it would be impossible for one who conspires with never so many others to make a discovery to any purpose.

"But the L. C. Baron Hale said, that if one of these culpable persons be promised his pardon, on condition to give evidence against the rest, that disableth him to be a witness against the others, because he is bribed by saving his life to be a witness, so that he takes a difference where the promise of pardon is to him for disclosing the Treason, and where it is for giving of evidence. But some of the other Judges did not think the promise of pardon, if he gave evidence, did disable him, but they all advised that no such promise should be made, or any threatenings used to them in case they did not give full evidence.

"4. Although the Lord Chief Justice Bridgeman, and some others of the Judges were of opinion that those words of two witnesses in case of High Treason, were repealed by the stat. 1 and 2 Ph. and M. c. 10, which enacts that all trials for Treason be according to the course of the common law: And at common law, one witness is sufficient to a Jury, though 1. 1. Cor. is against this opinion, yet they all agreed that if that law for two witnesses be in force, yet the same two witnesses who are to the Indictment, may be also the witnesses at the trial: And the law doth not require two to the finding the Indictment, and two others at the trial.

"5. They all agreed that if a conspirator be examined before a privy counsellor or a justice of peace, and upon his examination without torture confess the Treason; If after at his trial he deny it, and two witnesses to prove that confession, are good evidence against him that made that confession, at his examination aforesaid; and in that case there needs no witnesses to prove him guilty of the Treason; for that confession puts it out of the statute which requires two witnesses to prove the Treason, unless the party shall without torture confess the same; and the confession there spoken of, is not meant a confession before the Judges at his trial, but a confession upon his examination: But such confession so proved is only evidence against the party himself who made the confession, but cannot be made use of as evidence against any others whom on his examination he confessed to be in the Treason.

"6. They all agree that such a confession upon examination before a privy counsellor, though he be not a justice of peace, is a confession within the meaning of the statute; and the rather, as lord Bridgeman said, because justices of the peace were not enabled to take examination before stat. 1 and 2 P. and M. c. 13."

Lord Hale in the First Part of his Pleas of the Crown ch. 24, reports the matter thus:

"Dec. 10, 1662. Tonge, Philips, and others were indicted for treason for compassing the king's death, the question was, whether those, that were parties in the compassing, which were not yet pardoned, nor indicted, might be produced as witnesses, namely Riggs and others; and upon conference with all the judges these points were resolved.

"1. That the party to the Treason, that confessed it, may be one of the two accusers or witnesses in case of treason, for the statute intended two such witnesses, that were allowable witnesses at common law, and so may a particeps criminis be admitted as a witness, and was admitted to give evidence to the jury; but the jury may, as in other cases, consider of the evidence and credit of the witnesses, but he is sufficient to satisfy the statute.

"2. That the confession before one of the privy council or a justice of the peace, being voluntarily made without torture, is sufficient as to the indictment or trial to satisfy the statute, and it is not necessary, that it be a confession in court; but the confession is sufficient, if made before him that hath power to take an examination.

"3. The king having promised a pardon to Riggs, if he would discover the plot, he performed that part by his discovery; and this was held by all no impediment to his testimony, for the promise was not applied to witnessing against any other; but two justices [these were our author and J. Brown.] held, that if the king promised a pardon upon condition that he would witness against any others, and that being acknowledged by Riggs when he took upon him to give evidence, &c. that will make him incapable to give evidence, because he swears for himself; but in that point the greater number were of a contrary opinion, ex libro Bridgman verbatim, and I remember the consultation and resolution accordingly."

Again, in the same work, Part 2, ch. 37, he says, "For my own part I have always thought, that if a person have a promise of a pardon, if he gives evidence against one of his own confederates, this disables his testimony if it be proved upon him." But see Layer's Case, A. D. 1722, infra.

Godolphin, Bonfoy, and several others; who being all sworn, were directed up to the grand jury. After some hours examination of the witnesses, and consultation, the Grand Jury returned the indictment Billa Vera.

Clerk of the Peace. You good men of the city of London, summoned to appear here this day, to inquire between our sovereign lord the king, and the prisoners that are and shall be at the bar, answer to your names, as you shall be called, every one at their first call, upon pain and peril that shall fall thereon. Good men of the ward of, &c.

Serjeant Glynne, Serjeant Maynard, his majesty's serjeant at law: sir Jeffery Palmer, attorney-general; sir Heneage Finch, his majesty's solicitor; serjeant Keeling, his majesty's serjeant; sir Edward Turner; taking their places in court.

The Prisoners were commanded to be set to the bar.

Clerk of the Peace. Thomas Tonge, hold up thy hand; George Phillips, hold up thy hand; Francis Stubbs, hold up thy hand; James Hind, hold up thy hand; John Sellers, hold up thy hand; and Nathaniel Gibbs, hold up thy hand.

Which they severally doing, their Indictment was read, the Substance whereof is as followeth, viz.

'You the prisoners that were last called to the bar, stand indicted in London by the names of Thomas Tonge late of London distiller, George Phillips late of London yeoman, Francis Stubbs late of London cheesemonger, James Hind late of London gunner, John Sellers late of London compass-maker, and Nathaniel Gibbs late of London felt-maker; for that you six, together with divers others particularly in the Indictment mentioned, and others not yet taken, as false traitors to the illustrious, serene, and most excellent prince, Charles the 2nd, by the grace of God, of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, king, defender of the faith, &c. minding and with all their force intending the peace and tranquillity of this kingdom of England to disturb, and our said sovereign lord the king to death and final destruction to bring, and put, the 31st day of October in the 14th year of the reign of our said sovereign lord king Charles the 2nd, traitorously did compass, imagine and intend the killing of our said sovereign lord the king, and the ancient government of this kingdom of England to change;' [as in the Indictment more particularly was mentioned.]

What sayest thou, Thomas Tonge, art thou guilty of this High-Treason in manner and form as thou standest indicted, or not guilty?

Tonge. Not Guilty.

Clerk. How wilt thou be tried?

Tonge. By God and my country.

Clerk. What sayest thou, George Phillips, art thou guilty, &c.

Phillips. I am Guilty in hearing and not discovering of it.

Clerk. Art thou guilty of this High-Treason whereof thou standest indicted?

Phillips. I am Guilty, but not in manner and form as I stand indicted; I have heard the words as I have formerly confessed to sir Richard Brown: Not Guilty, as to the manner and form.

Clerk. How wilt thou be tried?

Phillips. By God and my country.

Clerk. How sayest thou, Francis Stubbs, art thou guilty, &c.

Stubbs. Not Guilty.

Clerk. How wilt thou be tried?

Stubbs. By God and my country.

Clerk. What sayest thou, James Hind, art thou guilty, &c.

Hind kneeling down, and discovering much penitency, answered, I am Guilty, and humbly beg mercy of his majesty, Court. Record his confession.

Clerk. How sayest thou, John Sellers; art thou guilty, &c.

Sellers. Not Guilty.

Clerk. How wilt thou be tried?

Sellers. By God and the country.

Clerk. How sayest thou, Nathaniel Gibbs; art thou guilty, &c.

Gibbs. Not Guilty.

Clerk. How wilt thou be tried?

Gibbs. By God and the country.

Court. Carry up Hind to the gaol.

And the rest standing at the bar, silence was commanded.

Clerk. Thomas Tonge, George Phillips, Francis Stubbs, John Sellers, and Nathaniel Gibbs; you the prisoners that were last called to the bar, those men that you shall hear called are to pass upon trial for your several lives and deaths: if you or any of you will challenge them or any of them, you must challenge them when they come to the book to be sworn, before they be sworn.

Edmond Butler.

Tonge. I challenge him. [But afterwards admitted him.]

Clerk. Edmond Butler, Clement Fasse, George Dixon, Samuel Paine, John Bagnal, John Gourney, William Garler, Ralph Silver-ton, William Dudley, Joseph Drake, John Peake, and Robert Morrice, were severally sworn in this manner: Lay your hand on the book, look upon the prisoner; You shall well and truly try, and true deliverance make between our sovereign lord the king and the prisoners at the bar, whom you shall have in charge, according to your evidence. So help you God.

Clerk. Count these, crier, Edmond Butler; Crier. One. Clement Punge, two, &c. Twelve good men and true, stand together and hear your evidence.

Clerk. Crier, make proclamation.

Crier. O Yes! If any one can inform my lords the king's justices, the king's serjeants, or the king's attorney, before this inquest be taken, let them come forth, and they shall be heard; for now the prisoners stand at the bar upon their deliverance: and all others that are bound by recognizance to give evidence against any of the prisoners at the bar, come forth and give evidence, or else you forfeit your recognizance. And all manner of persons that were summoned upon the jury, and have not yet been sworn; they are discharged, and may depart the court.

Clerk. Tho. Tonge, hold up thy hand; [and so to the rest of them at the bar.] You of the jury, look upon the prisoners, and hearken to their cause; you shall understand that they stand indicted in London by the names of Tho. Tonge, late of, &c. [and so in the Indictment aforementioned] who together with James Hind, who stands convicted by his own confession, and the rest also aforementioned: [and so reads the indictment again.] Upon which Indictment they have been arraigned, and thereunto have severally pleaded, Not Guilty; and for their trial have put themselves upon God and the country, which country you are: Your charge is to enquire whether they be guilty of the High Treason in manner and form, as they stand indicted, or Not Guilty; if you find that they, or any of them are guilty, you shall inquire what goods and chattels, lands and tenements, they or any of them had at the time of committing the said treasons, or at any time sithence; if you find that they are not guilty, you shall inquire whether they or any of them did flee for it; if you find that they fled for it, you shall inquire of their goods, chattels, &c. as if you had found them guilty; if you find that they were not guilty, nor that they did flee, say so, and no more, and hear your evidence.

Sir Edward Turner. May it please your lordships, and you gentlemen that are sworn of this jury, the five prisoners at the bar, by the name of T. Tonge, G. Phillips, F. Stubbs, J. Sellers, and N. Gibbs, do stand indicted, for that they as false traitors, together with several other persons mentioned in the Indictment, the 31st of October last, did, in the parish of St. Michael's in the ward of Cornhill, London, assemble and meet together, consult, contrive, and design to levy war against the king, to subvert and change the government as it is now established, to depose and kill the king: and in order to effect this, they did likewise then and there agree and design to seize and take in their hands the king's royal palace called Whitehall, where the king resides. For this they have been indicted, arraigned, and all these five have severally pleaded not guilty: if we prove them guilty, you must find them so.

Serjeant Maynard. Gentlemen of the jury you have heard the Indictment read, you have heard the substance of it opened, it is short in words, but of as high consequence as any thing can be. I shall open the particulars of that Evidence, that we conceive will be made good by the oaths of Witnesses to be produced to you. You see here what the Indictment is: I shall insist upon these particulars, which I shall open and make good to you: first, what was their design: next, what was their means of accomplishment, what encouragements they used one to another, and what colours they put upon this wicked action. For the first, gentlemen, I shall begin at the highest, higher to man can go in this world, that is, to design and compass, to contrive to put the king himself to death, to seize his person; some of them called it securing, you know the English of that, a king secured. We will go further, for we shall prove to you the person that with his own wicked hand undertook the slaughter and murder of the king: he did contrive how he might do it, sometimes when the king was performing an office of piety to visit his mother, other times when he should recreate himself by hunting: higher than this they could not go, and this they coloured over with religion. This merciful king that had pardoned his people beyond their own desires, and contented to do it; this king they would murder. Had there been no more, it had been exceeding heinous; but they went further, their malice rested not upon his person, but the family, the noble and excellent duke of York it designed to be secured likewise, and used like his brother: not they only, they went further, the whole nobility was in design; not gentlemen, that every one of these before you used these expressions, but they and their complices, some one and some another expression: but all joined in this, to destroy the king and his family, root and branch, that was their expression. King, his family, nobility, may, go down to the gentry, and it ceased not there, they go to the clergy, as one of the prisoners at the bar (as you will hear) did express himself, I think it was Stubbs, That there should be never a lawn sleeve, never a sursingler should have a hole to hide his head in.

Stubbs. I never opened my mouth to that purpose.

Serj. Maynard. That will be left to proof: I undertake not of myself to prove this, but to open it, let the witnesses speak. In discourse some went further than that, whosoever would not join with them in their design (it was one Strange) was an enemy; and thereupon one Cole, who is gone, deserted them, though he was contented to have the king murdered, the nation ruined, yet would not agree in that principle. To accomplish this, we shall prove to you they did treat of levying a war, that among themselves it was given out that arms were provided, some delivered; and their designs to raise money, seizing all the Treasury at Whitehall, Worcester-house, and the Chamber of London; to seize the person of the noble duke of Albemarle, and all about him, and quarter to be given to none; that was their expression. They did give out among themselves (for a while there was some difference among these foxes, whose tails were tied together, and had fire in them), and Tonge told them, as we shall prove, that all parties were now agreed and would join; they had framed declarations to justify their proceedings, framed papers to raise a mutiny among the mariners, and encouraged them to join with them, this will be proved. For their means, Phillips at the bar undertakes to procure the Word that the guard in the city had, so to betray them. There was a design made for seizing the Tower, several men appointed for that purpose, they and their complices were to come there with papers in their hands, as if they were mariners and had accounts to make up, these were to go up to those that sat there to finish accounts. To encourage themselves, they gave out that they had dealt with the soldiers at Windsor, and secured that castle; if this be proved to you, there can nothing be higher. There was this one pretence, it was given out, and perchance the rumours of the city are come to your ears, that they had designed a day for the execution of this mischief; several days were appointed, one on the Lord-Mayor's day, another on Allhallows eve. They gave out by a feigned letter, that there would be a massacre by the French and Papists, of the Protestants; this was to raise a fear and discontent among the nation to induce them to join when this design should be attempted. Gentlemen of the jury, had they gone on in this wicked purpose, having possessed the people with these fears, who could have told how to behave himself? And it seems strange and wonderful, especially looking upon the persons, men of little consideration, despicable men, and who live under the mercies of so good a sovereign, that they should take such a design in their hearts, and undertake the performance. Though the spear hath not entered into the sides of our sovereign, yet it must needs crown his head with abundance of thorns, that such people should be so desperately wicked. But we shall call our witnesses, and when you have heard this proved, we cannot be so uncharitable to think you shall need any further aggravation, or doubt of your giving a verdict against such miscreants as these are.

Attorney-General, (sir Jeffrey Palmer). These few prisoners at the bar were not all who were in this contrivance, though we have not all their names; but in the Evidence you will hear, there was a council of forty, and then of six, but none discovered. These six acted and infused into these and divers others what they intended, and then broke up, and gave out all was ready, and would be done on such a day. We shall not trouble the Jury with giving evidence particularly against these men, they are joined and knit together in one cause. But hear the evidence.

William Hill, Edward Riggs, and one Bradley were sworn.

Counsel. Mr. Hill, speak your knowledge in this business, to my Lords and the Jury.

Hill. May it please your lordships, about the middle of October last, I met John Baker, one that is now indicted, he was a captain formerly called; I met him in Cheapside: in meeting me (after a salutation) invites me to drink with him; I went into a house with him. When I was with him, he began to ask me what news there was in the country; I told him I had a little to inform him. He told me, if I would stay a while he would tell me some. I asked him of what nature? Says he, Not long ago the king went a hunting, sent some stags to sir John Robinson, now the lord mayor, and went but with a small guard; and I could have been one of the twenty that would have slain that outlandish dog. Then said I, Mr. Baker, that's nothing to me; but what other news have you? Says he, I know thou art right, and I know your father; there's something on foot in the city, and if you will meet to-morrow, I will bring some persons to you that will give you information. Sir, said I, (understanding it of dangerous consequence, and willing to get it out,) I will meet you: and we agreed to meet the next morning. That morning three persons came early to my quarters, Hill the cloth-drawer, Mr. Bradley, and this Mr. Riggs; he appointed them to meet him there, but failing himself, they being strangers said nothing to me then, and so I departed, and left them a drinking. The morrow after, he himself came to my lodgings, fetches me out of my bed, and tells me he had appointed some persons on the Exchange to give me an account. I went with him thither, and there we met with some persons that were his acquaintance; and from hence we went to the Ship in Leadenhall street; and among us was Hind, that confessed himself guilty: and there the business was fully discoursed of, what their intention was, that all interests were agreed, Fifth Monarchy Men, Anabaptists, Independents, and Fighting Quakers; and the congregational churches were consenting, and were resolved to endeavour their deliverance from adversaries at Whitehall: many passages more. On the morrow after, we met again, and there met with us Hind, and Brown, and Baker. There we were acquainted of their magazines and arms provided, and about their correspondence in the several counties, that they were sure of Windsor Castle, that the head gunner and sergeant there were privy. We had information concerning this Tonge, as an active person in this design; I studied to know this Tonge, and I was brought to him at his house; and there I met one Ward, Stubbs, and Hind, and some others, and there we had discourse concerning the business. Tonge told us something of the business of Windsor Castle, and proposed something in reference to the taking the Tower, what arms and men they had for this design. We met many times at the Ship, that Gibbs we met at Bridewell-dock, and there was Stubbs and one Beazley with me; there we waited for a brother of this Gibbs, to give us intelligence when the day of the insurrection would be: we waited not long, but in came his brother, and two persons more, one Thomas, a bridler or bit-maker in Shoe-lane, and another person in a handsome garb came along with him. His brother was somewhat shy (because I was a stranger) to speak any thing, but calls for this Gibbs and Stubbs, and had some private discourse with them, and away departed: After they were gone, we desired to know the intelligence; they told us that the Council of Six was broken up, all business was settled, Ludlow was commander in chief, and Allhallows-eve was the time, that horse and arms were provided. For Phillips; that day that the meetings were intercepted; that the Trained bands did surprize them, that day this gentleman and I (pointing to Riggs) came to the main-guard at the Exchange; where serjeant Phillips was with a buff coat and a halbert; and this gentleman (meaning Riggs) saluted him, and thanked him for his service in sending down notice to the meeting to be gone, for he was coming with the Trained bands to surprize them. He asked him, what was the occasion of the bustle: says he, they say—

Chief Justice. (Sir Robert Forster.) Who is that he?

Hill. That Phillips said, 'They say they were up in the West; and if they were not, I would they were, and here too, for a few would do the work.' Upon the Monday after, we met him near the Exchange; and so likewise Riggs thanked him for his service, and then he (Phillips) promised his further service when the time of the insurrection would be.—For Sellers, I was by agreement to have thirty arms delivered me, and I was very pressing to have the arms out of the magazine. Sellers met with this gentleman (Riggs,) and he urging Sellers about the arms Sellers told him that they were all delivered out the night before, about 5 or 600; and that forty of their friends went away without arms, but that within two or three days there would be more laid in.

Solicitor-General. (Sir Heneage Finch,) Mr. Hill, I will ask you one question (with my Lords favour); as you have given a general account, I will keep you to one particular person, Tonge: Did Tonge, in any discourse with you, tell you of one Strange that was gone into the country.

Hill. One night he told us he had spoke with Strange: that he was gone into the country, and would come back to morrow, and then we should have more intelligence.

Sol. Gen. What concerning the Tower and Windsor Castle?

Hill. He talked of the good service that he had done in being at Windsor Castle, with the serjeant and gunner, for the securing of that Castle; that near five hundred of their friends were in and about Windsor, ready to assist for surprizing that Castle.

Court. Who told you this?

Hill. Tonge told me himself, that he was instrumental in it.

Sol. Gen. Did he tell you any thing of the Tower?

Hill. Only he said, it was fit some care should be taken to surprize the Tower at the time.

Sol. Gen. Any thing of Allhallows-Eve?

Hill. He did not fix the very instant time, but said, he look'd for intelligence from Strange.

Att. Gen. What day of the month was that?

Hill. I cannot remember the very day.

Serj. Maynard. What did he say concerning declarations?

Hill. The declaration was read, Stubbs acquainted us, against Popery, and Monopolies, for liberty of conscience, and a free Commonwealth.

Sol. Gen. Any thing of the Popish massacre?

Hill. Yes, I had this paper of them, a copy of a letter.

C. Justice. How many copies of that letter were to be dispersed in the city?

Hill. About five thousand.

Att. Gen. These things were to be dispersed, to possess the people that the papists about that time would massacre the protestants, that so they might draw all against that party to join with them: a brave colour, when in truth there was no such thing, but only to carry on their design of killing the king, and altering the government.

The Letter was read by the Clerk, and follows, in his verbis.

'Sir; Out of the respect which I bear to you in particular, and to the Protestant party in general, I give you notice of this passage; About a fortnight since, a woman, which you must be ignorant where, who had it from a correspondent of the papists, that they intend to make use of their army (which all the world sees they have provided), against Allhallows-Eve next; it was thought good therefore, in as prudent way as may be, to give notice to our friends in remote parts, that they may do what piety to God, loyalty to their prince, love to their country, and self preservation should direct them. Sir, I call the eternal God to witness, that this is not to trepan, to put a trick upon you, but a sober truth; and also communicated to a justice of the peace, and by him to the privy-council: And what the issue of it is, I have not heard; I hope you will inquire and tell us.'

'From Yexford in Suffolk Octob. 31. 1662.'

Serj. Keeling. Do you (Mr. Hill) remember any discourse of the way of taking Whitehall? Name who were there, and who spoke.

Hill. There was Hind and one captain Browne, a shoe maker in the Strand, and some other persons.

Counsel. Was Stubbs there.

Hill. Not at this discourse: but we talked of taking Whitehall at Stubbs's house, [when] a sea captain was there, that was to go to Surinam, and Stubbs invited him to stay at home to assist them; who was to come down with a party by Charing-Cross, and another party to come up by the Cock-Pit, and to kill my lord Duke of Albermarle, and to slay sir Rd. Browne in the city, and the party in the city to keep a drum, beating, &c. And Tonge said, That their main care must be to keep down sir Richard Browne and the train bands, or else they should never be able to stand.

Counsel. What concerning the Privy-garden way?

Hill. They discoursed concerning the getting down the door and the wall, and so get the sooner to Whitehall.

Counsel. What was Stubbs's opinion at that communication?

Hill. His was at Blackfriars, the last Tuesday night before they were taken, this Stubbs, Thomas and Gibbs.

Court. Which Gibbs?

Hill. This black Gibbs at the Bar: They discoursed that they would be sure to make an end of Kings, Princes and Dukes, that they might have a Free State, and be troubled no more with any such kind of persons, neither the Lawn-Sleeves nor Sursinglers.

Counsel. Do you remember that Stubbs proposed any other way to Whitehall?

Hill. No, Sir.

Serj. Maynard. Did they say what number was provided, 10, or 20,000?

Hill. Stubbs assured us, that there was a great party in East-Smithfield right for the work, and had their arms.

Counsel. What employment had Sellers about delivering the Arms?

Hill. He said, the Arms were delivered at Crutchedfriars, about 600; and that 40 of their friends went away last night for lack of Arms; that within two or three days there would be more.

Counsel. Did he name a Magazine?

Hill. Yes, the Magazine in Crutchedfriars.

Counsel. Did you know any thing touching the discovery of the Word, and by whom?

Hill. No Sir: but I understood that Tonge was assured by Phillips, that Phillips would get him the Word that very night that they intended the Insurrection.

Counsel. What was propounded, if they had taken the king, what would they do?

Hill. He should have the same quarter as Ludlow was to have.

Court. Who said that?

Hill. Stubbs, and Gibbs, and Tonge.

Counsel. That's three of the Prisoners at the Bar: Lord have mercy upon us!

Court. Were you not acquainted of a Council of Six?

Hill. Yes, they named several at a venture, but they believed some of them were of the six: That they met not twice in a place, sometimes here, and some times in another place.

Counsel. Who did they name?

Hill. Colonel Danvers, Phillips, Nye the Minister, Lockyer, and one Cole of Southampton, that these five were part of the six.

Counsel. What discourse touching the distance of place where they engaged any?

Hill. Forty miles about the town.

Counsel. Did Tonge tell you that Strange had lodg'd any horse?

Hill. He said, he had taken out the horse that were provided for a time: but Gibbs and Stubbs at Blackfriars assured us of the horse coming into the town the night before.

Counsel. Did Tonge tell you of any Back, Breasts, Blunderbusses?

Hill. Not he, Sir. It was talked of that night at the Blackfriars.

Counsel. What did you hear concerning sending into Dorsetshire, to spread rumours there?

Hill. That they had four hundred of their friends there, that they were sure of, and several cases of pistols were sent down by the carrier.

Court. Who said that?

Hill. I know not what particular parson, but at that meeting, and in that company.

Counsel. Who was present?

Hill. Gibbs and Stubbs.

Counsel. None of the rest? Was Tonge or Phillips there?

Hill. No, Sir.

Counsel. Did you hear of any other country, either in Kent, or Worcestershire, or Derby, or Leicestershire?

Hill. Tonge informed us of the faithfulness of Col. Kendrick in Kent, to bring him some Arms.

Court. If the prisoners will ask him any questions, they may.

Sellers. Friends all that are here present, I did ever abhor such an action. Ask him whether he did hear me speak those words, that I should say, 'That there was arms delivered out, and that forty went away lacking, and in one or two days there would be more:' which words I never did speak in my life, or any such thing, only what I heard from Wapshot, as Wapshot declared to my Lord Mayor he told me, to whom I appeal. It is true, meeting with that Wapshot, says he, 'We hear there will be a rising, and there are some Arms delivered out.' Said I, 'I would advise you to have a care of such a business.'

Sir Orlando Bridgman. I would not interrupt you, you will be admitted to make your defence afterwards; but if you will, ask him any question.

Sellers. My lord, I shall come to that: Wapshot told me there were arms delivered, but further told me, he knew not of the certainty of these things; that at night he should go to a house where he should know. I bid him have a care. At night, as I was passing along, I met Riggs at Stubbs's door; he asked me, What news at London? I said, I was told there would be a rising, and that arms were delivered. Is there, says he? Said I, I do not believe it, but I shall know certainly to-morrow. I did call the next morning, and asked, Is the story true? No, says he, I was there, and there was no arms: that was all that I know of the business. Friend, did I tell you any such thing?

Counsel. Tell him, and upon what occasion.

Hill. Upon occasion of Riggs's asking him for 30 arms for me, (this upon the Exchange) Sellers took him a little aside, and told him, they were all delivered out, that 40 went away lacking, that more would be there within 2 or 3 days.

Sellers. That which I said to Riggs, was the message I received from Wapshot; but that I enquired, and there was no arms there; so that it was but a fallacy: for I advised him not to meddle with any such thing. Mr. Hill never saw my face, till I was apprehended upon the Exchange and brought before sir Richard Browne.

Hill. I saw him upon the Exchange with this man, (Riggs.)

Counsel. Did he say that any arms were delivered before, and what number.

Hill. About 5 or 600.

Sellers. He never heard me speak a word.

Counsel. How long before he was apprehended?

Hill. Never but that time with Riggs upon the Exchange, about 9 days before his apprehension; and he confessed upon his examination, That he did see me with Riggs.

Court. Have you, or any other the prisoners, any questions more?

Sellers. I have more: Whether he will actively affirm that he spake with me upon the Exchange?

Hill. No. Sir, you answered the question to Riggs.

Counsel. You heard the answer?

Hill. Yes, sir.

Sellers. May be at the second hand.

Counsel. Did you hear the prisoner answer it, or had you it at the second hand?

Hill. I heard it from Sellers himself, answering Riggs.

Sellers. Did you hear me?

Hill. Yes, to Mr. Riggs.

Sol. Gen. He swears it, and you wonder at it, and so we do all.

Sellers. Who was there then?

Hill. It was upon the Exchange, when almost full.

Sellers. What day of the month?

Hill. I cannot remember the day.

Sellers. I do declare before this honourable bench, gentlemen of the Jury, and this great auditory, That I never saw this man's face till I was apprehended. That which I told Mr. Riggs, was what I heard Wapshot say. I never till then saw this man's face, nor exchanged one word with him; whereas he says, he heard me. I do not believe Mr. Riggs saw him near me, when I gave him the answer.

Hill. Seeing he doth invalidate my testimony, Mr. Adjutant Carent took him upon the Exchange, I shewed him the person; and therefore certainly I must see him before.

Sellers. It was so; he, but the other in the white cloaths, that came and took me, that knew me.

Court. Will any of the rest ask him any question?

Sellers. Here is that that I am accused of, That I delivered arms, which is altogether false: my Lord Mayor can bear witness, Wapshot confessed he told me such a thing. I did ever abhor any such thing; I was always serviceable to his majesty upon all occasions, and all times: my neighbours can witness my civil conversation.

Court. Have you any thing more to ask him?

Sellers. I would fain know whether the bench and Jury are satisfied with this evidence.

Court. That you will hear anon: What else will you ask him?

Stubbs. That he accuses me, you have all heard: I do in the presence of God, and this honourable bench, and the Jury, deny it; for it is very false, and believe none will verify the same upon oath.

Court. Have you any question?

Gibbs. We all stand in the presence of God; and I am very conscientious of what I say and do: I must give account of all things before the Lord. This gentleman, Mr. Hill, has asserted concerning me, That I should deliver divers cases of pistols, as knowing the delivery of them: if Mr. Hill, who stands likewise in the presence of God, can produce any man to prove, that I delivered to any man any pistols, or that any were so delivered by my order, or that I conveyed or sent them away into the country; do this in the sight of the Lord and his own conscience, I expect not mercy. But I would have him speak no more of me, but what he knows of me, or by me; whether he knows I ever received any pistols, or delivered any at any time, for such an end as he is pleased to speak: which my soul abhors, and God can witness.

Stubbs. This Mr. Hill was the man that mentioned this, and that he had 4 horses and arms himself, and had 200*l.* in order to it. I was never any plotter, nor contrived any thing, but am as innocent as the child unborn; but being by an accident at Tonge's house, strong-water-man: Ask the other witnesses, whether he speaks truth.

Sir O. Bridgman. I would have put you in a right way: You shall be all heard at large, when you make your Defence. But will you ask him any questions?

Gibbs. I propounded one; I desire an answer: Whether I received or delivered any pistols to such a use?

Hill. I did not say he did: but at that meeting at Black-Friars it was discoursed among them, That several arms were sent to Dorsetshire, to several friends there; and he was there then: I believe he cannot deny it.

Stubbs. There was arms spoken of; but that man (Mr. Hill) spoke of them, and upon this consideration, That there were arms delivered to every hall, ammunition and powder. Riggs knows he spoke it at that time.

Hill. Sir, that was spoken after the question was put, What was the occasion of sending the powder and ammunition to the halls? These arms were spoken of in reference to the design. I do acknowledge I told them I had some arms myself; and said, I had 200*l.* for carrying it on. And I know the grounds of my speaking; and so do some of this honourable bench.

Stubbs. Hill advised, That they fall upon sir Richard Browne as an enemy to all honest men.

Gibbs. This Hill says that I should say these things; there were more there, and had ears as well as he, let them speak.

Hill. There was Riggs, Stubbs, myself, and I know not the other names.

Gibbs. This Hill and Mr. Riggs, whose face I never saw, came to my neighbour's house, where I was alone, found me plotting with no man.

Hill. We were brought into his company by one Beazley: He had been at Tower-Hill, about 2 or 3 o'clock, to give some intelligence to some persons there about the design. Riggs and I took a coach, and went after him; and Stubbs told us we might meet him at a baker's house near the Tower. We found Beazley, and he said he could not signify any thing to us, but would carry us to Black-Friars, to one Gibbs: And there he brought us to this very man. First enquiring at a house for him, Beazley was told he was at a tavern at Bridewell-Stairs: We went there, and found him. He told us he could tell us little himself, till his brother came; and accordingly he presently after came. That was the occasion that I came into his company.

Gibbs. He says that I spoke of pistols delivered, and a number; but how many he knows not: And that I should talk of the death of the king, which is as false as God is true. Again, I knew not of his coming, never appointed him, never was privy to any such plot; I abhor it in my soul. I never engaged in any such design with any man at any time.

Court. You do yourself much wrong, and take away that time which you may happily spend better.

Stubbs. I desire to know of Mr. Hill, who was present at that meeting, that I should say, The king should have such quarter as Ludlow.

Hill. It was spoken at that meeting at Black-Friars: After his brother and the other persons were gone, it was there spoken, That the council was broke up, and all ready; All-hallows-Eve the time, and then the same quarter to be given as Ludlow should have, if taken.

Stubbs. You do not answer the question: Who was there besides yourself?

Hill. There was Riggs, and that Gibbs there.

Stubbs. You have only his evidence.

Tonge. Who was in company when I talked of 300 men at Windsor?

Hill. It was at your own house; and there was Ward, Stubbs, Riggs, Hind and myself.

Phillips. Whether did he ever see my face at any meeting?

Hill. I never saw you before that time in Cornhill.

Phillips. Upon what account did I speak to Riggs then?

Hill. When you came off the Exchange, you told him you could not stay, your captain was coming. Riggs thanked you for your favour, in sending word to the meeting to be gone to a certain quaker.

Phillips. I never sent to any quaker to that purpose. I did not see this man upon the Sabbath-day: But Riggs came down to me, and thought I had sent notice to Anchor-alley; but I did not.

Sellers. He affirmed that there was several meetings of forty, and then of six: ask Mr. Hill whether I was in either of those numbers at any time.

Counsel. He did not charge you with any such thing, of being in that number: He asks a question about things not laid to his charge. Let Mr. Riggs speak.

Riggs. About 23 weeks since I became acquainted with Mr. Tonge, upon this occasion: Captain Baker did say that he was a man of intelligence, but Mr. Tonge did not care for him; and told me that I might be acquainted with him. A while after I came acquainted with him accidentally, when I came to his house.

Court. Whose house?

Riggs. Tonge's house. Mr. Stubbs was there. He said, That he had been at Windsor, spoken with the gunner and serjeant: and that they promised it should be ready upon some certain notice given. That night he had received a letter of some business concerning a suit of law, he said; in which there was a mystical meaning, which he did not tell me of. But this he said, That he had made sure of Windsor by the gunner and serjeant's promises. This is that I know of him.

Counsel. Is this all of Tonge?

Riggs. This likewise he has told me, That he had sometimes met with a certain company; he did not say thirty or forty, but a pretty many there was. He named Mr. Cole, capt. Elton, capt. Leigh, that they had often met, but could not well agree. But at last Mr. Strange did meet with them, give them one meeting; they could not agree neither. They went away and said these words, to the best of my remembrance; Mr. Strange did refuse to join with them; but when God did bid him go, he would go, whether this day, or next week, or next year, matters not; but when God bids him go, he would go. Mr. Cole was somewhat troubled to hear it: But says Mr. Cole, If you will go, give me but notice, if I cannot go so fast as you ride, I will hold by your horse-tail. A little while after he told me, They had not met again; that Mr. Cole, because they could not agree about this business, was gone beyond sea; but before he was gone, he did tell me of some considerations that were drawn, as he judged, about a government by Mr. Cole; and gave me in a Paper some certain Propositions, three or four concerning seamen: The substance was this, What great benefits they had by a Commonwealth.

Court. Who gave you them?

Riggs. Tonge: but it came from Mr. Cole, as he said. In general, they were to declare against the misgovernment of Church and State: In particular, to seamen; what great advantages there would be to them. And three or four things propounded in order to them: 1. That no seaman should pay custom for any commodity that he did bring under the value of 10*l.*; upwards they must. And likewise there should be care taken upon our own coasts, and beyond sea, that where any of our English ships should be cast away, there should be care taken out of the customs that might keep them, in their travelling homewards, either from begging or starving. But Mr. Cole, when they met, as Tonge said, would not agree; and therefore went beyond sea. After he was gone, within a week or a fortnight they had another meeting.

Court. They: Which they? Name them.

Riggs. I did not hear him name many, unless Leigh and captain Elton: I remember no more. And there, he said, they had under consideration the government of a Commonwealth; and so to declare against the misgovernment of the Church and State: and that there was to be a meeting at London-wall in a little time after; and he was there. He afterwards told me he missed that meeting; but had intelligence brought him, That that time that he missed, thirty or forty, I know not the certain number, had referred it to six men: They called it, 'The Council of Six;' but the names of them I never heard from him; and indeed, he said he knew them not, by reason of his absence from that meeting. But what I gathered from him was this, That he judged captain Elton was one of them.

Counsel. He told you there was a Council of Six?

Riggs. Yes; that he heard there was, but knew them not.

Sol. Gen. To make things short: Were you ever at any meeting where there was a discourse touching surprizing the king, altering the government? And who was there, upon your oath?

Riggs. That Friday immediately before we were taken, I think October 24, there was some discourse in general concerning Whitehall; what might be done as to the procuring of that, and likewise concerning the Tower.

Counsel. Who was present that Friday?

Riggs. Myself, Hill, Tonge, Stubbs, Ward, Hind, and John Baker: and then to the best of my knowledge, there was this discourse in general. Concerning the taking of the Tower there was some propositions on all hands concerning the taking of that. Mr. Hill, he only mentioned, but did not say he would undertake it, the righting of gunners accounts

Mr. Tonge, he said that the way that he thought convenient might be this; When sir John Robinson, now lord mayor, did, late in the evening go into the Tower, there should be a party following his coach in, and so might do it. And John Baker at that present instant of time did say, That it was necessary the king should be surprized. And likewise said then, that there should be no quarter; he would give nor take none.

Counsel. Who was present?

Riggs. Mr. Hill, myself, Bradley, Hind, Captain Brown, and Baker, and another Hill, the drawer, I think.

Counsel. Was not Tonge and Stubbs there then at that time?

Riggs. Yes; they were there.

Sol. Gen. I ask you this; I do not desire large stories, but firm and close answers: were you present at any meeting when the securing the king, Tower or Whitehall was discoursed of, or no?

Riggs. Sir, that Friday, October 24, immediately before we were taken, there was this discourse: Tonge did propound such a way for surprizing the Tower, by following sir John Robinson's coach in at night; and Baker did say, That it was necessary to undertake the securing of the king's person, and assaulting Whitehall; and that if there were 500 horse and foot, they would undertake it, by going into the privy-garden, and back-stairs.

Counsel. Were you present when Stubbs did advise the assaulting of Whitehall by the privy-garden?

Riggs. No: but Baker did say he would undertake it.

Counsel. Who was present?

Riggs. Mr. Hill, Bradley, Stubbs, and Hind, was there: but that Stubbs undertook it, I cannot say; but he was there.

Sol. Gen. Did Tonge ever tell you any, thing of Phillips, or that he had hopes of the word?

Riggs. I came acquainted with Phillips presently after I was acquainted with Mr. Tonge. Phillips once met me, and I carried him to Tonge's; and then Phillips freely said, that there was 300 arms at the artillery-garden; he being one of the artillery, knew where they lay, and could tell them how they might come by those arms. And that for the word, it was necessary to be got. And if in case that it so fell out that the white regiment was then out or he then in office, he would endeavour to procure it. But afterward, meeting him several times, he declared he would not meddle any more with it.

Sol. Gen. Were you upon the exchange with Sellers when there was a discourse about delivering out of arms? and what did Sellers say?

Riggs. Mr. Hill saying that he had 200*l.* to buy horses, and that he had four already, and wanted swords, and had friends in town wanted arms, asked me if I knew if any were given out. I told him, that one Mr. Sellers told me that he had heard some arms were given, and to be given out that day. Upon the exchange, Mr. Hill and Bradley and I being together, Mr. Hill said, ay, there is the person that told me of the arms: I will go and ask him if there be any such thing. Whether Mr. Hill heard the discourse, I cannot tell; but he said, says he, I have enquired, and some arms are delivered, and forty went without; but within two or three days there would be more.

Sol. Gen. Did Hill see Sellers upon the Exchange at that time?

Riggs. Yes; but whether he heard him, I cannot tell.

C. Justice. What induces you to believe he did see him?

Riggs. We were close together.

C. Justice. What about Nathaniel Gibbs?

Riggs. For Gibbs, I brought Mr. Hill acquainted with Mr. Stubbs; and he said he knew one at Fleet-Bridge, that sells plumbs and such things, and if we would go along with him, he would tell us news. Hill, Stubbs and I, that day I was taken, went to Beazley; Stubbs asked him, what news? Says he, I heard the business goes on; but if you will go to one Gibbs, meaning him that is fled, he has intelligence. So we went to an alehouse near him, but he was not at home; and we were told if we would go to Bridewell, they said they would send for his brother, meaning him at the bar; and so should have an account. Gibbs, at the bar, being with us, he told us he knew little himself; but when his brother came we should hear. Three quarters of an hour after came Gibbs that is gone, Thomas, and another man; I knew him not; and Gibbs called his brother. Beazley, Stubbs, and Hill, and I, sat still. When this Gibbs came, he said his brother knew little, hoped we were honest men. The news was this, that he heard that Ludlow was in town; and that now the Council was broken up.

Court. What Council?

Riggs. The Council of Six was broken up; and that they had sent messengers into the country to give notice and to make their interests good abroad. This is that he said there or as much as I remember.

Sol. Gen. Now I will ask you in general, did you ever hear of any discourse at any time of these meetings touching a rising by the papists and a massacre of the protestants?

Riggs. Being upon the Exchange, Hill, Bradley, and I, there was a lieutenant came to me, and asked me whether I heard of the massacre to be? I said, No. Says he, I can let you see a copy of a letter to that purpose; and gave it me. Hill going to the ship, I told him of this, and he was desirous of having a copy. And this was the copy that was this day read in court.

Att. Gen. What did you hear concerning the surprising of the king at Camberwell, when he came from his mother? And what did Phillips say?

Riggs. Phillips, Tonge, Stubbs, and myself, being together, they were discoursing concerning the king's going abroad: and at that Phillips said the king was to come from Hampton Court, to see the queen mother at Greenwich, and hinted that he might be surprised. Tonge said it need not; there might be such an opportunity twice every week.

Court. Prisoners, will you ask the witnesses any question?

Phillips. Did you not meet me on a Sabbath-day? You may remember I met you in Cheapside; we walked to Birch-lane end. You asked me of a rising that should be: I said, what rising? Says you, to surprise the king coming from Hampton-Court to Greenwich. And I came and spoke it openly in my family, as news that I heard. This gentleman had me to Tonge's house; and there grew the discourse. Riggs told me Tonge could tell further: and Riggs told me, That the reason why the time for it was not appointed, was because the Fifth-Monarchy-Men and Anabaptists were not agreed. Riggs, did not I disclaim this business, and declared I would have nothing to do with it?

Riggs. This is certain, That afterwards he did say he would not have any thing to do with it; and I did not see him a great while after that. Concerning Baker's surprising the king, it is true, he did say before Hill, and I, and Bradley, that the king was a hunting, and came through the city; and said, He would have been one of the fifty would have surprised him, and pulled him out of the coach.

Court. Who said that?

Riggs. Baker.

Court. Who present?

Riggs. Bradley, Mr. Hill, and the other Hill, Brown, and others.

Sol. Gen. Do you remember no discourse concerning the coming in at the Privy-Garden?

Riggs. I have under my hand to the Grand Jury declared, That Baker said he knew the way to the back-stairs through the privy-garden better than any. And Bradley did once, and but once, say, That he knew it as well as any, and would undertake to do the same, in the presence of Stubbs, Tonge, Hill, and the rest of them that were there that Friday night.

Court. Who were the rest?

Riggs. Hill, myself, Ward, Stubbs, Hind, and John Baker at Tonge's house.

Sir John Maynard. We do conceive that these two witnesses have given evidence against all of them; if any thing stick with the Jury, let them speak.

Counsel. Here, Bradley. This witness, that we call, he was no conspirator; but when there was notice of the design, he was employed to find it out, and to give us an account of it.

Sol. Gen. Mr. Bradley, were you present at any debate?

Gibbs. Whether did Riggs hear me say, That Ludlow was in town; or that the council was broke up, and the business went forward?

Riggs. This I said, that Hill, Stubbs, and Beazeley, were present; and he said he knew nothing himself but from his brother: This was the news, that he heard that Ludlow was in town, council broke up, and that there was sent out messengers to give notice to prepare for the business; that it would be on Allhallows-eve, or the latter end of the week, being Saturday the next day.

Gibbs. I never spake these words; and do desire that the honourable bench will enquire of the persons then present, whether they will avouch the same; whether I said it from my brother; These words I did not speak; and others being present had ears as well as he.

Tonge. Mr. Riggs told me Ludlow was in town; and told me he would enquire after him.

Riggs. I confess I did so.

Tonge. And that he was like to be taken in Chapside. He was continually at my shop, and would not let me alone, prompting and inducing me to these things.

Counsel. Mr. Bradley, were you at any meeting touching discourse of surprizing Whitehall?

Bradley. I was one Friday night, at Tonge's house, a strong-water man on Tower-ditch, where there was these two gentlemen with me (pointing to Mr. Hill, and Mr. Riggs) and there was Mr. Stubbs, and John Baker and another gentleman, one Ward; and we had some discourse about surprizing of Whitehall, which way it might be done. Some said that a party might go through the guard, and so surprize general Monk's guard; others said they might come down by Charing-Cross; but Tonge said, there was no coming down by Charing-Cross, because there was two great guns planted at the bottom, and commanded all that way; but said, the only way he conceived, was to bring a party through King's-street, and if it were possible, to get into the Privy-garden, and so into the lodgings that way. This is all that I remember.

Serj. Keeling. Do you know any thing about the ship at the East-India house?

Bradley. I went to this ship sometimes; and with Riggs Hill, Brown, Hind, and one Hill a cloth-drawer; we had divers discourses concerning the design, and the news on foot.

Court. What design? Express it.

Bradley. To alter the government; the surprizing the king, the duke, and the general, and as many more of the council as they could lay hands on.

Counsel. What about the Guards, surprizing Whitehall?

Bradley. At another meeting they discoursed about the bringing down forces to Whitehall.

Counsel. Who were present then? Which of the prisoners at the bar?

Bradley. None, unless Hind be there.

Counsel. At what other meetings were you?

Bradley. I was never at any other, but twice at Tonge's house. The Friday night we had a discourse about taking Whitehall. And the day before we were taken, I met this Mr. Riggs upon the Exchange. He asked me to go home, and dine with him; and we intended to go and see a ship. His dinner not being ready, we went over to Tonge's shop, and had a quarten of strong waters; and I took a pipe of tobacco. Riggs went away, and said he would not stay: Hind staid with me the whilst. After we had taken a pipe of tobacco, he came again, and said he heard the business was near at hand, and that there would be speedy action. Hill was at the shop. And after dinner, Riggs and I, Mr. Hill and Hind, went all out together to Stubbs's house. Riggs and Hill went in; Hind and I staid. Standing there a little, said I to Hind, What mean these gentlemen to stay so long? Riggs said he staid for a friend; but I will go and meet him. Said I, Will you not go on board a ship with master Hind and I? Says Riggs, No, I will go to meet my friend: Do you go on board the ship, and come to my house; if I am not there, pray stay a little. We asked Mr. Hill if he would go with us; but he went with Riggs: And they told me coming back, That Gibbs had informed them the design was ready, council broke up, and messengers sent to give notice; and Ludlow in town, and to be general.

Court. Who told you this?

Bradley. Riggs did, when he returned from Bridewell.

Tyler sworn.

Sol. Gen. Mr. Tyler, do you know Tonge?

Tyler. I know him very well.

Sol. Gen. Have you ever been in his company, and spake of any design about securing the king?

Tyler. Often.

Counsel. Tell what you have heard.

Tyler. I have met Mr. Tonge and others in three or four several places; at the Wheat-Sheaf at Lion's once, if not twice; at the Half-Moon, widow Jordan's, within Bishops-gate, twice at the least. Near Duke's Place, at the Shears, I have heard several things, and have noted it down, to be sure to deliver the truth. I have heard them speak about Whitehall, and securing of it, and of the two guns there. Elton and he said, That they might come with a party backwards, breaking through a barber's shop in King's Street, and dismount the two guns. But as touching the king, the duke, and the noble duke of Albemarle, they proposed what excellent service it would be to secure these persons: He said it was not a thing that would admit of much debate, inasmuch as he had a friend a courtier, (I know not his title) that would give him notice of any time when the king was gone a hunting, or his progress; and that it was easy to take it. Tonge said he served the Tower sutlers, and was acquainted there; and said, There was no way to surprize that but this, either about 10 or 11 o'clock, I will undertake we may do it with 40 persons thus, says he; Some to go in dropping, one by one, or two together, and others to be at several ale-houses near, to be ready; and they within seizing on the guard by a private sign, we should secure those without; and the soldiers being of the old army, will readily comply. And said, There was a person that lived nigh him, wears ropes about him, is a porter when off the guard, and believes he can command the whole company, and would undertake it. For Windsor-Castle, there was an old gunner that he kept correspondence withal; and he served the suttlers of that castle also with tobacco, I think he named strong-water; and that the soldiers were many of them his acquaintance; and that he had received letters from this gunner under some strange title. And said it was easy; and knew that at any time, when the word was given, let him go, or send by such a token, and that place were our own.

Court. Who said this?

Tyler. Mr. Tonge. As to the other person, Phillips, I can only say this of him: There is one lieutenant Chapman, so formerly, now a prisoner in the Tower. This lieutenant was a carrier of Norwich. I went to his inn, the George in Lombard street, and asked for him? I was told he was at capt. Foster's house, in Leadenhall street, and there I might find him. I went to capt. Foster's; and captain Foster told me he was at supper there with his master. I went up: There was this lieutenant Chapman and Phillips, which was the first time I laid my eyes on Phillips. My business was to speak with Mr. Chapman the carrier; but I perceived by some discourse of Mr. Phillips, there was something driving on: But I must say that capt. Foster walked about the room as if he minded not the discourse. There was Chapman, Phillips, Elton, and a man looking askint; I heard Phillips call him muster-master, but I know not the man. I heard them discourse very promiscuously about ships, and something wildly. I tarried while I spent two-pence, and came away with Mr. Chapman, and asked him, what that young blade was that talked so promiscuously? Chapman told me he was a serjeant, belonging to the trained-bands. Tell me his name? His name is Phillips. Do you know his trade or dwelling? He is a gilder, I think. Then this is the same person I have heard of at a coffee house; which was thus: A perfumer in Southwark, he heard of great rumours about a new Commonwealth; and pressing this perfumer how he came to be thus informed, says he, There is one Phillips that lives in Abchurch-lane; this man knows of it: For, says he, he hath said himself, that he has gone from Committee to Committee, where officers met about these things; and he named captain Foster for one that was engaged in the business. Said I, This is strange! I hastened back again in the morning to captain Foster's: Sir, said I, do you know that Phillips that was here last night? Yes, says he. What is he, said I? He answered, A serjeant. The thing is this, this man does talk abroad, That there is a meeting of the old officers, and that you are engaged. At which captain Foster seemed to be troubled that he should be aspersed, answered, I know nothing, no not one word of this: I do declare an abhorrence thereto, or of any action against his majesty; and thereupon presently went to Phillips, and charged him with this report: and soon after this perfumer comes to my house and desired me to go over to the Cross Keys, where Phillips was. When I came there, says Phillips, Sir, I saw you the last night, when we were talking of ships, I hope you do not mind the report about capt. Foster, for I am troubled such a thing is mentioned: for my part, I know not that I said so; I am sure I knew no such thing. This was all as to Phillips; but for Tonge, I must needs say, in all the meetings where I was, the several places that I formerly named, and the Whalebone behind the Exchange, he still discoursed of this business.

Counsel. What was done there concerning chusing the Council of Six?

Tyler. He was spoke to, to be at the Shears, but he sent a note sealed and directed, in which was inclosed either 9 or 11 of the Rump-Parliament names of persons: And says he, for my part, I cannot come this day, because the Hamlets are to go out into the field; (it was when sir John Robinson marched with his regiment) that I may avoid suspicion, I must go with him.

Counsel. What were those names?

Tyler. I cannot tell; but they were 9 or 11 of those in the Tower: And he promised he would get a note of those mens names in the Tower; for he was confident of it, that they would sit as members, and do good service upon the account of a Commonwealth: and said, there were some that had a correspondence with them in the Tower.

Counsel. What correspondence had they in the country?

Tyler. Tonge told me at the Wheat-sheaf, That, if a rising should be, it were necessary that the old commanders up and down the country should head them: And therefore, says he, what forces can be raised, should go under that conduct, or to that effect. He and Elkin did propose several colonels, I think most that are now living, both in England and beyond the seas.

Counsel. Can you tell any thing of the rumours abroad, expecting this design?

Tyler. Tonge told me this, That there was one that they called the lord Lockhart; he said he was governor of Dunkirk; That he had 30 or 40 servants about him; That these persons expected a rising; and that they and himself would engage. We heard that col. Rossiter, not particularly from Tonge, but there in company, was expected to be at Starbridge-Fair, to head 1,500 horse, to be at London. Also he asked me this question at his house, Whether I was acquainted with captain Leigh, a man with one arm, a stout honest fellow, and an active fellow, of his acquaintance?

Counsel. Speak your knowledge both of persons and things.

Tyler. There was one Mr. Cole of Southampton, Sweetnam, Gibbs a hat-maker, not he at the bar, Tonge, Thomas Elton, Elkin, Pryor, and one Cox a gardener, and Ward now a prisoner in the Tower, and one Ward a Southwark man, and Dyer a young scholar; there was one Rose of Chesterfield, and the perfumer I spoke of, I know not his name, he lives in Southwark; and there was a Quaker, I know not his name: the great business was to unite all interests. Elkin said, There were several meetings in St. Martins, and other places.

Tonge. If there be any one of the six in London, I believe this Mr. Tyler is one.

Tyler. To clear that I am none of them, I will name those whom I said were the six; Thomas of Shoe-Lane the coppersmith, one Elton in Whitechapel, one Raudon, captain Spurway of Tiverton, a West-country gentleman, Dr. Ward in Southwark, and Jones a minister.

Sol. Gen. Did Tonge tell you that the time was appointed when the rising should be?

Tyler. I know nothing of that.

Serj. Maynard. What about Leicester?

Riggs. Hill said, he dwelt there, and came from some that dwelt there, and others in Gloucestershire; but there was another person with Stubbs and Tonge, and said, There was a report in the country, That there would be some rising; and he came to town to bring his child to put him apprentice with his brother, and would go down again, and carry the certainty of the news: He was one of Lambert's soldiers.

Phillips. Mr. Tyler, did not you come in with the carrier of Norwich to capt. Foster's?

Tyler. No, I did not.

Phillips. I am sure I came accidentally to captain Foster's, and going I saw you there.

Gibbs. Did I tell you, Mr. Riggs, that my brother said Ludlow was in town, and there would be a rising shortly?

Riggs. Mr. Hill, Beazley, Stubbs, and I and you were together; Mr. Thomas and your brother came in: your brother, Beazley, Stubbs and Thomas were private in discourse. When you came again to us, we asked you what news? You said, Before we came you knew not much, but your brother could tell; but then you said, Ludlow was in town, the Council was broke up, and that messengers were sent to give notice to the country.

Gibbs. I deny that I or my brother said so.

Serj. Maynard. Know you any thing of surprising the king's Council, or Whitehall, or any thing of that, or altering the government?

Tyler. As for altering the Government, that must needs be designed; for Tonge said, It was debated, and thought convenient, as being the desire of several in the country, that the old parliament should be chosen again: That was to say, 1. That so many of them that had approved themselves faithful from first to last, to a Commonwealth's interest, especially in the times of declension. 2. That none should have power to elect, or be elected, but such also as have approved themselves faithful, as aforesaid. 3. This House was to be filled up within a month. 4. That it should continue one year, and no more. 5. That they should not have power in things of an ecclesiastical nature, to impose any thing upon the consciences of the people. 6. That it should be high-treason amongst them to assert the interest of a king, House of Lords, or single person. 7. That they should not appoint any salary-officers. 8. That while they keep to this, it should be high-treason to disturb them. As touching arms, and things of that nature, the truth is, the business which was very much urged is this: That there should be an uniting of all interests together, Quaker, Fifth-Monarchy-Men, Anabaptist, Independent, Presbyterian, and Leveller; to which purpose every one was obliged at the meeting to see what interest they could make among the presbyters, because they looked upon them as persons that had most money and strength. I think there was no presbyterian spoken of, except one, who is lately secured in the Tower: He said, that if so be that colonel Deanes was at liberty, he could engage him. There was one man that was there, which was one Prior, I suppose Tonge knew him; he said, He had very much acquaintance with the presbyters, knew many in the country; and that there they did not meet with any difficulties, as here; for all interests, Quakers and Presbyterians, and the rest, are all agreed.

Sol. Gen. Very well, you see Tonge was at all these meetings at the Wheat-Sheaf and Shears; and there were the colonels proposed. Did you hear of any orders given out, in any of these consultations, to make the rising in the country at the same time as in London?

Tyler. Mr. Gibbs's brother told us, That he kept a correspondence in the country; that in Essex he knew there were divers horse ready there: and I myself spoke with one who is lately secured, who said, There were divers horse ready thereabouts. I remember there were several at the Half-Moon at Bishopsgate, one Smith a Northamptonshire man, and one Elowe of Chesterfield, and Tonge; and we heard, that at Mansfield and Nottingham there was a rising intended; and it was assured, that the country was very ripe and forward for action. We were informed that there were 200 horse at Bristol; one person not yet secured, did affirm to us, That one colonel Templar in Essex had two or three thousand men ready, his name was Thomas: That Templar was now in town, if we would, we might go and speak with him. Said I, surely he doth but tell you this. Saith he, his licut. colonel gave me this information, and assures me, that his colonel had converted his estate into money to pay his soldiers. Upon this, having occasion to go down into Essex, I promised Tonge I would enquire further there; and understanding that one Thornback a glover was one of this Templar's men formerly, I went to this house, and not being at home, I rode to Holsted fair; and riding there, the man pulled me by the coat, for he knew me; saith he, Mr. Tyler, my servant said you were at my house to speak with me. Yes, said I, I understand your name is Thornback: That you can give me some account concerning colonel Templar; we hear in London that he hath 2 or 3,000 men in readiness, I pray inform me. Saith he, I do not believe any such matter; I have served him long, and, if occasion were he would be for you. I asked him the news: saith he, We all dread a massacre: we understand by a letter from Ipswich, That the Papists intend a massacre of all Protestants about All-hallontide, and that that country was in great fear about it. This Thomas the copper-smith told us another story about some Roman Catholics in Southwark, that had a purpose to rise and take off all fanatics.

After this the Court directed, that Phillips's Examination should be shewed him at the bar, and he acknowledged his hand thereto; and was read as followeth:

THE EXAMINATION OF GEORGE PHILLIPS, Sergeant and Bringer-up to col. sir William Wales's Company of Trained-Bands in the city of London, taken this 29th of October, 1662, before me Richard Brown.

Who saith, "That he knoweth one parson Riggs, late chaplain to Blake, who is now clerk to one Friend a brewer in Cat's-Hole, near the Irongate in St. Catharine's; which said Riggs told him this examinant, That there would be a rising of divers godly people in arms, for preservation of religion, about the time the queen came to town; and that they intended to seize the king's person about Camberwell, in his passage to see the queen mother at Greenwich; but after the queen was come to town, this examinant asked the said Riggs, why it was not done according to their intentment? Who replied, They were not then ready, because the congregational churches and they were not fully agreed; but now they were come all to an agreement, and the work would be done in a short time: that all things were now near ready both in country and city; and that a frigate or more would revolt from the king to them. Not long after, the said Riggs carried him the said Phillips to the house of one Tonge, an old army captain, but now a seller of tobacco and strong-water in Tower-Ditch; where he heard Tonge say unto Riggs, That he had been at Windsor-Castle, and had made a captain, two serjeants and a gunner to be of their party; and that they had undertaken to deliver up the said castle to that party which were now to rise. To which Riggs replied, You have done well: and further said, I am going now to surprize two castles in Kent; one of them, as this Deponent remembereth, was to be Deal-Castle; and this he would and could do, for that he had some correspondence therein, and much acquaintance near, where he formerly used to preach. And further saith, That Tonge asked Riggs who should lead the men that were to rise, and who commanded in chief? To which Riggs replied, That Ludlow was appointed for that work.

"He further saith, That he asked Riggs and Tonge, how this business might be carried on with safety and secrecy? Riggs told him, That there was a council of six which managed the design, who sat but one day in a place, and would not be spoken with but by the agitators of each county; who were employed by them to and fro in this work, to prepare and make ready all parties in the several counties; and that these six were of several congregations and opinions, to the end that all parties might unite. And further saith, That one Wade, or some such name, whom he heard Riggs and Tonge say was a ship-chandler in East-Smithfield, did furnish powder to carry on this design, in whose company he once was, and heard himself say as much; which said person he believes he knows when he seeth him again. He also saith, That Riggs told him all the congregational churches were now agreed to join in this design; and that Riggs and Tonge desired this examinant to furnish what men and arms he could: which, he saith, he never intended to do it, though they earnestly requested it of him. Only he saith, In some things he was too faulty, which he prayeth pardon for; which was, in sending word to the several meetings on Sunday last, That the trained-bands were coming to-seize them: upon which the chiefest of them made their escape before the soldiers arrival; and that he being deluded by their fair speeches, did promise to give them the word when the general rising was to be; in which rising all the churches aforesaid promised to join, and the Fifth-monarchy-men to lead the Van. And further saith, That Riggs told him, They had a Declaration ready to fling among the people, against Bishops and Common-Prayer; and that Liberty of Conscience was held forth therein. But first, before this Declaration, they would seize on the king's person, and that then their Declaration would take with the people. And also saith, That one capt. Baker, one Bradley and Tonge, were privy to all these transactions which were debated by them in his presence; and that the said Baker came afterwards to this examinant, and discoursed all the aforesaid particulars, and incited him to help on with the work; and told him, their arms and powder were distributed, and that a porter, which was formerly a soldier, carried the powder to several places in a sack. And further saith, That Riggs told him they had divers friends both in London and the country, who had, and would help them to money; and that all their friends were now ready in all countries, waiting only for the day when they were to act; and that the treasure in the Guild-hall was likewise to be seized.

"And that the said Riggs also told him, That they intended to surprize the Tower, which they could easily do, having some therein that would assist: And this was to be put in execution in some evening when sir John Robinson came home late, by following close after his coach with a party of men, which should be ready for that purpose. G. PHILLIPS."

Sir William Morice, and Sir Henry Bennet, Principal Secretaries of State, sworn.

Sir William Morice. I have had intelligence, and several advertisements from several parts of the kingdom, that there was a design of rising, and an insurrection, that it was the general expectation and common discourse of the discontented and disaffected party; nay, it was likewise preached about, that the Papists had a design to rise and cut the throats of the Protestants. I had four or five letters to that effect sent and brought me; and these rumours were spread to excite others to join with these.

Sir Henry Bennet. Divers letters of mine were to the same effect, That there was an insurrection intended at that time, and calling upon one another to be ready at that time.

Sir John Talbot sworn.

Sir John Talbot. I suppose that the evidence that I can give in relation to the prisoners, is only the consequences of this report, which they had rumoured about the papists massacring the protestants: the consequence was this, That it made a very great disturbance in Worcestershire and Warwickshire, insomuch that many gentlemen that lived in the country in very good repute, came under a very great suspicion of all their neighbours; and the lieutenants wrote to one another to secure many: There were guards set to satisfy the fears of the country, Friday night, which the rising should have been on, they would not intrust the catholics to be in arms, but other volunteers.

Mr. Hodges sworn.

Mr. Hodges. In Dorsetshire, the 23d, Oct. last, there was a discovery made by some of the town, of an intention of a general rising; and some of the town were engaged in it; one Mr. Harvey a justice of the peace examined divers persons; four that were privy to it were sent to the gaol, and an express sent to Mr. Secretary Morice. Sir John Weld the younger gave such an account of Shrewsbury.

Stubbs. My lord, the occasion of my going that Friday-night, was by Mr. Hill, and Mr. Riggs suggesting the papists rising; I was never known to be a plotter; I had not gone forth that night, but only by their persuasions; I never heard of any arms, but only the rumours of the people.

Sellers. I would fain know of Mr. Riggs what number of arms I told him was delivered?

Riggs. I know not the number.

Major Tho. Bonfoy (at his desire) was sworn.

Major Bonfoy. I do not remember that I ever saw Phillips's face; but I did understand it was his custom to come to the Exchange to insinuate himself into my officers, making merr with them, and endeavouring to get the word; and I believe it was his common practice.

Phillips. He may remember I came on the Exchange and spoke to him, and was looking for one of his sergeants; I asked no man the word, but presently went to the Black-Lion in the new alley, and from thence I went home; I did not ask the word of any one. I have confessed before the council, that at the beginning of August I met Mr. Riggs in Cheapside; he then came and closed with me, and walking along, said he, Do not you hear of a rising which should have been on Friday? No, said I; and then I asked him where? He said, at Camberwell: and I thinking nothing of it, came home and spoke of it in my family, as news from Mr. Riggs. On Tuesday I met Mr. Riggs on Tower-Hill, and he brought me to the house of Mr. Tonge; Tonge told Riggs he had been at Windsor, and made some party to secure the Castle. Riggs said he could go down to Kent, and secure Deal and another castle: for he had been a preacher there. As for Mr. Tyler, one night coming near captain Foster's door, and having not seen him in three years before, he asked me, if I would not drink? I said, Yes: Then came in the carrier of Norwich, I never saw this carrier until then; Then came Mr. Tyler, and there was talking of a frigate, and the time of the launching of it, and how it was to be manned; but a little after captain Foster came and charged me with a report, that I should say he was engaged. I told him I knew it not, nor said it not: I have often declared I would have nothing to do in it. It is true, Mr. Riggs came and thanked me that I sent notice to the meeting to be gone; and I told him I would do the people any good I could; but Mr. Riggs knows I told him it was a dangerous business, and I would not meddle with it: I am sure in the time of the Fifth-monarchy insurrection I was faithful to the king, ventured my life as far as any man; Sir William Wales put trust in me, and I did that service there that the colonel himself did not venture to do. But that I was engaged in this business, it is a trouble to me, and I hope the king will be merciful to me, I did not think that such a thing would be disclosed in so short a time. For my part, I did not mind it, I knew nothing the night I was taken, I was in bed, and did not offer to escape; I hope the king will look upon me as one drawn in.

Stubbs. I never had any meeting with any of the council; most of the things I heard at Mr. Tonge's house, meeting with Mr. Riggs by chance. For those gentlemen Mr. Tyler speaks of, the council of forty and of six, I never knew them: I am sorry I should be concerned in such discourse, and I hope his majesty will have mercy on me.

Gibbs. My lord, I was at a neighbour's house at that time, and went to drink a cup of beer alone in their kitchen, not knowing of Hill, Riggs or Stubbs coming there: I never appointed them any meeting, they came in, and when they came in, they asked if there was not one Gibbs there; so the people of the house told them there was. They came and told me, there were some gentlemen would speak with me; whereupon, they being strange faces, I stood up, and said, Gentlemen, what is your business with me? Said they, we would drink a cup of beer with you. Then said I, sit down; they had a desire to be private, and to go up. Whereupon, not knowing their business, I went up, supposing they meant some matters of my trade; but we sitting down, Mr. Riggs said to me, Mr. Gibbs, what is the best news? And Mr. Hill also did urge and ask for news. Said I, Gentlemen, I know no news, nor none can I tell you. So they made enquiry then for my brother: said I, I cannot tell where my brother is, may be your business is most with him: I will send for him: and I sent the maid for him, and directed her, that if he was not at home, she should leave word for him to come. Again they urged for news, and I told them I knew none but only this, that the meeting was seized upon the last Sunday, by armed soldiers: but to tell them there would be any rising, or of any arms delivered, or pistols, as Mr. Hill has related it, was a thing I was wholly ignorant of. I speak as in the presence of God, and I know I must one day give an account before the great assizes of the world; and I fear that which they have said, is out of some fear lying upon them, being guilty of some fact, and so to shroud themselves under false lies. They, nor no other can prove that ever I received or delivered any arms, or that any were delivered by my order; these men speak falsely.

Sir Ortl. Bridgman. You mistake yourself, they do not charge you with receiving or delivering arms, but you related it: your brother speaks such things had been done, and if you know of this, and do consent and conceal it, you are equally guilty.

Gibbs. After they had asked the news, in a short time my brother came into the room, and I rose from the table, and went towards my brother; and then my brother asked me what those gentlemen were? I said they were strangers to me, and knew not what they came for. Says he, they are strangers to me also. Immediately we arose, paid our reckoning, and went away. But that ever I said my brother told me, 'The council of six was broke up, all is ready, Ludlow to be general, and Alhallow-Eve the time, or that things went on well;' I deny it: my brother said no such thing to me, nor I to any man. When there was an insurrection by the Fifth-Monarchy men, I was then presently ready at beat of drum, went out in my own person to serve his majesty at twelve o'clock at night, though I had servants of my own. My affections were such, that I have always, ever since his majesty's restoration, been an obedient subject to all his lawful commands. I belonged then to major Kilby's company, and did continue marching in the company until the whole business was over, and ventured my life, and never did contrive any plot, or knew of any plot, received or delivered any arms. As to the inhabitants among whom I have lived many years, they have known my conversation; I have been a peaceable neighbour, subjecting myself under the government that now is, whom God continue. I desire this certificate may be read concerning my neighbours testimony of my conversation.

Sir Ortl. Bridgman. If you have any of them here, they may speak; but the certificate cannot be read.

The Porter's man of Bridewell said, he knew nothing but that he lived very quietly among his neighbours.

C. Justice. Nor I neither.

Court. Mr. Tonge, what have you to say?

Tonge. I have nothing to say, but that the first man that brought me into this business was Tyler.

Sellers. All that I am charged with is a report of the delivery of some arms; seeing that a number of arms are mentioned, I will ask what was the number?

Riggs. I cannot well tell the number, but you said there were some arms given, and some to be given, and that several had come to that place, and went away without arms, and that within two or three days there would be more given; but as to the number, I cannot remember.

Sellers. Now take notice of Mr. Hill's evidence, he hath asserted that there were five or 600; how do these agree? I can have sufficient testimony of my life and conversation.

Court. If you have any thing more to say in this business, speak in the name of God, no body hinders you, but keep to the business.

Sellers. I intreat the Bench to take notice what I am charged withal; it is only a report I received from one man, and told to another, and the very original was a lye, there was no such matter; and yet here is audacious evidence: he says I named five or 600, and yet Riggs, to whom I spoke, heard me name no number.

Counsel. One speaks to the arms, but does not remember the number; they both speak to the thing.

Sellers. How can Mr. Hill be a competent witness against me, when he never saw my face before, but says Mr. Riggs told him?

Hill. I said not so, but that I heard it from your own mouth.

Mr. Solicitor. Mr. Riggs, why did you go to Mr. Sellers to help Mr. Hill to arms?

Riggs. Because Mr. Sellers told me the day before, that he heard there was some delivered, and more would be: and the next day we went to the Exchange, and there he told me this story.

Sellers. I cannot hear him.

Sir Ortl. Bridgman. He says you told him the day before there was arms delivered, and more would be delivered; and then the next day he and Mr. Hill came on the Exchange, and then you spoke those words which they both witness against you.

Sellers. I never spoke such a word. It is true, what Wapshot told me, I told Riggs, which was, that there were arms delivered; but it seems there was none: and I told him I would tell him the truth the next day on the Exchange. And so in the mean time speaking with Wapshot, he told me there was no such thing, and I told Mr. Riggs, Wapshot said there was none.

Court. Pray what made you so busily inquire after arms, if you were not concerned?

Sellers. I did not inquire after it, but accidentally meeting him in Mark-Lane, he told me.

Tonge. My lord, as you are my judge, so I hope you will be my counsellor;* and I pray your advice, whether Mr. Tyler and Mr. Riggs be competent witnesses against me, they being in the same case.

Sir Orl. Bridgman. Where is the cause of your exception?

Tonge. Because they are in the same case.

Sir Orl. Bridgman. There are four witnesses all against you, your own confession and examination against you; through the whole business you are a principal person.

Tonge. I confess I did confess it in the Tower, being threatened with the rack.

Sir Orl. Bridgman. There is Mr. Hill, Mr. Riggs, Mr. Bradley, and Mr. Tyler: there is Hill and Bradley without exception; Bradley, he was not at all concerned, he went along with you to know what you said; and Mr. Hill was not a person in the design, but made use of only to find out the plot: they did nothing unjustifiable, so they are witnesses without exception.

Serj. Glynne. We desire your lordship to declare whether Riggs and Tyler be lawful witnesses.

Sir Orl. Bridgman. I would have you know this: Where you make exception against those persons that are guilty of the same crime, that is a mistake to say they are not witnesses: in cases of treason, where there are works of darkness, these are things men will not do by day-light, but in darkness; and who can discover these works of darkness better than they that have to do with them, if God turn their hearts? It is true, such persons as these are, if they had been convicted, they are not witnesses; but though they are in the same fault, it is frequent practice, they are allowed in case of felony. Besides, they are not witnesses alone, and there are divers circumstances concurring. 1. Edw. 6, 5 Edw. 6, both statutes say, There shall be lawful witnesses in cases of High-Treason; but that is, such witnesses as the law would allow before those statutes. The meaning of the statutes was, that men might not be taken upon bare surmises; therefore the law says, there shall be two witnesses. When one is accused of treason, another in the same offence unconvicted, his evidence is made use of; and though he is not so upright a witness as others, yet he is such a witness as the jury is to take notice of. Such testimony was allowable before those statutes; and the trial is still by jury, not witnesses, and the jury are to consider of the credit of the witnesses. In king James's time a great person* was condemned upon the evidence of one in the same treason. It is plain by several circumstances, you have been a principal person, a leader-on of the business: Though a man be but present when treason is spoken, or designed and acted; if this man be present, and shew any thing of approbation, his concealing of it is as much treason as he that did it, they are all principals in treason.

Sol. Gen. May it please your lordships, and you gentlemen of the jury, you have heard the evidence of the prisoners at the bar; Five of them have stood out their trial, a sixth hath confessed the fact. Against those persons that now stand at the bar, under good favour, there is a clear and unquestionable proof of the crime charged against them, and they have not said any thing that hath either taken away the credit of the evidence, or excused the matter. If you consider first Tonge, there are against him four witnesses, and those unquestionable; as you heard the direction of the court, that he knew of the design, approved of it, contrived how to surprize Windsor-castle, had corrupted the head gunner and serjeant there: That he did contrive to seize Whitehall, and if you believe Bradley, advised, as the fittest way, to break into the privy-garden: All this against Tonge, with a world of other evidence how active he has been, his house was the place of consultation, he imparts the design to Phillips, and Phillips undertakes to get the word of the trained-bands; I think none can prove more than is proved against him. When you come to hear the proof against Phillips, it is proved that he offered to betray 300 arms in the artillery, where he had some kind of trust, and that he was ready to endeavour the world when the insurrection was to be; and but a very little before, he is the man that discovers to the congregational meetings, that the trained-bands were coming to surprize them, that is in his own confession, as well as the willingness in him to discover the word. It is proved, that Tonge and Stubbs were present at those discourses touching surprizing the Tower, securing the king, this is proved expressly against them: Stubbs, he thinks he has said fairly for himself, when he doth ask Mr. Hill whether he did not say he had horses and 200*l.* to carry on the work; Mr. Hill says he did say so. Then it seems Stubbs was inquisitive what helps there were to carry it on. Mr. Hill goes further; that in the presence of Stubbs it was said there should be no quarter given, but such as Ludlow should have if he were taken: When you come to Gibbs, he does deny all the whole matter, and indeed so they would all; and they have nothing to say, but to cry, the witnesses have sworn falsely, and God is a righteous God, and he will require their blood one day: But remember what a horrid protestation was in that letter, that was sent abroad, to alarm the whole kingdom, as if a massacre was intended by the papists, and the watch-word they should all rise by; that letter says, 'I call the eternal God to witness, 'this is no trepan, but a sober truth.' Do you think that men who are not ashamed to call the eternal God to witness to a lye, when it is to raise a sedition, will make any scruple of such protestations at the bar, when it is to save their lives? And if a man may escape by his own protestation, who shall ever be found guilty? But Gibbs thinks he says a great deal for himself, when he says his neighbours can give great testimony of his good conversation. Alas! who will deny to give a good report of any man till he hear evil proved against him? But do you think a little demure and sober carriage amongst a man's neighbours will serve to balance an evidence of high-treason? Is not the proof clear, that he did both know the design and approve it? Mark what Gibbs tells the company.—My brother, saith he, for his part he will not speak before you; but if you be honest men, this is the news that was spoke, like one that was not consenting to it. Well then, what is the news? He tells them why the council of six are broke up, Friday is the day of action, Ludlow is to be general. Can any man be privy to these things and relate them so cheerfully, and yet not be consenting? Believe it, it is a hard matter to find greater evidence of a knowledge and consent against any conspirator, until he break out into open action. Sellers, he says that the witnesses do not agree; for Mr. Hill speaks that he said there was five hundred arms delivered, and forty men went without arms, but within two or three days there would be more. And when Riggs comes to speak he says he did say arms were delivered, and more would be, but he did not remember what number; and because they agree in the thing, but not in the number, therefore he thinks they disagree in the matter. Observe what reason was there that Riggs comes to enquire of Sellers for arms, because Sellers told him the day before arms were delivered, and more would be, he thought therefore he came to a very proper person to tell him. If you mark, Sellers does deny openly in the court that ever he saw the face of Hill till he was apprehended, although Hill was with Riggs when the arms were spoken of upon the Exchange: and then he says again, that Hill speaks by hearsay, he is out in that too; for Mr. Hill swears expressly, he heard the words themselves from Sellers. Then here are these before you, four witnesses against Tonge, two against Phillips, and his own confession; here are two against Gibbs, with these circumstances, 'If you be honest men, this is the news,' &c. Here are two witnesses likewise against Stubbs, who was likewise present at all their debates, even when the king himself was to have had the same quarter with Ludlow. Now, gentlemen, that there was a conspiracy, I think you have a clear evidence: we may thank God, and the care of the king and his ministers, that it went no further; but it is no thanks to these men, they would have carried it to the extremity, had they had power. And without question this was formed by other kind of wits than these poor contemptible agitators, who are now tried for it: you see there was a council of forty, and an under-council of six, a declaration framed to scatter at the time of action, and that action directed to be both in the city and country, just in effect at the same pitch of time; and that it might be so, a wicked and an impudent letter is contrived, and many thousand copies dispersed, and it wrought so far, that the countries, much about the time appointed, were in great disorder, as you have heard it proved. Is it not plain, that an evil spirit went throughout the whole nation and animated the whole party of malecontents? most evidently it was a terrible conspiracy. Gentlemen, it is true, it is a question of blood, but it is royal blood, it is the blood of princes and nobles, and it concerns the peace and security of the kingdom, and every man's propriety, and of religion, for they had left no man of conscience or reputation behind if they had prevailed. Consider the massacre these men would have committed, had they prospered, and oppose that to the pretended massacre which they gave out by their letter the Papists would have committed. Consider that you have the life of the king in your hands, and I doubt not but he and the whole kingdom shall always be safe in the verdicts of honest men.

* Sir Walter Raleigh, See No. 74, vol. 2, p. 1, of this Collection.

C. Justice. My masters of the Jury, I cannot speak loud to you, you understand the nature of this business, such as I think you have not had the like precedent in your time. My speech will not give me leave to discourse of it; for the witnesses, they are none but such as may satisfy all honest men: It is clear they all agreed to subvert the government, to destroy his majesty; what can you have more? two of the witnesses are without exception, but I do not see any way but their testimony is good. For the parties, they in themselves are very inconsiderable; these are but the out-boughs, and if such fellows are not met withal, these kind of people are the fittest instruments to set up a Jack Straw and a Was Tyleg: therefore you must lop off these, or else they will encourage others. You see one of their own company hath confessed the fact, out of remorse of his own conscience. But I leave the evidence to you: go together.

Officer was sworn to keep the Jury.

The Jury withdrew; and after an hour's consultation, they returned.

Silence was commanded, and James Hind fetched from the gaol to the bar.

Clerk of the Peace. Gentlemen, answer to your names; Edmond Butler, Clement Pung, [and the rest of the Jury before-mentioned] are you all agreed of your verdict?

Jury. Yes.

Clerk of the Peace. Who shall say for you?

Jury. The Foreman.

Clerk of the Peace. Set up Thomas Tonge to the bar: Thomas Tonge, hold up thy hand; look upon him, masters: how say you, is he guilty of the high-treason whereof he stands indicted, or not guilty?

Jury. Guilty.

Clerk of Newgate. Look to him, keeper.

Clerk of the Peace. What goods and chattels?

Jury. None.

Clerk of the Peace. George Phillips to the bar: how say you, is he guilty of the high-treason whereof he stands indicted, or not guilty?

Jury. Guilty.

Clerk of Newgate. Look to him, keeper.

Clerk of the Peace. What goods and chattels?

Jury. None.

Clerk of the Peace. Francis Stubbs to the bar: how say you, is he guilty of the high-treason whereof he stands indicted, or not guilty?

Jury. Guilty.

Clerk of Newgate. Look to him, keeper.

Clerk of the Peace. What goods and chattels?

Jury. None.

Clerk of the Peace. John Sellers to the bar: how say you, is he guilty of the high-treason whereof he stands indicted, or not guilty?

Jury. Guilty.

Clerk of Newgate. Look to him, keeper.

Clerk of the Peace. What goods and chattels?

Jury. None.

Clerk of the Peace. Nathaniel Gibbs to the bar: How say you, is he guilty of the high-treason whereof he stands indicted, or not guilty?

Jury. Guilty.

Clerk of Newgate. Look to him, keeper.

Clerk of the Peace. What goods and chattels?

Jury. None.

Clerk of the Peace. Hearken to your verdict, as the court hath recorded it. You say that Thomas Tonge is guilty of the treason whereof he stands indicted, and so all the rest. And you say, that they, nor any of them, had any goods or chattels, land or tenements at the time of committing the said treason, or at any time sithence, to your knowledge; and thus you say all?

Jury. Yes.

Cl. of the Peace. Thomas Tonge, hold up thy hand, thou hast been indicted of High-Treason, thou hast thereunto pleaded Not Guilty, and for thy trial hast put thyself upon God and the country, and the country hath found thee Guilty; what hast thou to say for thyself, why the Court should not proceed to judgment, and thereupon award execution of thee according to the law?

Tonge. I pray mercy from the king, I cry for mercy from the king.

Clerk of Newgate. Tye him up, Executioner,

Cl. of the Peace. George Phillips, hold up thy hand; thou art in the same case that Thomas Tonge is, what canst thou say, &c.

Phillips kneeled down, and said, I pray the mercy of the King and the honourable bench.

Clerk of Newgate. Tye him up, Executioner.

Cl. of the Peace. Francis Stubbs, hold up thy hand; thou art in the same case the two last prisoners before thee are; what canst thou say, &c.

Stubbs. I beg mercy, I was merely drawn in.

Clerk of Newgate. Tye him up, Executioner.

Clerk of the Peace. John Sellers, hold up thy hand; thou art, &c. What canst thou say, &c.

Sellers. I would intreat this honourable bench to consider my condition, and what my charge is; I delivered no arms, if I had known where they had been, I would have discovered them: I beg mercy from the king and this honourable bench.

Clerk of Newgate. Tye him up, Executioner.

Cl. of the Peace. Nathaniel Gibbs, hold up thy hand; thou art, &c. What canst thou say, &c.

Gibbs. And please this honourable bench, I have something to say, I am innocent as to my conscience of acting any thing treasonable against his majesty; the Lord forgive the witnesses: I beg the mercy of the king.

Clerk of Newgate. Tye him up, Executioner.

Cl. of the Peace. James Hind, hold up thy hand; thou art guilty of the treason whereof thou standest indicted by thy own confession, what canst thou say, &c.

Hind. I have nothing to say, but humbly beg the mercy of the king.

Clerk of Newgate. Tye him up, Executioner.

Crier. O Yes! my lords the king's justices command all manner of persons to keep silence while judgment is in giving, upon pain of imprisonment.

Chief Justice. Thomas Tonge, George Phillips, Francis Stubbs, James Hind, John Sellers, and Nathaniel Gibbs, you six prisoners at the bar, you have been here indicted for one of the greatest crimes that can be committed upon earth as to this world, against God, our King, and your country, and against every good body that is in this land, for that capital sin of High Treason, which is a sin inexpiable, and indeed hath no equal sin as to this world. Upon this you have severally been arraigned, and have severally (except one) pleaded not guilty, and put yourselves upon God and the country for your trials; and your country have found you guilty: For the five that are found guilty, I must say that in you I find little remorse, little sense of your sin. For the little man there, Hind, he hath much shewed his penitency. As to the manner and circumstances of this, most men here believe this did not originally arise from your particular selves, it must be put into you by some others: You speak as if you desired mercy; where was your mercy, that would have destroyed king and country, and massacred many millions of souls, no respect of any person, but your own fellows? I speak this, that you may be the more sensible of your own crime, that you may truly, out of the remorse of conscience, be sorry for your sin: You know very well the old counsel, and it is a good one, 'Fear God, and honour the king, and meddle not with them that are given to change.' Meddling with them that are given to change, has brought too much mischief already to this nation; and if you will commit the same sin, you must receive the same punishment: for happy is he, that by other men's harms take heed. I shall not spend long time with you, but if you will as much as you can discover the actors herein, you will do God, the king and your country good service. It remains that the court proceed to judgment: and therefore, you six, the one by his own confession, and the other five by conviction of law, the Judgment of this court is, 'That you be conveyed back to the place from whence you came, and from thence to be drawn upon an hurdle to the place of execution; and there you shall be hanged by the neck, and being alive shall be cut down, and your privy members to be cut off, your entrails to be taken out of your body, and (you living) the same to be burnt before your eyes, and your head to be cut off, your body to be divided into four quarters, and your head and quarters to be disposed of at the pleasure of the king's majesty: And God have mercy upon your souls.'

Phillips, Tonge, Gibbs, and Stubbs were ordered for execution on Monday, Dec. 22, when they were drawn on two hurdles, viz. Phillips and Tonge on one, Gibbs and Stubbs on the other, to the common place of execution at Tyburn: Where being come, they were received into a cart under the gallows; and the executioner desiring them severally to forgive him, they all declared they did freely forgive him and all their enemies, and did severally salute each other with this phrase, 'Welcome, Brother;' and to one another said, 'We are now launching into the deep.' They being all tied up, Phillips gave the executioner a small sum of money, and the rest directed the executioner to take out of their pockets a small parcel of money, as their gift to him; and Phillips afterwards bent a sixpence, and presented it to a friend of his, Mr. Stroud; and a shilling likewise bent to one Mr. Clark. Then the under-sheriff of Middlesex acquainted them they had all free liberty to speak, provided they did not reflect upon his majesty, or the present government; which they all promised not to do, and thanked him for his civility.

And then Phillips began as follows:

"Friends and Countrymen;

"I am come this day to pay that great debt that I owe to nature; it is a work that had need be well done, for it is but once to be done. My hope is now above; and for what I now come to suffer, for my own part, I bless God, in whose presence I now speak, as a dying man, I had not any murderous thought against the king; but I have prayed for him, and wished that he might live and reign, and long reign in righteousness; and that God would make his crown a crown of righteousness upon his head, and bless him in his government, so that he may not know any of these occasions more: For my part, I have ventured my life for his majesty, it was far from my heart to do any thing of that nature. The Lord receive my soul. I freely forgive all men, as I hope to be forgiven of God: I never did act any thing, but only this, which was my ignorance of the laws, that I did not discover it; and I was justly found guilty, for not discovering. I have done, Mr. Sheriff; but hope, after my brethren have spoken, we may have liberty to call upon the Lord."

Und. Sheriff. It will not be denied you.

Then Mr. Tonge began in this manner:

"Friends and Countrymen;

"You see me here a dying man: I have sometimes been in some men's company, where I have heard them contriving the business for which I am to die; and that which led me to join with them was this: I was and had been sometimes in the army; and I have looked upon this cause to be good. As for his majesty, the Lord bless him, and prosper him, and put it into his heart, that he may be a nursing father indeed to his country."

Und. Sher. Have you any more to say? You may speak.

Tonge. I have nothing more.

And then Gibbs proceeded and said, "Countrymen and Friends, and I hope Christians, and the last consideration is that that makes me the more free to speak to you; we all profess to own God and Jesus Christ to be our Saviour, our Redeemer, our Sanctifier, and giver of, and bestower upon us eternal life; this should excite our souls to love one another; and upon the account of God's love, that God has so loved us as to give Jesus Christ, to reconcile us sinners to God, we ought to love one another, it is his great command. Truly, as to the cause for which I am brought here, God the great judge of heaven and earth, before whom I stand, knows that in the place where I have lived, I behaved myself as an obedient subject; and when there was an insurrection by the Fifth Monarchy men, I went out in my own person, though I had servants as well as others, purely out of affection to his majesty, knowing that in the peace of his government I should have peace, and so I went out, hazarded my life, and continued out till all was quiet. I was at a neighbour's house drinking of a cup of beer on Tuesday night in the kitchen alone, save only the man of the house and the maid; these men came in, one Hill and Riggs, that are the witnesses against me;

there were Riggs and Hill, and this Stubbs, and one Beazeley: and I being alone in the kitchen, they asked for one Gibbs; the people of the house told me there were some gentlemen would speak with me: I wished them to direct them to me, and they came to me; and through the ignorance of the law, which, it seems, runs thus: If any words treasonable against his majesty are spoken, it is treasonable to conceal them: So thus I have given you, in part, the cause of my being here.

“Hereupon information was given to the king’s majesty, that I should say there would be a rising, and that All-hallows eve was the time; that there were arms sent into the country, and that Ludlow was to be general; and this was charged upon me by the king’s majesty, when I came before him to be examined: And upon Hill’s and Riggs’s oath, I was sent to the Tower, and kept a long time a prisoner, examined three or four times over by the lords of his majesty’s council. I have one word more; as touching my judgment, I am reputed in the world to be one of those that is called by the name of Anabaptist, a name of derision and scorn; one is an Anabaptist, one an Independent, one a Presbyterian, one this, and one that, and one the other; who gave these nick-names to Christians? There is but one God, one Lord Jesus, one baptism, one hope of glory: How comes the body of Christ, or the members of Christ to be called by these nick-names? But now, as I am one that do profess faith in God through the Lord Jesus Christ, and do stand before you all, and before the Lord, I know no other God, but the eternal and living God, that hath made the world, and that rules and reigns, and disposes all his creatures; I do believe in this God, he has been gracious to me a poor sinner, and to all poor sinners, that when we by reason of sin had forfeited all our mercies, and were under wrath and everlasting destruction, and must perish for ever; that God did out of his rich grace and tender mercies give his only begotten Son, according to his promise, to be the blessing of God to the poor Gentiles, according as the Scripture did declare; the Scripture foreseeing that God would justify the heathens through faith preached before the Gospel to Abraham, saying, In thee shall all the nations of the earth be blessed: He speaks not of the natural seed of Abraham, but of Christ; so that all the blessings that God did convey to the sinful world, are by the means of Jesus Christ, whom God in the fulness of time did send, his Son, horn of a woman, to redeem poor sinners under the law; and herein was the great grace and mercy of God towards all sinners, that he was so gracious to send his beloved Son out of his own bosom to take our natures upon him, who were defiled, and cursed, and condemned, and separated from God. I say, Jesus Christ took our natures upon him, and for this very end, to do the will of his heavenly Father: ‘Lo, it is written in the volume of the book, I come to do thy Will, O

‘God;’ and it was his meat and drink to do his Will; and what was that, but that we might be sanctified through the offering up of the body of Jesus Christ for our sins, to tread the wine-press of his Father’s wrath, and to endure the cross, and bear all our sins in his own body, that made his soul heavy unto death? He was a surety for us and our sins, and for our sakes the Lord laid on him the iniquity of us all, and he hath borne our grief and endured our punishment; it made his soul cry out, My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? or else we must for ever be banished out of the presence of God, and never have any hopes of mercy, of faith, or of salvation, had not the Son of God become our mediator and surety; so there is one God, and one Mediator, the man Christ Jesus. He gave himself a ransom for all our sins, to free us from the wrath to come, everlasting destruction, and from the worm that never dies. O that we could ever be thankful to God, live to him that hath so loved us, as to send his Son to die for us, and is by the almighty power of God raised from the dead, and now sits at the right hand of God, and ever lives to make intercession.

“Truly, friends, this is not the love of man, but the love of God, and therefore eternal love. God so loved the world; it is God’s love, he loved sinners, ungodly ones; he did so love them as to give his only begotten Son to save them, to reconcile them, to uphold them, to redeem them from wrath to come; it was to seek and save them that were lost. This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptance, that Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners. We all, like sheep, had gone astray, and must perish in our sins, had not the Lord Jesus been sent of his Father, out of his bosom to declare the good will of God, and did it, by which we are sanctified through the offering up of the body of Jesus Christ, and this Lord Jesus Christ the eternal Son of God, he is the mediator between God and poor sinners. Come unto me, all ye that are weary and heavy laden, says Christ, and I will give you rest; now this grace is from God, we are saved by grace, and that not of ourselves, it is the gift of God; through faith in Christ we are saved; and all things that do pertain to life and godliness it is the gift of God; now all things are of God, who hath reconciled us to himself by Jesus Christ, to wit, that God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them. Would you know the forgiveness of your sins, your peace with God, and that God is well pleased with you? God is reconciled by Jesus Christ unto you, and does not impute your sins unto you, but looks on the righteousness of Christ as satisfaction, that thereby you might have the remission of your sins through the blood of Christ. Be it known unto all men, that through this man’s preaching the forgiveness of sins, Acts xiii. 38, 39, and by him all that do believe are justified from all things, from which they could not be by the law of Moses,

Now justification from sin, and redemption from iniquity, is through the knowledge of Christ's death for our sins, and his resurrection; and now there is no other name given under Heaven whereby we can be saved, but by the name of Jesus, and whosoever believeth in his name shall not perish, but have everlasting life, John v. 24. It is the doctrine of Jesus Christ, it is his word, and I hope you will search the scriptures, and look into those things for your souls good, when Christ says, Verily, verily, I say unto you, he that heareth my words and believeth them, he hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation, but is passed from death to life. The reason why God does assure poor sinners they shall not pass into everlasting condemnation and perish, is through his rich grace, and through his promise; for he hath promised, he will be merciful to our iniquities, and our sins will remember no more; and these his promises of grace, which are all yea and amen in Christ, are ratified by the blood of Christ; the blood of Christ is the blood of the new covenant, and it is that by which we have the forgiveness, remission, and cleansing of all our sins."

Under Sheriff. Mr. Gibbs, let me interrupt you; this is very good and pertinent, but you have said these things over and over; there is another of your friends to speak, and the time grows short, pray go on to the matter, or conclude.

Gibbs. "I shall speak a word or two as to the knowledge of forgiveness of sins, by and through Jesus Christ; and so the knowledge of the resurrection of the dead, it is the fruit of Jesus Christ; for by the first man came death, and by the second man, Christ, came life; and God, that has by his exceeding great and mighty power raised up Jesus Christ from the grave and power of sin, he also shall raise us up by the same power, and when he comes the second time, at his appearing and coming we shall see him, and be made like to him, and he will receive us to himself; he is gone to prepare a place for us, and in his Father's house are many mansions, and if it were not so, he would have told us: And now God that hath given eternal life, and forgiveness of sins unto his poor servants, he will also, when Jesus Christ shall come to judge the world, receive him into his everlasting glory, which is my faith, expectation, and hope, in God through Jesus Christ. A man may bear his infirmities, but a wounded conscience who can bear? When God smites who can bear? And therefore I desire, as I believe, the forgiveness of all my sins, through the rich grace of God, through the bloodshed of Jesus Christ his Son; every one must give an account to God, and as their works are, so will their reward be, either accepted by God, as workers of Christ, or condemned as workers of iniquity. Last of all, as to the separated congregation to whom I belong, I have observed in those few days that I have lived, there is a great deal of animosity, evil will, hard censuring, and abusing the precious saints of Jesus Christ. If they are in an error, you that are in the truth instruct them, and you may recover them out of the claws of the Devil: Are you Christians, and have the light of God in your souls? O then strengthen your brethren, do not give them nick-names, and abuse them; that's not the way; Christ teaches another lesson, 'That if thine enemy hunger, you shall feed him; and if he be a-thirsty, give him drink.' We should pray to the Lord that he would turn those that be out of his way, into the right way."

Under Sher. You know we must be all subject to government, every congregation must not have a ruler, their meetings are prohibited by good authority, and because they will not be obedient to good government.

Gibbs. "I do not say, that every congregation must have a ruler, and I hope I speak the words of sobriety; I hope you will put a charitable construction upon what I say. As to the magistrates, I have a word or two."

Under Sher. Speak well of them.

Gibbs. "Be not afraid, I will not speak any evil of them; magistracy is an ordinance of God, and the end of magistracy is for the punishment of evil doers, and the praise of them that do well; and for this purpose, I do desire that the Lord would give to the supreme magistrate here on earth, wisdom and understanding, a wise council, a council fearing God, and hating covetousness, that they may study to exalt the throne of the king in righteousness and truth; O that we may all praise the Lord for deliverance out of condemnation; and I say it is the duty of all the subjects of the king's majesty, in all his kingdoms and dominions, to live peaceably, and to pray for the king's majesty: Prayers and intercessions ought to be made for all men, especially for kings and governors, for this very end and purpose, that thereby we may live in all quietness, godliness, honesty and justice; and to this very end the Lord bless our magistracy, give them counsel and wisdom, that they may love them that love the Lord, and hate them that hate the Lord."

After Gibbs had done speaking, then Stubbs began, who went over all the particulars of his trial at large, to which for brevity's sake we refer you. After which he said as follows:

"Friends and Countrymen,

"It is true, and I must confess my sin in the presence of God (and did ask mercy of the king) that I was in the company when I did hear wicked and treasonable words spoken; and I being ignorant, and not knowing the law, did not discover what I did hear.—As to my judgment, truly I desire to own that the scriptures own; I shall speak of that place in the Hebrews, which is the command of Christ, I desire the churches and the people every one to live the life of faith, and love one another; I am confident it would be a means of abundance of comfort here in the nation; there is a kind of heart burning and rising one against another, you are so and so, throw dirt one against the other ; it is our and your duty, still to be studying to live in love, and bear one with another, not to be angry, destroy, and fight one with another : O that we might live that life of love that God has commanded, then we may expect the presence of God to be with us ; surely God hath a great judgment against his own people, for not loving one another."

Phillips. " Mr. Sheriff, I have only one word to speak before I go to my prayers ; that is, Here I see some gentlemen present that are in the capacity that I was in as a soldier ; I say, be faithful to your trust, and beg of God that you may stand fast, and not dishonour God, nor be disobedient to the king ; when the Fifth Monarchy men were up, I was free and willing to lay down my life for the interest of the nation, and did venture it as much as any young man in London ; therefore good friends, have a care : I am now brought to suffer ; it is true, I was guilty of concealing it ; I desire your prayers, that now as we are going to the state of eternity from whence there is no redemption, I humbly beseech you, as christians and friends, that you would seek earnestly to God, that now he may receive our souls into everlasting rest and happiness, which he has been pleased to bestow on them that love him and fear him ; and the Lord knows my heart, I speak it in his presence, that had the king been pleased to shew mercy to me, I should have been a faithful and true subject to him all my days ; but seeing it is the righteous hand of God, that now I am come to this untimely death, I desire you to lift up your hearts and souls to God with me, that when my soul shall leave this body, that the Lord Jesus Christ may with his everlasting arms receive me to glory : There is no redemption after death, we shall either go to eternal woe, or eternal happiness : therefore good friends, I desire you to look up to God, that when my soul departs, it may be received to glory."

Then they went to their prayers : which being ended, their caps were severally pulled over their faces ; and aftersome private ejaculations, the executioner caused the cart to be drawn away ; and after they had hanged awhile they were severally beheaded and quartered according to their sentence, and their heads and quarters conveyed in a basket to Newgate, to be disposed of at the king's pleasure. Their several quarters were buried on Saturday night, December 27. Their heads were set up on several poles, two on the one Tower-hill, and two on the other, as near the Tower as might be.

Ludlow's account of this affair, is as follows : " In the mean time, the English court knowing themselves to be fallen under the hatred and contempt of the people for their cruelty, immorality and corruption, aggravated by the late sale of Dunkirk, resolved by the contrivance of a plot to disarm their enemies, and provide for their present safety. To this end, by the means of major-general Brown and others, money was advanced and arms put into the hands of some persons, among whom one Bradley, who had formerly belonged to Cromwell, was the principal, that by giving small sums to indigent officers of the late army, and by shewing the arms they had ready, they might engage them and others in this pretended design. An account of this plot was printed and published, affirming, That divers thousands of ill-affected persons were ready, under my command, to seize the Tower and the city of London ; then to march directly to Whitehall, in order to kill the king and Monk, with a resolution to give no quarter to any that adhered to them ; and after that to declare for a commonwealth. By this means one Baker, who had been of the guard to Cromwell, and since the disbanding of the army, had been reduced to grind knives for a poor living, having received half a crown from Bradley, and promised his assistance when there should be occasion, was executed with some others for this conspiracy. However, this served the court for a pretence to seize five or six hundred persons ; to disarm all those they suspected ; to require those they had taken to give bonds of 200*l.* each, not to take up arms against the king, and to increase the standing guards. They were not ashamed also to give out, that their messengers had been so near to seize my person, that they had taken my cloak and slippers, and committed two gentlemen to the Tower for accompanying me, as they said, to the sea-side, in order to my escape ; though at the same time they knew so well where I was, that they had employed instruments to procure me to be assassinated, which was discovered to a merchant of Lausanna by a person of quality living in these parts," [Ludlow was in Switzerland,] " who had refused 10,000 crowns offered to him on the part of the duchess of Anjou, (Orleans is intended) sister to his gracious majesty, if he would undertake that province."

The General farther adds, " The earl of Antrim, an Irish Papist, and one who had been concerned among the first in the rebellion of that country, having been seized at London, as I mentioned before, and afterwards sent prisoner to Ireland, was ordered, by a letter under the king's hand and seal, to be cleared and set at liberty, charging the guilt of that rebellion upon his father, and affirming in the said letter, ' That the earl of Antrim had not done any thing, without warrant and authority from the king his father ; ' though it was well known, that he had his head and hands deeply and early engaged in that bloody work. Thus the mask was openly taken off, in confidence, that a people deprived of their leaders, spirited by the late executions, and awed by the authority of a complying House of Commons, would not be able to shew their resentment."

There is reason enough to believe, that the Court very much exaggerated the transactions out of which arose the proceedings against these people, as well as those against James, Venner and others: See John James's Case, sup. p. 67, and the note to p. 104. But the historians who are most vehement in their animosity against Charles the Second and his ministers at this time, are scarcely satisfied with imputing to the Court the charge of exaggeration. Mrs. Macaulay's short account of this sham conspiracy, as she calls it, and of the proceedings against Tonge and the rest, is a master-piece of unfairness. For years after the Restoration there must have been among many classes much disaffection towards the government, and at court the deepest dread of the consequences of such disaffection, and a most anxious wish to suppress every indication of commotion which might have furnished a rallying point to all the disaffected. Burnet and Hume both mention the tumult of Venner and the Millenarians. Of the plot of November and December, 1661, Burnet says, "When the Act of Uniformity was brought into the House, many did apprehend that so severe an act might have ill effects, and began to abate of their first heat: Upon which reports were spread, and much aggravated as they were reported to the House of Commons, of the plots of the Presbyterians in several counties. Many were taken up on those reports: But none were ever tried for them. So, the thing being let fall, it has been given out since, that these were forged by the direction of some hot spirits, who might think such arts were necessary to give an alarm, and by rendering the party odious to carry so severe an act against them. The lord Clarendon himself was charged as having directed this piece of artifice: but I could never see any ground for fastening it on him: though there were great appearances of foul dealing among some of the fiercer sort." But he is silent as to this of 1662: and Hume is silent as to both.

213. The Trial of MARY MODERS alias STEDMAN, styled the German Princess, at the Old Bailey, for Bigamy: 15 CHARLES II. A. D. 1663.

THE Court being sat, a Bill of Indictment was drawn up against Mary Moders, alias Stedman, for having two husbands now alive, viz. Tho. Stedman and John Carleton. The Grand Jury found the Bill, and was to the effect following, viz.

"That she the said Mary Moders late of London Spinster, otherwise Mary Stedman, the wife of Tho. Stedman, late of the City of Canterbury in the county of Kent, Shoemaker, May 12, in the reign of his now majesty the sixth, at the Parish of St. Mildred's in the City of Canterbury, in the county aforesaid, did take to husband the aforesaid Thomas Stedman, and him the said Thomas Stedman then and there had to husband. And that she the said Mary Moders, alias Stedman, April 21, in the 15th year of his said majesty's reign, at London, in the Parish of Great St. Bartholomew's, in the ward of Farringdon without, feloniously did take to husband one John Carleton, and to him was married, the said Tho. Stedman her former husband being then alive, and in full life: against the form of the statute in that case provided, and against the peace of our said sovereign lord the king, his crown and dignity, &c."

Afterwards the said Mary Moders, alias Stedman, was called to the Bar; and appearing, was commanded to hold up her hand: which she accordingly did, and her Indictment was read to her as followeth.

Clerk of the Peace. Mary Moders, alias Stedman, thou standest indicted in London by the name of Mary Moders late of London, spinster, otherwise Mary Stedman, the wife of, &c. [And here the Indictment was read, as above] How sayest thou, art thou Guilty of Felony whereof thou standest indicted, or Not Guilty?

Mary Moders. Not Guilty, my Lord.

Cl. of the Peace. How wilt thou be try'd?

Prisoner. By God and the Country.

Cl. of the Peace. God send thee a good deliverance.

And afterwards she being set to the bar in order to her trial, she prayed time till the morrow for her trial: which was granted, and all persons concerned were ordered to attend them at nine of the clock in the forenoon. The Reader is desired to take notice of the following passage:

After she was arraigned, and going back to gaol, her husband the young Lord told her, he must now bid her adieu for ever. To which she replied,

"Nay, my Lord, 'tis not amiss,

"Before we part, to have a Kiss,"

And so saluted him, and said, 'What a quarrel and noise here's of a cheat! You cheated me, and I you: you told me you were a Lord and I told you I was a Princess; and I think 'I fitted you.' And so saluting each other they parted.

June 4, 1663.

The Court was sat; Proclamation was made.

Cl. of the Peace. O Yes! all manner of persons that have any thing more to do, &c. Set Mary Moders to the Bar: where she accordingly stood.

Cl. of the Peace. Mary Moders, alias Stedman, hold up thy hand: [which she did.] Those men that you shall hear called, and personally appear, are to pass between our sovereign lord the king and you for your life: if you will challenge them, or any of them, you must do it; when they come to the book to be sworn, before they are sworn. And then were called, William Rutland, Arthur Vigers, Arthur Capel, Tho. Smith, Fran. Chaplain, Robert Harvey, Simon Driver, Robert Kirkham, Hugh Masson, Tho. Westley, Richard Clutterbuck, Rondolph Tooke. And she challenged none; but they were severally sworn.

Cl. of the Peace. Crier, make proclamation: O Yes! if any one can inform my lords the king's justices, the king's serjeant, or the king's attorney, before this inquest be taken between our sovereign lord the king, and the Prisoner at the Bar, let them come forth, and they shall be heard, for now the Prisoner stands at the Bar upon her deliverance: and all others that are bound by recognizance to give evidence against the Prisoner at the Bar, come forth and give evidence, or else you will forfeit your recognizance.

The Witnesses being called several times, and not appearing, young Carleton came into the court in a rich garb trimmed with scarlet ribbands, and prayed that in respect his father and the rest of the witnesses were not all ready, the trial might be deferred for half an hour; and he going back, and passing the Prisoner his Princess, who stood there in a black velvet wastcoat, dressed in her hair, trimmed also with scarlet ribbands, she, (veiling her face with her fan) laughed at him, to the great observation of the court: and so the young Lord left the court (by advice of his friends) and betook himself to an adjoining house, where he stood the whole trial.

After some stay the witnesses came into the Court, and the Prisoner was set to the Bar, and silence being commanded, the Indictment was again read.

Cl. of the Peace. Upon this Indictment she hath pleaded Not Guilty, and for her trial hath put herself upon God and the country; which country you are. Your charge is to inquire whether she is Guilty of the said Felony, or Not Guilty: if you find her Guilty, you shall enquire what goods and chattels she had at the time of the felony committed, or at any time sithence: if you find her Not Guilty, you shall enquire whether she did flee for it; if you find that she fled for it, you shall enquire of her goods, &c. as if she had been Guilty: if you find she be Not Guilty, nor that she did flee for it, say so, and no more, and hear your evidence.

Several Witnesses were then sworn:

James Knot. My lord, and gentlemen of the jury, I gave this woman in marriage to one Thomas Stedman, which is now alive in Dover, and I saw him last week.

Court. Where was she married?

Knot. In Canterbury.

Court. Where there?

Knot. In St. Mildred's, by one parson Man, who is now dead.

Court. How long since were they married?

Knot. About nine years ago.

Court. Did they live together afterwards?

Knot. Yes, about four years, and had two children.

Court. You gave her in marriage, but did he minister give her to her husband then?

Knot. Yes, and they lived together.

Jury. Friend, did you give this very woman?

Knot. Yes.

Court. What company was there?

Knot. There was the married couple, her sister, myself, the parson, and the sexton.

Court. Where is that sexton?

Knot. I know not, my lord.

Court. You are sure they were married in the church, and this the woman?

Knot. Yes, I am sure of it.

Court. How long ago?

Knot. About nine years ago.

Court. Did you know this woman before the marriage, and how long?

Knot. Yes, I knew her a long time, I was an apprentice seven years near her mother's house in Canterbury.

Court. Then she is no foreign princess? Of what parentage was she?

Knot. I did not know her own father, [and in that he might be believed] but her father-in-law was a musician there.

Court. You saw her married: What words were used at her marriage, and in what manner?

Knot. They were married according to the order of the land, a little before the act came forth touching marriages by justices of the peace.

Court. Was it by the form of Common Prayer, any thing read of that form?

Knot. I did not take notice of that, I was but a young man, and was desired to go along with them.

William Clerk being sworn, said, My lord, I was last week in Dover, in company with this James Knot and Thomas Stedman; and he the said Stedman did own that he did marry one Mary Moders, a daughter of one in Canterbury, and that Knot gave her, and that he had two children by her, and declared his willingness to come up to give evidence against her, but wanted money for his journey: And I have understood that a person here in Court was of a jury at Canterbury, at a trial between Day and Mary Stedman at the bar, for having two husbands.

Court. Was she cleared?

Clerk. I cannot tell.

Young Carleton's father sworn. My lord, I was at Dover the last week, on Wednesday; I saw the husband of this woman, and the man acknowledge himself to be so, and did say that James Knot was the man that gave her in marriage to him.

Court. Where is this man her husband? Hearsays must condemn no man: What do you know of your own knowledge?

Carleton the Elder. I know the man is alive.

Court. Do you know he was married to her?

Carleton. Not I, my lord.

Sarah Williams. My lord, this woman was bound for Barbadoes, to go along with my husband, and she desired to lodge at our house for some time, and did so; and when the ship was ready to go, she went into Kent to receive her means, and said she would meet the ship in the Downs; and missing the ship, took boat and went to the ship. After several days remaining there, there came her husband with an order, and fetched her ashore, and carried her to Dover-Castle.

Court. What was his name that had an order to bring her on shore again?

Sarah Williams. His name was Thomas Stedman.

Court. Have you any more to prove the first marriage?

Carleton the Elder. No, none but Knot; there was none but three, the minister dead, the sexton not to be found, and this Knot who hath given evidence.

Court. What became of the two children, Knot?

Knot. They both died.

Carleton the Elder. Stedman said in my hearing, that they had lived four years together, had two children by her, and both dead; five years ago last Easter since she left him.

Court. Mr. Carleton, what have you heard this woman say?

Carleton. My lord, she will confess nothing.

Court. Mr. Carleton, did you look in the Church-Register for the first marriage?

Carleton. I did look in the book, and he that is now clerk, was then sexton, [just now not to be found;] he told me, that marriages being then very numerous, preceding the act before-mentioned, the then clerk had neglected the registry of this marriage. If she intended this trade, she likewise knew how to make the clerk mistake registering the marriage.

Young Carleton's brother sworn; who said, My Lord, and Gentlemen of the Jury, I was present at the marriage of my brother with this gentlewoman, which was on or about April 21, 1663. They were married at Great St. Bartholomew's, by one Mr. Smith, a minister here in Court, by license.

Mr. Smith the Parson sworn. My lord, all that I can say, is this; That Mr. Carleton the younger told me of such a business, and desired me to marry them: They came to church, and I did marry them by the book of Common Prayer.

Court. Mr. Smith, are you sure that is the woman?

Parson. Yes, my lord, it is; I believe she will not deny it.

Prisoner. Yes, my lord, I confess I am the woman.

Court. Have you any more witnesses?

Carleton. We can get no more but Knot to prove the first marriage, the last is clear.

Recorder Howel. Where is Knot? Remember yourself what you said before. You say, you know that woman at the bar, that you had known her a great while, that she was born near you in Canterbury, that you were present at her marriage, that parson Man married them, that none were present but yourself, the married couple, parson, sexton, and her sister.

Knot. Some others came into the church, but none that I knew; I am sure none went with her, but those I named.

Court. Who gave her in marriage?

Knot. I did.

Court. How came you to do it?

Knot. I was Stedman's shopmate, and he desired me to go along with him.

Court. Were her parents then living, or no?

Knot. Her mother was.

Jury. How old are you?

Knot. Two or three and thirty years.

Jury. How long ago was this marriage?

Knot. About nine years since.

Court. Then he was 23, and might do it: What is your trade of life?

Knot. I am a cordwainer, otherwise a shoemaker; Stedman was so too; we wrought both together.

Jury. We desire to know whether she had a father and mother then living?

Knot. She had a father-in-law.

Court. Did you know her mother?

Knot. Yes.

Court. How long before that marriage did her own father die?

Knot. I did not know him. [He said so before indeed.]

Court. What age was she when married?

Knot. I suppose about 19 or 20.

Prisoner. May it please your honours, and Gentlemen of the Jury, you have heard the several witnesses, and I think this whole country cannot but plainly see the malice of my husband's father against me; how he causelessly hunts after my life. When his son my husband, came and addressed himself to me, pretending himself a person of honour, and upon first sight pressed me to marriage; I told him, Sir, (said I) I am a stranger, have no acquaintance here, and desire you to desist your suit. I could not speak my mind, but he (having borrowed some threadbare compliments) replied, Madam, your seeming virtues, your amiable person, and noble deportment, render you so excellent, that were I in the least interested in you, I cannot doubt of happiness: and so with many words to the like purpose, courted me. I told him, and indeed could not much wonder, that at so small a glance he could be so presumptuous with a stranger, to hint this to me: but all I could say, would not beat him off. And presently afterwards he having intercepted my letter, by which he understood how my affairs stood, and how considerable my means were, he still urged me to marry him: And immediately by the contrivance of his friends, gaping at my fortune, I was hurried to church to be married, which the parson at first did without license, to secure me to my husband, and some time after had a license.—And my husband's father afterwards considering I had a considerable fortune, pressed me, that in respect I had no relations here, and because, says he, we are mortal, you would do well to make over your estate to my son your husband; it will be much for your honour, satisfaction of the world, and for which you will be chronicled for a rare woman. And perceiving he had not baited his hook sufficient (with some fair pretences,) to catch me then, he and his son, who were both willing to make up some of their former losses in circumventing me of what I had, they robbed me of my jewels, and clothes of great value; and afterwards pretended they were counterfeit jewels, and declared that I had formerly been married to one at Canterbury, which place I know not; and this grounded on a letter (of their own framing) sent from Dover, with a description of me; that I was a young fat woman, full-breasted; that I spoke several languages, and therefore they imagined me the person: and so violently carried me from my lodging before a Justice of Peace, only to affright me, that I might make my estate over to them. The Justice having heard their several allegations, could not commit me, unless they would be bound to prosecute me; which my husband being unwilling to, the Justice demanded of his father whether he would prosecute me, saying, they must not make a fool of him; and so after some whisperings, the father and his son were both bound to prosecute, and thereupon I was committed to prison. And since that, these people have been up and down the country, and finding none there that could justify any thing of this matter, they get here an unknown fellow, unless in a prison, and from thence borrowed, you cannot but all judge, to swear against me. My lord, were there any such marriage as this fellow pretends, methinks there might be a certificate from the minister or place; certainly if married, it must be registered: but there is no registry of it, and so can be no certificate, no minister nor clerk to be found. And if I should own a marriage, then you see that great witness cannot tell you whether I was lawfully married, or how; but it is enough for him (if such a paltry fellow may be believed) to say, I was married. I was never yet married to any but John Carleton, the late pretended lord: but these persons have sought all ways to take away my life, bring persons to swear against me, one hired with 5*l.* and another old fellow persuaded to own me for his wife; who came to the prison, and seeing another woman, owned her, and afterwards myself, and indeed any body. If such an old inconsiderable fellow had heretofore wooed me, it must have been for want of discretion, as Carleton did for want of money; but I know of no such thing. Several scandals have been laid upon me, but no mortal flesh can truly touch the least hair of my head for any such like offence; they have framed this of themselves. My lord, I am a stranger and a foreigner; and being informed there is matter of law in this trial for my life, my innocence shall be my counsellor, and your lordships my judges, to whom I wholly refer my cause. Since I have been in prison, several from Canterbury have been to see me, pretending themselves (if I were the person as was related) to be my school-mates; and when they came to me, the keeper can justify, they all declared they did not know me.

Court. Knot, you said she lived near you at Canterbury; what woman or man there, have you to prove she lived there? Have you none in that whole city, neither for love of justice nor right, will come to say she lived there?

Knot. I believe I could fetch one.

Court. Well said! are they to fetch still?

Prisoner. My lord, I desire some witnesses may be heard in my behalf.

Elizabeth Collier examined. My lord, my husband being a prisoner in the Gate-House, I came there to see my husband, and did work there on days; and there came in an old man, his name was Billing, he said he had a wife there: says Mr. Baley, Go in and find her out: and he said I was his wife, turned my hood, and put on his spectacles, looks upon me, and said I was the same woman his wife; and afterwards said I was not, and so to others: I can say no more.

Jane Finch examined. My Lord, there came a man and woman one night, and knocked at my door; I come down, they asked to speak with one Jane Finch. I am the person, said I. We understand, said they, you know Mrs. Carleton now in prison. Not I, said I, I only went to see her there. Said they, be not scrupulous; if you will go and justify any thing against her, we will give you 5*l.*

Court. Who are those two?

Finch. I do not know them, my Lord.

Mr. Baley examined. My Lord, there has been at least 500 people have viewed her, several from Canterbury, 40 at least that said they lived there; and when they went up to her, she hid not her face at all, but not one of them knew her.

Court. What country-woman are you?

Prisoner. I was born in Cologn in Germany.

Court. Mr. Carleton, how came you to understand she was married formerly?

Carleton Elder. I received a letter from the Recorder of Canterbury to that purpose.

Prisoner. They that can offer 5*l.* to swear against me, can also frame a letter against me: they say I was 19 years of age about nine years ago, and am now but 21.

Court. Mr. Carleton, you heard what Knot said; he said she lived near him four years a wife, why did you not get somebody else to testify this?

Carleton. Here was one Davis that was at her father's house and spoke with him—

Court. Where is he?

Carleton. I know not; he was here.

Court. You were telling the Court of a former Indictment against her, what was that for?

Carleton. She was indicted for having two husbands, Stedman of Canterbury her first husband, and Day of Dover, Chirurgeon, her second husband. The indictment was traversed the year before his majesty came to England, she was found Not Guilty.

Court. Who was at that trial?

Carleton. One here in Court was of the Jury. But that party said there was such a trial, but knows not that this is the woman.

Judge Howell. Gentlemen of the Jury, you see this Indictment is against Mary Moders, otherwise Stedman, and it is for having two husbands, both at one time alive; the first Stedman, afterwards married to Carleton, her former husband being alive. You have heard the proof of the first marriage, and the proof doth depend upon one witness, that is Knot; and he indeed doth say, he was at the marriage, gave her away; and he names one man, the parson that married her, that he is dead; none present there but the married couple that must needs be there, the parson, this witness, her sister, and the sexton; that he knows not what is become of the sexton. All the evidence given on that side, to prove her guilty of this Indictment, depends upon his single testimony. It is true he says she was married at Canterbury, but the particulars, or manner of the marriage, he doth not so well remember, whether by the book of Common Prayer, or otherwise; but they lived together four years, had two children. If she were born there, married there, had two children there, and lived there so long, it were easy to have brought somebody to prove this: that is all that is material for the first marriage.—For the second, there is little proof necessary; she confesses herself married to Carleton, and owns him; the question is, whether she was married to Stedman or not?—You have heard what defence she hath made for herself, some witnesses on her behalf: if you believe that Knot, the single witness, speaks the truth so far forth to satisfy your conscience that that was a marriage, she is Guilty. You see what the circumstances are, it is penal; if Guilty, she must die; a woman hath no clergy,* she is to die by the law, if Guilty.

* By the temporary stat. 3 & 4 William and Mary, c. 9. (An Act to take away Clergy from some offenders, and to bring others to punishment,) it was enacted, "That in cases where a man, being convicted of felony, might demand the benefit of his Clergy, a woman convicted for such like offence, and praying the benefit of that statute, should not have judgment of death given against her upon such conviction, or execution awarded upon any outlawry for such offence, but should suffer the same punishment as a man who hath the benefit of his Clergy in the like case should suffer." This statute was in the next session of parliament, continued by statute 4 and 5 William and Mary

You heard she was indicted at Dover for having two husbands, Stedman the first, and Day the second. There, it seems, by that which they have said, she was acquitted; none can say this was the woman: That there was a trial, may be believed; but whether this the woman tried or acquitted, doth not appear. One here, that was of that Jury says there was a trial, but knows not that this is the woman. So that upon the whole, it is left to you to consider of the evidence you have heard, and so to give your verdict.

The Jury went forth, and after some short consultation returned to their places. Their names were called, and all answered.

Cl. of the Peace. Are you all agreed of your verdict?

Jury. Yes.

Clerk. Who shall say for you?

Jury. The foreman.

c. 24, by which, after reciting that some doubt had arisen upon the former statute, whether a woman should have the benefit thereof more than once, it is also declared and enacted, "That if any woman hath been, or at any time hereafter shall be convicted of any other felony, for which a man might have the benefit of clergy, and upon her prayer hath once had, or hereafter shall once have, the benefit of the said statute, and shall be again convicted of any other felony, for which a man might have the benefit of his clergy, such woman shall be, and is hereby totally excluded from having any benefit or advantage of the said statute, but shall suffer pains of death in such and the same manner as if the said Statute had not been made." And by 6 and 7 W. 3. c. 14. these enactments are rendered perpetual.

As to how a peeress convicted of a clergyable felony, shall be dealt with, See the Case of the duchess of Kingston, 16 Geo. 3d, A. D. 1776, infra, and the Speech of the Lord Chief Barou on delivering the opinion of the Judges therein. Mr. Barrington (in a Note to his Observations, 1st Edition, on Statutum Gloucestræ 6 Ed. 1.) accuses the Common Law of a want of humanity in excluding women from the benefit of clergy. The benefit of clergy seems to have very little relation, either to humanity or to the Common Law. It was a scandalous privilege extorted by the power of the Popish Clergy in favour of criminals of their own order, to which order women could never be admitted. It may be conjectured, that some intimation to this effect was made to Mr. Barrington; for in subsequent editions of his book, he has added somewhat to his note: however, what he says amounts in fact only to an assertion of the well known truth, that the privilege should never have been granted. It appears by 2 Hale's Hist. P. C. cap. 51, that anciently nuns professed, were admitted to the privilege of clergy. But see 11 Co. Rep. 29 b. For more concerning benefit of clergy, see the cases of Cavenagh and others, and of Lord Warwick, infra.

Clerk. Mary Moders alias Stedman, hold up thy hand: look upon her, Gentlemen; what say you, is she Guilty of the felony whereof she stands indicted, or Not Guilty?

Foreman. Not Guilty.

[And thereupon a great number of people being in and about the court, hissed and clapped their hands.]

Clerk. Did she fly for it?

Foreman. Not that we know.

Afterwards she desired, that her jewels and clothes taken from her, might be restored to her. The Court acquainted her, that they were her husband's, and that if any detained them, from her, he might have his remedy at law: she charging old Mr. Carleton with them he declared they were already in the custody of his son her husband.

214. Proceedings, in the House of Commons, respecting a Message, alleged to have been carried by the Earl of Bristol to the King from Sir RICHARD TEMPLE, undertaking that the King's Revenue should be settled: 15 CHARLES II. A. D. 1663. [Commons' Journals. 4 Cobbett's Parl. Hist. 269.]

June 13, 1663.

UPON information given to the Commons, by Mr. Coventry, That his majesty had commanded him to impart to the House that a Message was delivered to his majesty by a person of quality, from sir Richard Temple, to the effect following: viz. "That sir Richard was sorry his majesty was offended with him that he could not go along with them that had undertaken his business in the House of Commons: but, if his majesty would take his advice, and intrust him and his friends, he would undertake his business should be effected, and Revenue settled, better than he could desire; if the courtiers did not hinder it:" It was ordered, That a Committee be appointed to examine the said matter, and report it to the House.

June 20. It was resolved, "That the king be humbly desired, that he would be graciously pleased to name the person that did deliver the Message to his majesty from sir Richard Temple: and that his majesty's two principal secretaries of state, Mr. Treasurer, and sir William Compton, do attend his majesty, and acquaint him with the desires of this House."

June 26. Mr. Secretary Morrice acquainted the House, That he had received command from his Majesty to declare to the House, That the earl of Bristol was the person that did deliver the Message from sir Richard Temple to his majesty. Upon which it was resolved, That a copy of the first Message sent by his majesty, against sir Richard Temple, be sent to the earl of Bristol: and he be made acquainted,

* Although these Proceedings are short and not very satisfactory, they are interesting; not only from the nature of the alledged offence, but also from the earl of Bristol's share in them; who, in less than a fortnight after they were concluded, brought forward the Articles of High Treason against the earl of Clarendon, which form the basis of the next Case: with that Case the present, it will be seen, is connected.

That the king hath sent word to this House, That he brought the Message to him, from sir Richard; and his Answer desired, Whether sir Richard did desire him so to do: and that Mr. Vaughan and Mr. Garraway do attend the earl with this Message.

June 27. Mr. Vaughan reported, "That he and Mr. Garraway had attended the earl of Bristol; and had acquainted him with the Order of this House; and with the transcript of so much of his majesty's Message as did relate to the Message which he did receive from sir Richard Temple: and that his lordship did render his most humble and hearty thanks to this House, That, in such an important matter, and so much concerning his honour, they did signify their desires to him in so obliging a manner: but, in regard the thing was of so great consequence, partly relating to his majesty, and also concerning his own honour, and the reputation of a Member of this House, he could not intrust any other person to deliver his Answer, for fear of mistakes which might thereby happen; and because he might probably if present clear any matter which might further accrue: and, therefore, that he might give full satisfaction to so illustrious a representative of his country, he desired a day might be prefixed, when he might be admitted to give an account to the House, in person, concerning this matter: and that he would make his address to the Lords, that he might be permitted so to do." Upon this, it was resolved, That Wednesday next be appointed for the earl of Bristol personally to give in his Answer to the House.

July 1. The House having received information, that the earl of Bristol was at the door, and did pray admittance into the House, to give an account in person, of the matter concerning sir Richard Temple, his lordship was, by direction of the House, placed in a chair, set for him on purpose, on the left side of the House, within the bar: and Mr. Speaker did open unto him his majesty's Message, and the Votes and Proceedings of the House thereupon, concerning sir Richard Temple. This being done,

The Earl of Bristol rose and addressed the House as follows :

" Mr. Speaker ; were I to be wrought upon by the arts and menaces of my enemies, or by the alarms of my friends in my behalf, contrary to the firmness and assurance which a clean heart and a good conscience does always uphold in a man of honour, I should have appeared in this place with such fear and trembling, as could not chuse but disorder any man's reason and elocution : the niceness of the subject upon which I am brought hither, were enough to discompose one ; but over and above that, I am not ignorant what personal prejudices I am under, and how industriously they have been improved among you. But when I look round this illustrious assembly, and see three parts of it composed of men who wear, as I do, a sword by their sides, and who have drawn it so often for the king's service, gentlemen of birth, integrity, fortune, all apprehensions vanish from a man, who hath served and suffered for the king as I have done.

" Mr. Speaker, I know the time of this House, upon whose prudent deliberations the happiness of the king and kingdom depends, is too precious to have any part of it spent in vindication of me : but, since not only the reputation and innocence of one of your members depends upon what I shall say, but even his majesty's honour may in some sort be concerned in the right apprehension of it, I hope it will be thought no presumption in me to beg of you, as I do, in all humility, one quarter of an hour's patience and attention.

" Mr. Speaker, I am here exposed as the Bearer of a Message to his majesty from sir Richard Temple, which he hath thought worthy to be complained of to this House, and which sir Richard Temple affirms he never sent. Lay your hands upon your hearts, gentlemen, and say truly, does not your innate candour pity my condition, brought into a strait, in all appearance so inextricable ? For, on the one side, if I avow to have carried from sir Richard Temple the Message, which his majesty has been pleased to make so high and so unusual an expression of his being offended at, and which sir Richard Temple denies to have sent, how can men of honour forgive me so ungentlemanly a proceeding towards a person who hath trusted me, as a friend, to do him (as he thought) a good office with his majesty ?

" On the other side, Mr. Speaker, should I disavow the having delivered the Message from sir Richard Temple, which his majesty hath thought fit to affirm, that he received from him and by me, what subject can be strong enough not to sink for ever under the weight of such a contradiction to his sovereign ? I ask you again, gentlemen, does not the condition you see me brought into, by the arts of my enemies, move you at the same time to pity and indignation ?

" Mr. Speaker, when David was put to his choice of one of the three calamities, he made election of the plague. And why ? that he might fall into the hands of God, and not of men. In like manner, Mr. Speaker, if one of the two extremes, with which I am threatened, be, as it appears, unavoidable, let me fall into the hands of God's vice-gerent the king : the world will never pardon me an unworthy action ; his goodness, I am sure, would in time pardon a generous fault. But when you have heard me out, gentlemen, I am confident you will find, that I shall need neither the world's pardon nor the king's, but only yours. In the first place, Mr. Speaker, I am bound to clear sir Richard Temple, which I here do upon my honour, that he never sent by me a Message to the king, that had in it the least tincture of an undertaking of his ; which I conceive could be the only part that could give offence to his majesty, or be a ground for the complaint made against him.

" In the next place, if the king, who, the law says, can do no wrong, hath thought fit to affirm, that I brought him that undertaking Message from sir Richard Temple, it must needs be true, and I do with all submission avow whatever his majesty is pleased to affirm of me ; but, having discharged that duty towards my sovereign, I hope I may be allowed to lay the fault home upon myself, and to tell you, that my tongue, I know not by what distemper, delivered that which, I protest to God, was never in my thoughts ; I was so far from thinking to deliver such a Message from sir Richard Temple, that I did not think myself charged with any thing by way of Message. It is true, Mr. Speaker, that, being full of indignation at ill offices done him, I made a warm address to his majesty in sir Richard Temple's behalf, wherein I expressed his grief, that his majesty should be offended with him, and having joined thereunto some reasonings of his to justify his conduct, in relation to his majesty's service, very agreeable to my own sentiments, I pursued his expressions with such of my own, as (all circumstances considered) the most unattentive person, and the most biassed with passion against sir Richard Temple, might have easily understood it to be no undertaking of his, but only a warm discourse and confident undertaking of my own.

" Sir Richard Temple being thus cleared, without the least contradiction to his majesty, if to undertake for you, gentlemen, be a guilt, it is only I that stand guilty before you. But you are too noble, I am sure, and too just, to condemn me in your judgments, before you have heard the nature and circumstances of my undertaking ; which, with your leave, I shall declare to the full, taking the matter (as I must needs, to be rightly understood) from an higher original. Mr. Speaker, having had the honour heretofore of discharging, with approbation a place of so high trust, as that of Secretary of State to his majesty's father of blessed memory, and to himself : and since my quitting that place, being admitted so frequently to the happiness of his princely conversation, you cannot imagine, but that sometimes he vouchsafed to speak to me of business, especially of parliaments, where I have the honour at present to be a peer, and have heretofore been as much versed, as some of my contemporaries, in the proceedings of the honourable House of Commons. I confess, that, before this last assembling, he did it more than once, and the opinion I most constantly delivered concerning this House was, that never king was so happy in a House of Commons, as he was in you: a House composed of so many gentlemen of birth and fortune, eminent in their faithfulness to him, and such as could never be suspected of any sinister designs, or of any other dependence, but upon the crown, and upon the care of those that chose them, and such as in the last sessions had manifested their affections to him by such large aids and supplies; adding, that nothing could be more important to his service, than to make and preserve you still popular with those that sent you. To which end I took the liberty to tell him, that if the necessity of his affairs, (of which I, having no part in his council, was no good judge) could admit of it, he ought not in prudence to let you give him any money this sitting, but rather to oblige you wholly to apply yourselves to the making of such laws as might endear both him and you to the people; by which means, at another meeting, he would be master of the hearts and purses of his subjects. But in case his necessities should urge him to press you, before the rising, for a new Supply, that he ought by all means, to let it be accompanied, if not preceded, by some eminent acts for the Reformation of former abuses, and for the securing his subjects from the like for the future.

"I persisted, Mr. Speaker, in pressing, upon all occasions, this advice to his majesty, till within some few weeks after their meeting; when finding myself (I know not by what misfortune) fallen under some prejudice, I thought that a total forbearance from speaking to him of any business, would be the best way of my serving him. And I protest unto you, gentlemen, with all sincerity, that from that time, until that of his majesty's expressing to me some displeasure against sir Rd. Temple, I never once opened my lips to him of any public affair whatsoever: it is true, Mr. Speaker, that a ground being given me to enter again with his majesty, upon a subject which my heart was still full of, I laid hold on the occasion, and in pursuance of what I had said in behalf of sir Rd. Temple, told his majesty, perhaps with more freedom and fervour than did become me, that I found his courtiers gave him wrong measures, both of the temper of the House of Commons, and of the means to attain from them any new Supplies, whether by way of present, gift, or of such establishments in his revenues, as might indeed put him out of necessity; since there could be no reasonable hopes of obtaining from them any such assistance, but by a committance, if not a precedence of such Acts, as might be grateful and beneficial to his subjects, and secure them, that what shall be given hereafter should be better managed for his majesty's service, than those vast sums that had been formerly granted: that if his majesty, in his princely wisdom, should think fit to drive on his business upon solid grounds, and not upon the false and self-interested measures of some courtiers, he had a House of Commons composed of members so full of affection to his person, and zeal for his prosperity and glory, that not only sir Rd. Temple, but the most unprejudiced and wisest men of the kingdom, as well as myself, durst undertake for them. See here, gentlemen, the bold undertaking that such a House of Commons would never let him want such present Supplies, as the true necessity of his affairs should require, nor such an established Revenue, as is fit to support the greatness and honour of his crown. If this was a criminal undertaking, you have, before you, gentlemen, confitemur reum; but whilst I am endeavouring to clear sir Richard Temple, and to vindicate or arraign myself, according as you shall be pleased to understand it, by telling you what passed from me to his majesty, I must not omit to give him the honour due to him for the kingly Reply he made to me upon this occasion, which was, 'That he had a true sense of the merit of the House of Commons towards him, even far beyond what I had expressed, and this was the reason why, relying so entirely as he did, upon the affections of that whole body, he was, and ever should be offended at any proposition to carry on his business there by officious undertakings and cabals, either of his courtiers or others.' An expression fit to be written with the rays of the sun, that all the world may read it; an expression which cannot chuse but inflame the affections of all this noble assembly that hear me, and carry you to make good these happy impressions of you, which are so deeply stamp'd in his royal breast; such as I should think it a crime to doubt, but that all suspicions being now vanished of his majesty's owning the Supply desired, to any acts or contrivances of others, your own zeal for his service will, even in the proportion and timeliness of that, exceed the vain proposals of all pick-thank undertakers.

"Mr. Speaker, I should have here put a period to your trouble of hearing me, did I not think I might incur the imputation of much weakness and supineness in my own highest concerns, if, valuing, as I do, above all earthly concerns, the favour and the esteem of my country, of which you are the illustrious representatives; and knowing what industry has been used to blast me with you, I should not lay hold on this just occasion to remove from me some unjust prejudices under which I have laboured. And this, Mr. Speaker, I humbly beg leave to do in very few words. I appeal, gentlemen, to numbers of you, that hear me, who ther I have not been represented unto you for the giver of advice of a far different tenor from what you have heard upon this occasion ; whether I have not been painted out unto you for an inflamer of his majesty against his parliament ; for an enemy of the Church of England, and for a dangerous driver on of the Papistical interest. It is true, Mr. Speaker, I am a Catholic of the Church of Rome, but not of the Court of Rome ;* no Negotiator there of Cardinal's Caps for his majesty's subjects and domestics, a true Roman Catholic as to the other world, but a true Englishman as to this : such a one, as had we a king inclined to that profession (as on the contrary, we have one the most firm and constant to the Protestant Religion, that ever sat upon the throne) I would tell him as freely as the Duke of Sully, being a Protestant, told his grandfather Henry 4. That if he meant to be a king he must be a constant professor and maintainer of the Religion established in his dominions. Believe me, gentlemen, Roman Catholic as I am, there is no man amongst you all, more thoroughly persuaded than I am, that the true pillars, that can uphold this monarchy, must ever be the maintenance of the subjects just rights and liberties, and the careful preservation of that State Ecclesiastical, whereof his majesty is the supreme governor ; and I do clearly profess, that should the Pope himself invade that Ecclesiastical right of his, I should as readily draw my sword against him as against the late usurper.

" Mr. Speaker, one prejudice more I am under, which ought to have great weight indeed with this honourable House, if there were a real ground for it ; and that is, that the earl of Bristol is one of those, who by the vast Grants that he hath got of the king, hath, in part, contributed to the groans of the people, to find their king still in such necessity, after such unexampled charges laid upon the subjects for his Supplies. It is true, Mr. Speaker, that though I have neither offices to keep, nor offices to sell, his majesty's gifts to me have been great, in proportion to my merit, which is none : for in serving and suffering for him with faithfulness, I did but my duty, which carries a reward with itself, enough to raise a comfort to me, from the very ruin of my fortune. It is also true, I have had the satisfaction from his majesty, that he never refused me any thing I asked him for myself. But I hope I shall make it appear also, that I have not only been a very modest asker, but also a most careful one, to ask nothing considerable, but what carried advantage with it, as well to his majesty's interest as my own. I know well, Mr. Speaker, that, with so kind and so generous a nature as our king is, an ill proportion of bounty to merit, and consequently the largeness and kindness of his royal heart that way, may have contributed much to the present streights he is in. Happy is the nation that hath nothing to fear for the public, but from the virtues of their prince. It is your proper work, gentlemen, to reduce the effects of them to a right temperament, by your prudent inspection ; and may you begin it with all my concerns, which I most readily lay at your feet, humbly, begging of you to appoint a time, when I may display them all faithfully before you : in hopes that no man, who hath been a partaker of his majesty's bounty, will prove himself so unworthy of it, as not to follow the example.

" Mr. Speaker, If having thus poured out my soul before you, I have been so happy as to have begot in this honourable House a right persuasion of the sincerity of my heart, I expect and implore two gracious effects of it. The first that you will be pleased to grant me your pardon, if the same zeal for his majesty's service, and the good of my country, which made me presume (being no counsellor) to press upon his majesty my opinion in matters of such importance, has transported me also, at this time, in some sort, so as to become your adviser. You have heard, gentlemen, of the dumb man, whose tongue was set free by the imminent danger of his father's life ; wonder not then, gentlemen, that such a lover of his king and country as I am, having seen them, within these three years in a prospect of such glory and happiness, both at home and abroad, and finding to what a sad condition things are now reduced, (by what means it is more proper for you to enquire, and may Heaven bless your inspection ;) wonder not, I say, gentlemen, that a man so affected as I am, should, by some eruptions of heart, let you see, that periculum patriæ ought to have a more powerful effect upon a man of public soul, than periculum patris, and is capable, if I were a mute, to make me become a counsellor.

" The next is, Mr. Speaker, that if (as I said before,) I have been so happy in what I expressed, as to have raised in you some more favourable thoughts concerning me, you would vouchsafe me some demonstration of it, whereby I may no more be made, by my enemies, such a bugbear as I am : as if a gracious look of his majesty upon me, were enough to ruin all his affairs with you. I shall then continue the way I am in with comfort ; but if I be so unfortunate, as that there still remains in this incomparable representative of my country, any umbrage of danger to it by my access to his majesty ; as dear as the conversation of the amiablest prince that ever breathed is to me, I shall banish myself for ever from his sight into the obscurest part of his dominions, rather than continue upon me the jealousy of a person on whom his prosperity depends ; or if that be not enough, I shall once more try my fortune abroad, where, I trust, this sword, this head, and this heart shall make me live as heretofore, in spite of my enemies, with lustre to myself and some honour to my nation."

* " The earl of Bristol was a man of courage and learning, of a bold temper and a lively wit, but of no judgment nor steadiness. He was in the queen's interest during the war at Oxford. And he studied to drive things past the possibility of a treaty, or any reconciliation ; fancying that nothing would make the military men so sure to the king, as his being sure to them, and giving them hopes of sharing the confiscated estates among them ; whereas, he thought, all discourses of treaty made them feeble and fearful. When he went beyond sea he turned Papist. But it was after a way of his own : For he loved to magnify the difference between the church and the court of Rome. He was esteemed a very good speaker : But he was too copious, and too florid. He was set at the head of the popish party, and was a violent enemy of the earl of Clarendon." Burnet. See more concerning him in the next Case.

After the Earl had finished his Speech he withdrew ; the House then proceeded in the debate of the matter, and came to the following Resolutions :

215. Proceedings in Parliament against EDWARD Earl of CLARENDON,* Lord High Chancellor of England, for High Treason, and other High Crimes and Misdemeanors: 15 and 19 CHARLES II. A. D. 1663—1667.

[The following passages relating to lord Bristol, and to the conduct of lord Clarendon, and the Proceedings against him, are taken from an article published under the title of "The Life of King James the Second, written by himself," in the first volume of Macpher-

* "The lord Bristol resolved to offer Articles of Impeachment against the earl of Clarendon to the House of Lords, though it was plainly provided against by the statute against appeals in the reign of Henry 4. Yet both the duke of Buckingham, and the lord Bristol, the fathers of these two lords, had broken through that in the former reign. So the lord Bristol drew his impeachment, and carried it to the king, who took much pains on him in a soft and gentle manner to dissuade him from it. But he would not be wrought on. And he told the king plainly, that, if he forsook him, he would raise such disorders that all England should feel them, and the king himself should not be without a large share in them. The king, as the earl of Lauderdale told me, who said he had it from himself, said, he was so provoked at this, that he durst not trust himself in answering it, but went out of the room, and sent the lord Aubigny to soften him : But all was in vain. It is very probable, that the lord Bristol knew the secret of the king's religion, which both made him so bold, and the king so fearful. The next day he carried the charge to the House of Lords. It was of a very mixed nature : In one part he charged the lord Clarendon with raising jealousies, and spreading reports of the king's

"That this House is satisfied, that sir Richard Temple hath not broke any privilege of this House, in the matter in question concerning him. That this return be made from the House, to the Answer of the earl of Bristol : viz. That the earl of Bristol, in the account which he hath given this House, in the matter concerning sir Richard Temple, hath carried himself with all dutifulness towards his majesty ; hath cleared the member of this House ; and that the House is well satisfied with his respect to them."

His Lordship was again called in : and Mr. Speaker acquainted him with the return of the House.

Ordered, That such members of the House, as are of his majesty's privy-council, do acquaint his majesty with the said Vote : That sir Richard Temple have the leave of this House, to petition his majesty for his favour ; and to give him satisfaction, as to the other informations mentioned in his Majesty's Message.

son's Original Papers, &c. and there represented to have been extracted from the Memoirs of king James the Second, written in that prince's own hand :

"1660. The earl of Bristol had declared himself a Roman Catholic some months before the Restoration ; so not of the privy council ; but he was trusted with all the secrets as before. He did not continue long united with Clarendon and Ormond ; endeavouring to get more power, and engross more into his hands, than the Chancellor cared he should ; and that by by-ways. Besides, the earl of Southampton struck up with the Lord Chancellor, who never had a good opinion of Bristol.

"The Chancellor was faulty in not getting all the destructive laws in the long rebel parliament of Charles 1, repealed ; which, most being a papist : And yet in the other articles he charged him with correspondence with the court of Rome, in order to the making the lord Aubigny a cardinal, and several other things of a very strange nature. As soon as he put it in, he, it seems, either repented of it, or at least was prevailed with to abscond. He was ever after that looked on, as a man capable of the highest extravagancies possible. He made the matter worse by a letter that he wrote to the Lords, in which he expressed his fear of the danger the king was in by the Duke's having of guards. Proclamations went out for discovering him. But he kept out of the way till the storm was over." Burnet, were of opinion, might have been done, and such a revenue settled on the crown, as would have supported the monarchy, and not exposed it to the dangers it has since run. Whether out of oversight or fear, the monarchy would not need a parliament uncertain; or from fear of the king's bringing in the Roman Catholic religion. The duke apprehends the last. In all other things he supported the crown's authority to the height.

" 1661. The Chancellor and Southampton were careless of the king's safety. Hawley was a wiser statesman. They and the bishops, in the House of Lords, were great opposers of the king's design, according to the promise at Breda, of a toleration of dissenters, so limited as not to disturb the peace of the realm. So the king's word was broke. The earl of Bristol, though no privy counsellor, was as much in the secret of affairs as formerly. Bristol was of a haughty temper, yet contributed to the Chancellor's ruin. The Chancellor was very loyal and true to the interest of the crown; but did not repeal acts of Charles 1, detrimental to the crown and revenue.

" The king's friends quarrelled. Bristol set up for himself, and made his court to the duchess of Cleveland, then angry with the Chancellor's forbidding his wife to visit her. The king shewed Bristol much countenance; and he got the regiment of horse for the earl of Oxford, then a pretender to his daughter; since married to the earl of Sunderland; and had he not drove on too fast, he might have got more; and might, by the help of his she-friend, have ruined the Chancellor, as he designed. But the king knew him too well to put him at the head of his affairs. Being vexed, he accused the Chancellor in the House of Lords; and flew in the king's face, by making an indecent speech in the House; and then justified it to the king, in lord Aubigny's presence. He flew out into extravagant expressions, threatening his enemies, and the king should feel it. So that he should have been thrown out at the window, had not the king been too good. This, however, did his business with the king.

" 1662. The Chancellor brought a queen to England of his own chusing: yet this was the occasion of his ruin.

" 1663. The Chancellor brought sir H. Bennet, afterwards earl of Arlington, into the king's favour, who soon after turned against him. He meant to oppose by him, Falmouth. The Chancellor grew jealous of sir William Coventry, the duke's secretary and a man of great abilities, though once his favourite. So Coventry helped on the Chancellor's ruin. Buckingham joined him.

" The Chancellor continued chief minister; the earl of Falmouth in the highest favour, minding his master's, not his own concerns. He was killed at sea, and died not worth a farthing, though not expensive. He had served the old cavaliers. Arlington came back from Spain, and tried to get into favour, supported at first by the Chancellor and Bristol, against Falmouth; but after Falmouth's death, the Chancellor repented it. Sir William Coventry, the duke of York's secretary, and a very able man, was not well with the Chancellor; and he helped the Chancellor's fall. The duke of Buckingham was not of the king's privy council, but insinuated himself into his favour, by his agreeable converse. He was afterwards made privy counsellor and master of the horse. By his raileries, he set the king against the Chancellor. The patent for the Canary company was recalled; though they obliged the Canarians to take great quantities of English manufactures, in part-payment for wines; and to take reasonable rates, who would take nothing but ready money, when the company broke off and raised the price very much, to the damage of the nation.

" 1664. The Lord Chancellor alone against the Dutch war.

" 1665. The faction at court against the Chancellor, began to increase. The duchess of Cleveland, then promoting Buckingham and Arlington, railed against him. Sir William Coventry and all laboured to set the House of Commons against the Chancellor. They advised the king to break the Canary company, who took off every year 200,000*l.* of our woollen manufactures; and had the wines very cheap, being masters of the trade. When the company was broke, the Canarians made them pay twice as much for wines, and would take nothing but ready money. The reason was plain, the first ship which arrived there, not caring what she paid for loading, being sure of selling it as she pleased, at her return to England; the Canarians made the rest pay the same rate, which could not happen to a company. Bristol's attacks on the Chancellor in the House of Lords, miscarried. The king supporting the Chancellor, Bristol harangued the Commons without leave from the Lords.

" 1667. The disaffected party, now encouraged, grew more turbulent. The earl of Northumberland's factious discourse to the duke. The king consents to the Chancellor's removal. The earl of Bristol's insolent discourse to the king in 1664, about Clarendon. He was inexcusable for opposing the king's declaration, for liberty of conscience, in 1664, which had been solicited by Roberts, Ashley and others in parliament, to declare as at Breda; and it had been resolved in the Chancellor's own lodgings. The duchess of Cleveland was against the Chancellor; and the Canary company broke merely out of spite to him.

" The king at length ordered the duke of York to acquaint the Chancellor, that he was obliged, for the good of his affairs, to lay him aside. The Earl immediately sent him the seals: The parliament thanked the king for it, and for turning all Roman Catholics out of his service. Clarendon impeached. Sir William Coventry was active in it. His prudence and honesty in rejecting a proposal made by the Presbyterian party; who designed, thereby, a division between the king and the duke of York. He retires to France.

"The earl of Northumberland and Leicester, lord Hollis and another, met at Guildford. They made it no secret. Northumberland at St. James's, talked freely to the duke of York against the Chancellor, who was hated, and of the resolution to impeach him; but said, this was not all, the nation would not be satisfied unless the guards were disbanded, and other grievances redressed. He talked very seditiously, though the duke checked him. The earl told him, that he had said nothing but what he would repeat to the king the next day; as he did with insolence enough. The duke urged, in vain, the necessity of the guards, for the king's safety and national quiet; that the want of them had been fatal to the late king and his government. The seditious stuck to their point, and joined with the Chancellor's enemies; hoping that his impeachment would breed a quarrel between the king and the duke of York.

"The king took the seals from the Chancellor. He told the duke of York of the resolution; that it was not out of any dissatisfaction with the Chancellor, but the necessity of his affairs; and that it was better to do it of himself than let it be torn from him by the parliament. He ordered the duke to tell him, that he must send the seals; and to shew his regard for him, he would confirm the little private pension he usually received. The Chancellor sent the seals; and told the duke of York, that his enemies would not stop there, but proceed to the last degree to expose the king and crown, to accomplish his ruin. So it proved.

"The parliament met on the tenth of October. Sir T. Littleton moved thanks to the king, for his speech and for taking the great seal from Clarendon; and to consider the heads of the king's and the Lord Keeper's speeches. The clause about Clarendon would hardly have passed, had not the king ordered his servants to let it be known he desired it; and Clarendon charged his friends not to oppose it, being resolved to let none of his private concerns disturb the king's affairs. The same means were used in the House of Lords, when they were moved to join in the Address, else it had not passed there. When it came to a vote, the duke of York and several others withdrew, not to oppose the king, as they looked on it as an ill precedent for the crown.

"On the 26th of October, the Chancellor was accused, on public fame; and a committee was appointed to consider of proceedings and precedents. That very day, the duke of York, in discourse with the king, about the talk of Clarendon's advising him to govern by an army and lay aside parliaments; the king assured him, that he had never given him such advice. His enemies considered not public good, but private malice; and getting to the head of affairs, give the king and crown a fatal blow. The king soon found the effects. The duke of York was seized with the small-pox in the beginning of November; and before his recovery the heat of the prosecution was over, else he would have been charged with influencing the Lords not to imprison Clarendon. Buckingham and lord Berkeley were so malicious, as, in their common discourse, to insinuate that the king was in danger, by letting his brother have his own guards to wait on himself at Whitehall; none knowing what the duke might be prevailed on to do by the Chancellor and his duchess. Some Presbyterians sent to Clarendon, offering to stand by him, if he would stand by himself. He saw their malice; and the king apprehending heats in the House of Commons, sent to him to withdraw out of the realm privately. Clarendon, as the duke was recovering, sent him word of the message and his resolution to obey it. The Presbyterians were very angry at his dis-appointing them.

"Thus fell the earl of Clarendon; from whose fall one may date the beginning of all the misfortunes which happened since, and the decay of the authority of the crown; he generally supporting that prerogative, which his successors never minded. He was a private gentleman of a good family, bred in the law, had good sense, and very eloquent; always esteemed for his good parts. He was chosen by the late king a private manager for him in the House of Commons, which he performed with great dexterity and fidelity. He was entrusted at court with the most secret affairs; for his services, made Chancellor of the Exchequer; one of the council to the prince of Wales; relied on and went with him to France. He sent ambassador with Cottington, then Lord Treasurer, to Spain. He returned to the king at Paris, and was made his first minister. He had the management of the Restoration, with Monk and Sandwich. At the Restoration, he was in such favour with the king, that nobody durst oppose him. He carried all before him. He made his friend Southampton, Treasurer; and by the aid of the duke of Ormond and the bishops, was caressed by most. As to the crown, he let the court of wards and purveyance be parted with. But he did not get a good substantial revenue settled on the crown, though it might have been easily done in the first parliament which the king called. This was out of fear, that the crown should grow too great and the Roman Catholic religion be brought in, if the king was at his ease; the duke of Ormond and Daniel O'Neile having, in the king's journey to Spain, observed him inclined to it.

"Clarendon being removed, his enemies divided; each pretending to succeed in the ministry. Sir William Coventry, without whose help Buckingham and Arlington could not have carried on the plot, expected it, and was the only man fit for it. But the other two joining against him, though of the best capacity of any in the kingdom, got him out of all his employments; and then strove who should have most credit with the king, whose affairs suffered by their disagreement and insufficiency.

"After the Chancellor's removal, the ministers disagreed among themselves. Sir William Coventry was turned out of all his employments by Bucks and lord Arlington. They all joined to lessen the duke of York's interest with the king, lest he should get Clarendon recalled. When the duke recovered of the small-pox, he gave in the House of Lords, his reasons for voting against Clarendon's impeachment; because no proof was made of any of the crimes laid to his charge. The king was, on this account, colder to the duke. The malicious insinuations of his enemies were fruitless. The Chancellor's friends were removed."

I have said that the Life of King James the Second, in Macpherson's Original Papers, &c. is there represented to have been extracted from the Memoirs of King James the Second, written in that prince's own hand for it may possibly admit of question, whether Macpherson does or not assert this of it; though there cannot be a doubt that he intends his readers should believe it. He expresses himself with a generality which well illustrates the ancient maxim of the lawyers, 'dolus versatur in generali.'* In his 'Advertisement' he says,

* Mr. Macpherson appears to have had great skill in the use of ambiguous terms. He concludes his Advertisement prefixed to his Original Papers, &c. thus "The Originals are now in the hands of the bookseller." It is absolutely impossible to determine with certainty what originals he means. Mr. Laing, in his admirable Dissertation on the Gaelic Imposture of Macpherson (it is scarcely possible too highly to commend the sagacity, the candour, the diligence, the learning and the genuine eloquence exhibited in that Dissertation) with shrewdness and with truth observes, (4 Hist. of Scotland, &c. 493.) of the bard of Badenoch and his coadjutor, "When his impure hand are imposed on history, the misquotations and fictions detected in his Introduction to the History of Britain, and his cold malignity towards the most illustrious characters, should teach us to receive his Original Paper with extreme distrust, and we must regret that the State Papers of the Stuarts and of William, by some strange fatality, were reserved for the translator of Ossian and sir John Dalrymple."

"The extracts from the Life of King James the Second, were partly taken by the late Mr. Thomas Carte and partly by the editor, in a journey he made, for that purpose to France." In his Introduction he tells us that Mr. Carte having obtained an order for inspecting such papers as *lay open in the Scotch College at Paris, spent several months in that place, making extracts and collecting notes. In particular he made very large and accurate extracts from the Life of King James the Second, written in that prince's own hand. He then gives us to understand, that Carte's papers were placed in his hands, and adds, that "when he examined them with precision, he found that the extracts from the Life of King James the Second, threw a new and striking light on almost all the transactions of his brother's reign. This circumstance induced him to begin his history with the restoration of monarchy, and to satisfy himself, as well as to authenticate his materials to the public, he went to Paris to make still farther discoveries, and in particular to make fresh extracts from King James's Memoirs.

"During his stay in France, he not only had an opportunity to be satisfied concerning the faithfulness of Carte's extracts, but even to make many valuable additions of his own. The Memoirs left by king James in his own hand, consist rather of memorandums made for his own use, when the transactions happened, than a regular narration of events. He frequently lays down with precision, the reasons which weighed with himself in directing his conduct; and upon the whole, his papers form very important materials for the history of Britain, during his own times. In Carte's extracts, as well as in those of the editor, the language of king James is, in a great measure, preserved. That prince was not an elegant writer; and an abridgment must, in its nature, be still more stiff and dry than an original. Instead, therefore, of expecting entertaining reflections, and a well connected detail of transactions, the reader must content himself with an unadorned narrative of such facts as were the secret, and hitherto unknown, springs of the great events of the times.

"But if the Memoirs of king James cannot raise their author to the rank of a fine writer, they certainly do him credit as a man. There is an air of veracity in all the accounts given by that prince, that is much more valuable to an intelligent reader, than the choicest flowers of rhetoric and best turned periods. Indeed, the manner in which the papers, called his Memoirs, were written, precludes every suspicion of unfaithfulness on his side. His notes were generally made upon the spot; and always before there was any necessity to palliate the circumstances of the transactions related. Besides, he was not of a complexion to misrepresent. He affected to guide himself by principle in all his actions; and to deem the slightest deviation from truth a crime. In his opinions he is frequently wrong, but very seldom in any fact that fell within his own immediate knowledge."

Here we may observe that sometimes the appellation Life, and sometimes the appellation Memoirs, is employed to denote papers in king James's own writing, and as the two appellations are not uncommonly used in the same sense, it is natural to conclude that Macpherson used them both as synonymous terms, to denote one and the same collection of papers: yet it is not improbable, that he designedly used the two words on account of their applicability to two different collections. We learn from bishop Burnet (1 Hist. of his own Times, 168 fol. ed. of 1724) that James kept a constant journal of all that passed, of which he shewed the bishop a great deal. The papers from which Macpherson extracted, might, according to his account of them, be reasonably inferred to be this journal: "They consist rather of memorandums made for his own use, when the transactions happened, than a regular narration of events." "His notes were generally made upon the spot, and always before there was any necessity to palliate the circumstances of the transactions related." But the internal evidence very little agrees with this character. Let us select a few instances. King James writing a journal at the time, would not in 1661 speak of a woman under a title which she did not obtain till nine years afterwards, (see 1 Macph. Orig. Pap., 20): nor would he in 1662 mention that persons then taken up were confined till 1667, (see 1 Macph. Orig. Pap. 21): nor insert Bristol's attack on Clarendon (the supposed journalist's father-in-law) among the occurrences of 1665, when it is notorious, and proved by the Journals of the House of Lords, that it took place in 1663, (see 1 Macph. Orig. Pap. 35). For one of these anticipations, and of another which occurs in p. 24, Macpherson accounts, very unsatisfactorily, by gratuitously supposing those particular paragraphs to have been written out of the order in which he publishes them. This is sufficient presumptive evidence to prove that Macpherson's extracts were not made from an original journal, and that he must at the time have known this to be the fact. But the matter seems to be put out of all doubt, by the following interesting passage from lord Holland's Address to the Reader, prefixed to Mr. Fox's History of the early part of the Reign of James the Second:

"With respect to Carte's extract, I have no doubt but it is faithfully copied; but on 'this extract it is necessary to make an observation, which applies to all the rest, both of Carte's and Macpherson's, and which leads to the detection of an imposture of the latter, as impudent as Ossian itself. The extracts are evidently made, not from a journal, but from a narrative; and I have now ascertained beyond all doubt, that there were in the Scotch College two distinct manuscripts, one in James's own hand, consisting of papers of different sizes bound up together, the other a sort of historical narrative, compiled from the former. The narrative was said to have been revised and corrected, as to style, by Dryden* the poet, (meaning probably Charles Dryden, the great poet's son,) and it was not known in the college whether it was drawn up in James's life, or by the direction of his son, the Pretender. I doubt whether Carte ever saw the original journal; but I learn, from undoubted authority, that Macpherson never did, and yet to read his Preface, page 6 and 7, (which pray advert to,) one would have supposed, not only that he had inspected it accurately, but that all his extracts at least, if not Carte's also, were taken from it. Macpherson's impudence in attempting such an imposition, at a time when almost any man could have detected him, would have been in another man, incredible, if the internal evidence of the extracts themselves against him were not corroborated by the testimony of the principal persons of the College. And this leads me to a point of more importance to me. Principal Gordon thought, when I saw him at Paris, in October 1802, that all the papers were lost. I now hear from a well-informed person, that the most material, viz. those written in James's own hand-writing, were indeed lost, and in the way mentioned by Gordon, but that the Narrative, from which only Macpherson made his extracts, is still existing, and that Mr. Alexander Cameron, Blackfriars Wynd, Edinburgh, either has it himself, or knows where it is to be found.'

The above information was correct. There is strong presumptive evidence, that the manuscripts of king James the Second were destroyed; but the Narrative, as described, was then, and is now, in the hands of Dr. Cameron, Roman Catholic bishop in Edinburgh. It could not be in the possession of a person who is better qualified to judge of its merits, and on whose fidelity, should he be induced to print it, the public might more implicitly rely. I am indebted to his accu‘racy and friendship, for some additional information respecting the manner in which the manuscripts of the Scotch College were lost. As the facts are in themselves curious, I lay before the reader his succinct and interesting relation of them, contained in a letter to me, dated Edinburgh, March 2, 1808.

“Before lord Gower, the British ambassador, left Paris, in the beginning of the French Revolution, he wrote to principal Gordon, and offered to take charge of those valuable papers, (king James’s Manuscripts, &c.) and deposit them in some place of safety in Britain. I know not what answer was returned, but nothing was done. Not long thereafter, the Principal came to England, and the care of every thing devolved on Mr. A. Innes, the only British subject who remained in it. About the same time, Mr. Stapleton, then President of the English College of St. Omer, afterwards Bishop in England, went to Paris, previously to his retiring from France, and Mr. Innes, who had resolved not to abandon his post, consulted with him about the means of preserving the Manuscripts. Mr. Stapleton thought, if he had them at St. Omer, he could, with small risk, convey them to England. It was therefore resolved, that they should be carefully packed up, addressed to a Frenchman, a confidential friend of Mr. Stapleton, and remitted by some public carriage. Some other things were put up with the Manuscripts. The whole arrived without any accident, and was laid in a cellar. But the patriotism of the Frenchman becoming suspicious, perhaps on account of his connection with the English College, he was put in prison: and his wife apprehensive of the consequences of being found to have English Manuscripts, richly bound and ornamented with royal arms, in her house, cut off the boards, and destroyed them. The Manuscripts thus disfigured, and more easily huddled up in any sort of bundle, were secretly carried, with papers belonging to the Frenchman himself, to his country-house, and buried in the garden. They were not, however, permitted to remain long there; the lady’s fears increased, and the Manuscripts were taken up and reduced to ashes.

“This is the substance of the account given to Mr. Innes, and reported by him to me in June, 1802, in Paris. I desired it might be authenticated by a procès-verbal. A letter was therefore written to St. Omer, either by Mr. Innes, or by Mr. Cleghorn, a lay gentleman, who had resided in the English College of St. Omer, and was personally acquainted with the Frenchman, and happened to be at Paris at this time. The answer given to this letter was, that the good man, under the pressure of old age and other infirmities, was alarmed by

‘the proposal of a discussion and investigation, which revived in his memory past sufferings, and might, perhaps, lead to a renewal of them. Any further correspondence upon the subject seemed useless, especially as I instructed Mr. Innes to go to St. Omer, and clear up every doubt, in a formal and legal manner, that some authentic document might be handed down to posterity concerning those valuable Manuscripts. I did not foresee that war was to be kindled up anew, or that my friend Mr. Innes was to die so soon.’

“Mr. Cleghorn, whom I mentioned above, is at present at the Catholic seminary of Old-Hall Green, Puckeridge, Hertfordshire. He can probably name another gentleman who saw the Manuscripts at St. Omer, and saved some small things, (but unconnected with the Manuscripts,) which he carried away in his pocket, and has still in his possession.

“I need not trouble your lordship with my reflections upon this relation; but I ought not to omit that I was told, sometimes, that all the Manuscripts, as well as their boards, were consumed by fire in the cellar in which they had been deposited upon their arrival at St. Omer.’

“The gentleman alluded to in the latter part of the above letter, is Mr. Mostyn, from whom Mr. Butler of Lincoln’s Inn very kindly procured a statement of the particulars relating to this subject, in the year 1804, and transmitted it to Mr. Fox. It contains in substance, though with some additional circumstances, and slight variations, the same account as Mr. Cameron’s, up to the period of the writer’s leaving St. Omer, which was previous to the imprisonment of the Frenchman.*

“Mr. Fox, in a letter to Mr. Laing, remarks, that, ‘to know that a paper is lost, is next best to getting a sight of it, and in some instances nearly as good.’ So many rumours have been circulated, and so many misapprehensions have prevailed, respecting the contents and the fate of the Manuscripts formerly deposited in the Scotch College at Paris, that it is hoped the above account, the result of the historian’s researches, will not be deemed out of its place in a preface to a history of the times to which those Manuscripts related.”

Macpherson does not distinguish with sufficient precision which are his extracts and which Carte’s. He tells us that in Carte’s extracts, as well as his own, the language of king James is in a great measure preserved.

* “Mr. Mostyn’s letter to Mr. Butler was published in one of the Magazines, it would therefore be superfluous to reprint it. The name of the Frenchman was Mr. Charpentier, and his country-house was at St. Monnelin, near St. Omer.”

This is not enough. If it were designed that they should be received with the authority of original documents, not a word should have been altered; what Macpherson says seems to imply that both Carte and himself abridged, which puts an end to originality, and very much weakens authority. In the Life of king James the Second written by himself, parts of many adjoining 'extracts' as they are called, have an appearance of being two abridgements of the same matter.

Louis XIV, after mentioning the Intrigues which followed the peace of Breda, thus introduces the fall of Clarendon; his reflections on which are very characteristic.

"Ainsi je crus qu'il seroit bon de lui envoyer Ruvigny, pour faire, ou qu'il se déclarât en ma faveur, ou que du moins il demeurât neutre, comme il sembloit naturellement devoir faire, vu les fâcheuses nouveautés qui renaissent à toute heure dans son Etat. Car il venoit encore tout nouvellement d'être forcé à bannir son chancelier de ses conseils; et bien qu'il fût vrai que ce ministre, pour avoir voulu prendre trop d'élévation, se fût de lui-même attiré beaucoup d'envie, il y a pourtant lieu de penser que la mauvaise volonté des Anglais ne se bornoit pas tout-à-fait à sa personne, puisque ni son entière déposition, ni son exil volontaire, ne furent pas suffisants pour les contenter, mais qu'ils voulurent lui faire son procès sur des crimes qui sembloient lui être communs avec son maître.

"D'un si notable événement, les ministres des rois peuvent apprendre à modérer leur ambition, parce que, plus ils s'élèvent au-dessus de leur sphère, plus ils sont en péril de tomber. Mais les rois peuvent apprendre aussi à ne pas laisser trop agrandir leurs créatures, parce qu'il arrive presque toujours qu'après les avoir élevées avec emportement, ils sont obligés de les abandonner avec foiblesse, ou de les soutenir avec peine; car pour l'ordinaire ce ne sont pas des princes fort autorisés ou fort habiles, qui souffrent ces monstrueuses élévations." Cœuvres de Louis XIV, vol. 2, p. 315.

Hume, in his account of Clarendon's fall, follows Burnet. On his character he bestows profuse and unqualified praise. The History of the Rebellion, he says, "except Whitlock's Memorials, is the most candid account of those times, composed by any contemporary author." No very definite commendation. Walpole's criticism is more precise. After ascribing to Clarendon "almost every virtue of a minister," he says, "As an historian he seems more exceptionable. His majesty and eloquence, his power of painting characters, his knowledge of his subject, rank him in the first class of writers—yet he has both great and little faults. Of the latter, his stories of ghosts and omens are not to be defended, by supposing he did not believe them himself: there can be no other reason for inserting them; nor is there any medium between believing and laughing at them. Perhaps even his favourite character of lord Falkland takes too considerable a share in the history. One loves indeed the heart that believed, till he made his friend the hero of his epic. His capital fault is, his whole work being a laboured justification of king Charles. No man ever delivered so much truth with so little sincerity. If he relates faults, some palliating epithet always slides in: and he has the art of breaking his darkest shades with gleams of light that take off all impression of horror. One may pronounce on my lord Clarendon, in his double capacity of statesman and historian, that he acted for liberty, but wrote for prerogative."]

THE earl of Bristol having been opposed by the earl of Clarendon in the designs which he had formed in favour of the papists, resolved to take all methods to ruin him; not contented therefore with endeavouring to deprive him of the king's favour, he forms Articles of High-Treason and other Misdemeanors against him, which he shewed to the king; and though the king would have dissuaded him from it, yet the next day he carried the Charge to the House of Lords, which was as follows:

Articles of High-Treason, and other Heinous Misdemeanors, exhibited against EDWARD EARL OF CLARENDON, Lord High-Chancellor of England, in the House of Lords; on the 10th of July, 1663. By the Earl of Bristol.*

"That being in a place of highest trust and confidence with his majesty, and having arro-

Hist. 750, and his Case upon the Impeachment shortly after preferred against himself, vol. 4, p. 133, of this Collection, where is inserted a character given of him by Lord Clarendon; who, when in banishment, composed another very copious and able account of him, which is printed in the Appendix to the 3rd volume of Clarendon's State Papers. He thus concludes it:

"I did not intend to have reflected upon so many particulars, much less to have taken any survey of the active life of this very considerable person; but it was hardly possible to give any lively description of his nature and humour, or any character even of his person and composition, without representing some instances of particular actions; which, being so contradictory to themselves and so different from the same effects which the same causes naturally produce in other men, can only qualify a man to make a conjecture what his true constitution and nature was, and at best it will be but a conjecture, since it is not possible to make a positive conclusion or deduction from the whole or any part of it, but that another gated a supreme direction in all his majesty's affairs, both at home and abroad, hath wickedly and maliciously, and with a traitorous intent to draw scandal and contempt upon his majesty's person, and to alienate from him the affections of his subjects, abused the said trust in manner following, viz.

"That he hath traitorously and maliciously endeavoured to alienate the hearts of his majesty's subjects from him, by words of his own, and by artificial insinuations of his creatures and dependences, that his majesty was inclined to popery* and had a design to alter the religion established in this kingdom.

conclusion may be as reasonably made from some other action and discovery. It is pity that his whole life should not be exactly and carefully written, and it would be as much pity that any body else should do it but himself, who could only do it to the life, and make the truest description of all his faculties, and passions and appetites, and the full operation of them; and he would do it with as much ingenuity and integrity as any man could do, and expose himself as much to the censure and reproach of other men, as the malice of his greatest enemy could do; for in truth he does believe many of those particular actions, which severe and rigid men do look upon as disfigurements of the other beautiful part of his life, to be great lustre and ornament to it; and would rather expose it nakedly to have the indiscretion and unwarrantable part of it censured, than that the fancy and high projection should be concealed, it being an infirmity that he would not part with, to believe that a very ill thing subtly and warily designed, and well and bravely executed, is much worthier of a great spirit, than a faint acquiescence under any infelicity merely to contain himself within the bounds of innocence, and yet if any man concludes from hence that he is of a fierce and impetuous disposition, and prepared to undertake the worst enterprize, he will find cause enough to believe himself mistaken, and that he hath softness and tenderness enough about him to restrain him, not only from ill, but even from unkind and ill-natured actions. No man loves more passionately and violently, at least makes more lively expressions of it; and that his hatred and malice, which sometimes break out from him with great impetuosity, as if he would destroy all he dislikes, is not compounded proportionable out of the same fiery materials, appears in this, that he would not only, upon very short warning and very easy address, trust a man who had done him injury to a very notable degree, but even such a man, as he himself had provoked beyond the common bounds of reconciliation; he doth not believe that any body he loves so well, can be unloved by any body else, and, that whatever prejudice is contracted against him, he could remove it, if he were but admitted to conference with them which own it. No man can judge, hardly guess, by what he hath done formerly, what he will do in the time to come, whether his virtues will have the better and triumph over his vanities, or whether the strength and vigour of his ambition, and other exorbitancies, will be able to suppress and even extinguish his better disposed inclinations and resolutions, the success of which will always depend upon circumstances and contingencies, and from somewhat without, and not within himself. I should not imagine that ever his activity will be attended with success or security, but without doubt, if ever his reflections upon the vanity of the world dispose him to condemn it, and to betake himself to a contemplation of God, and nature, or to a strict and severe devotion, to which he hath sometimes some temptation, if not inclination; or if a satiety in wrestling and struggling in the world, or a despair of prospering by those strugglings, shall prevail with him to abandon those contests, and retire at a good distance from the court to his books and a contemplative life, he may live to a great and a long age, and will be able to leave such information and advertisements of all kinds to posterity, that he will be looked upon as a great mirror, by which well-disposed men may learn to dress themselves in the best ornaments, and to spend their lives to the best advantage of their country." 3rd vol. Clarendon's State Papers Appendix, p. lxxiii.

* "By the stat. 13 Car. 2, c. 1. "An Act for the safety and preservation of his majesty's person and government against treasonable and seditious practices and attempts," § 2. It was enacted, "That if any person or persons at any time after the 24th day of June, in the year of our Lord 1661, during his majesty's life, shall maliciously and advisedly publish or affirm the king to be an heretic or papist, or that he endeavours to introduce popery; (2) Or shall maliciously and advisedly, by writing, printing, preaching, or other speaking, express, publish, utter or declare any words, sentences, or other thing or things, to incite or stir up the people to hatred or dislike of the person of his majesty, or the established government; (3) Then every such person and persons, being thereof legally convicted, shall be disabled to have or enjoy, and is hereby disabled and made incapable of having, holding, enjoying, or exercising any place, office, or promotion ecclesiastical, civil or military, or any other employment in Church or State, other than that of his peerage, and shall likewise be liable to such further and other punishments as by the common laws or statutes of this realm may be inflicted in such cases."

No measures of Charles 2 exhibit his despicable and detestable meanness, duplicity and want of principle, more strongly than does the whole tenor of his conduct respecting religion from the beginning to the end of his reign. Mr. Fox well says,

"If any thing can add to our disgust at the meanness with which he solicited a dependence upon Lewis the 14th, it is the hypocritical pre-

"That in pursuance of that traitorous intent, he hath to several persons of his majesty's Privy-Council held discourses to this effect, viz.

"That his majesty was dangerously corrupted in his religion, and inclined to popery.

"That persons of that religion had such access, and such credit with him, that unless there were a careful eye had unto it, the protestant religion would be overthrown in this kingdom; and in pursuance of the said wicked and traitorous intent, upon his majesty's admitting sir Henry Bennet to be principal Secretary of State, in the place of Mr. Secretary Nicolas, he hath said these words, or words to this effect:

"That his majesty had given 10,000*l.* to remove a zealous protestant, that he might bring into that place of high trust a concealed papist; notwithstanding that the said sir Henry Bennet* is known to have ever been, both in tence upon which he was continually pressing that monarch. After having passed a law, making it penal to affirm, (what was true,) that he was a papist, he pretended, (which was certainly not true,) to be a zealous and bigoted papist; and the uneasiness of his conscience at so long delaying a public avowal of his conversion, was more than once urged by him, as an argument to increase the pension, and to accelerate the assistance he was to receive from France. In a later period of his reign, when his interest, as he thought, lay the other way, that he might at once continue to earn his wages, and yet put off a public conversion, he stated some scruples contracted, no doubt, by his affection to the protestant churches, in relation to the popish mode of giving the sacrament; and pretended a wish, that the pope might be induced by Lewis, to consider of some alterations in that respect, to enable him to reconcile himself to the Roman church with a clear and pure conscience."

Some most curious particulars, relative to this part of Charles the second's History, are to be found in the "Pièces Historiques at the end of the Œuvres de Louis XIV." Paris Edition 1806.

* Burnet says; "He was a proud man. His parts were solid, but not quick. He had the art of observing the king's temper, and managing it beyond all the men of that time. He was believed a papist. He had once professed it: and when he died, he again reconciled himself to that church. Yet in the whole course of his ministry, he seemed to have made it a maxim, that the king ought to shew no favour to popery, but that all his affairs would be spoiled if ever he turned that way; which made the papists become his mortal enemies and accuse him as an apostate and the betrayer of their interests. His chief friend was Charles Berkeley, made earl of Falmouth, who without any visible merit, unless it was the managing the king's amours, was the most absolute of all the king's favourites, and, which his profession and practice, constant to the Protestant Religion.

"That in pursuance of the same traitorous design, several near friends and known depenwas peculiar to himself, he was as much in the duke of York's favour as in the king's. Berkeley was generous in his expences: and it was thought, if he had outlived the lewdness of that time, and come to a more sedate course of life, he would have put the king on great and noble designs. This I should have thought more likely, if I had not had it from the duke, who had so wrong a taste, that there was reason to suspect his judgment both of men, and things. Bennet and Berkeley had the management of the mistress. And all the earl of Clarendon's enemies came about them: the chief of whom were the duke of Buckingham and the earl of Bristol."

"It is certain," says Kennet speaking of the Treaty of the Pyrenees, "That the earl of Bristol, who was the king's companion and guide to the place of this Treaty, and sir Harry Bennet who was the prime agent for the king, did both of them turn papists about this time; as if they did it upon a compact then made. And there is a story to confirm all, which I have reason to think true. Sir Harry Bennet was soon after seen to wait upon the king from Muss; at which sight the lord Culpeper had so much indignation, that he went up to Bennet, and spoke to this effect: 'I see what you are at: Is this the way to bring our master home to his three kingdoms? Well, sir, if ever you and I live to see England together, I will have your head, or you shall have mine.' Which words struck such a terror upon sir Harry Bennet that he never dared to set foot in England till after the death of the lord Culpeper, who met with a very abrupt death within few months after the king's return. When he was taken out of the way, sir Harry Bennet came to court, and soon arose into honours and preferments, and was in disguise a mere creature of the papists, and had the dying courage to take off that disguise."

Of the present matter he says: "The lord Chancellor Clarendon was sensible of this change in his majesty's counsels and affections; and afterward took occasion, thus to express himself in a Petition and Address to the lords at the time of his departing the kingdom, 'For more than two years I never knew any difference in the councils.—But from the time Mr. Secretary Nicholas was removed from his place there were great alterations; and whosoever knew any thing of the court and counsels, knew well how much my credit hath since that time been diminished.—Nor hath there been from that time to this above one or two persons brought to the council, or preferred to any considerable office in the court, who have been of my intimate acquaintance, or suspected to have any kindness for me, and most of them most notoriously known to have been ces of his have said, aloud, that were it not for my lord Chancellor's standing in the gap, popery would be introduced in this kingdom, or words to that effect.

"That in pursuance of the aforesaid traitorous design, he hath not only advised and persuaded the king to do such things contrary to his own reasons and resolutions as might confirm and increase the scandal, which he had endeavoured to raise upon his majesty as aforesaid of his favour to popery, but more particularly to allow his name to be used to the pope and several cardinals in the solicitation of a cardinal's cap for the lord Aubigny, one of his own subjects, and great Almoner at present to his royal consort the queen.

'very long my enemies and of different judgment and principles from me both in church and state.—And it was indeed from this juncture of a popish prevailing interest, that the lord chancellor Clarendon began now to decline in his royal master's favour and to stand ready to be given up to his enemies, and to bear the odium of every public miscarriage or misfortune. And therefore in this session of parliament, on July 10, 1663, the earl of Bristol exhibited Articles of High Treason and other heinous misdemeanours against Edward earl of Clarendon, Lord High Chancellor of England, in the House of Lords."

After giving the Articles, he proceeds; "This Accusation seems rather to have been a personal quarrel than any serious concern for public truth and justice. The words that are charged as spoken by him, were generally thought to have been the real expressions or suggestions of that great man, and was there not a cause? They may be taxed for an indecent freedom, but they can be never imagined to have proceeded from any want of integrity or honour. But indeed there seems a perverse turn in the articles, first to represent the lord Chancellor as jealous of popery, and complaining of the king's inclination to it, by taking new ministers popishly affected; and yet after all, to make the chancellor himself the instrument of those very designs that were laid for popery and the profest promoter of them; which the world did not then believe, and posterity does less believe." He concludes thus:

"And so the Plot of running down this great man fell at present; and yet this early step in it had gained very much of the designed effect, which was to make him less gracious with his royal master, and less respected in the parliament; and less beloved by the people; and so by degrees a more easy prey when his enemies should again meet to hunt him down."

In the next year, 1664, Bennett was made baron and in 1672 earl of Arlington. He, was one of the Cabal, and died in 1685. See the Impeachment against him in the year 1674, infra. Bristol appears to have lost by this attack on Clarendon whatever weight he previously had. He died in 1676.

"That in pursuance of the same wicked and traitorous design, he had recommended to be employed to the pope one of his own domestics, Mr. Rich. Bealing, a person (though an avowed papist) known to be trusted and employed by him in dispatches and negotiations concerning affairs of greatest concernment to the nation.

"That in pursuance of the said traitorous design he being chief minister of state, did himself write by the said Mr. Rich. Bealing letters to several cardinals, pressing them in the king's name to induce the pope to confer a Cardinal's cap on the said lord Aubigny, promising, in case it should be attained, exemption to the Roman Catholics of England from the penal laws in force against them; by which address unto the pope for that ecclesiastical dignity for one of his majesty's subjects and domestics, he hath, as far as from one action can be inferred, traitorously acknowledged the Pope's ecclesiastical sovereignty, contrary to the known laws of this kingdom.

"That in pursuance of the same traitorous design, he has called unto him several priests and Jesuits, whom he knew to be superiors of orders here in England, and desired them to write to their generals at Rome, to give their help for the obtaining from the pope the Cardinal's cap for the lord Aubigny, as aforesaid, promising great favour to papists here, in case it should be effected for him.

"That he hath promised to several Papists he would do his endeavour, and said, he hoped to compass the taking away all penal laws against them, which he did in pursuance of the traitorous design aforesaid; to the end they might presume and grow vain upon his patronage, and by their publishing their hopes of a toleration, increase the scandal endeavoured by him, and by his emissaries, to be raised upon his majesty throughout the kingdom.

"That in pursuance of the same traitorous design, being entrusted with the treaty betwixt his majesty and his royal consort the queen, he concluded it upon articles scandalous and dangerous to the Protestant religion.

"That in pursuance of the same traitorous design, he concluded the same marriage, and brought the king and queen together, without any settled agreement in what manner the rites of marriage should be performed, whereby the queen refusing to be married by a Protestant priest, in case of her being with child, either the succession should be made uncertain for want of the due rights of matrimony, or else his majesty to be exposed to a suspicion of having been married in his own dominions by a Romish priest, whereby all the former scandals endeavoured to be raised upon his majesty by the said Earl, as to point of Popery, might be confirmed and heightened.

"That having thus traitorously endeavoured to alienate the affections of his majesty's subjects from him upon the score of religion, he hath endeavoured to make use of all the malicious scandals and jealousies, which he and his emissaries had raised in his majesty's subjects, to raise from them unto himself the popular applause of being the zealous upholder of the Protestant religion, and a promoter of new severities against Papists.

"That he hath traitorously endeavoured to alienate the affections of his majesty's subjects from him, by venting in his own discourse, and by the speeches of his nearest relations and emissaries, opprobrious scandals against his majesty's person and course of life, such as are not fit to be mentioned, unless necessity in the way of proof shall require it.

"That he hath traitorously endeavoured to alienate the affections of his highness the duke of York from his majesty, by suggesting unto him jealousies as far as in him lay, and publishing abroad by his emissaries, that his majesty intended to legitimate the duke of Monmouth.

"That he hath wickedly and maliciously, and contrary to the duty of a privy counsellor, and contrary to the perpetual and most important interest of this nation, persuaded his majesty, against the advice of the lord general, to withdraw the English garrisons out of Scotland, and to demolish all the forts built there, at so vast a charge to this kingdom.

"That his majesty having been graciously pleased to communicate the desires of the parliament of Scotland for the remove of the said garrisons to the parliament of England, and to ask their advice therein, the said earl of Clarendon, not only persuaded his majesty actually to remove those garrisons, without expecting the advice of his parliament of England concerning it, but did, by menaces of his majesty's displeasure, deter several members of parliament from moving the House, as they intended, to enter upon consideration of that matter.

"That he had traitorously and maliciously endeavoured to alienate his majesty's affections and esteem from this his parliament, by telling his majesty that there was never so weak and inconsiderable a House of Lords, nor never so weak and so heady a House of Commons, or words to that effect, and particularly, that it was better to sell Dunkirk, than to be at their mercy for want of money, or words to that effect.

"That he hath wickedly and maliciously, contrary to his duty of counsellor, and to a known law made last sessions, by which money was given, and particularly applied for the maintaining of Dunkirk, advised and effected the sale of the same to the French king.

"That he hath, contrary to law, enriched himself and his treasures by the sale of offices.

"That contrary to his duty he hath wickedly and corruptly converted to his own use, great and vast sums of public money raised in Ireland by way of subsidy, private and public benevolences, and otherwise, given and intended to defray the charge of government in that kingdom. By which means a supernumerary and disaffected army hath been kept up there, for want of money to pay them off, occasioned it seems to be because of the late and present distempers of that kingdom.

"That having arrogated to himself a supreme direction of all his majesty's affairs, he hath, with a malicious and corrupt intention, prevailed to have his majesty's customs farmed at a far lower rate than others do offer, and that by persons, with some of whom he goes a share, in that and other parts of money resulting from his majesty's revenue.

July 10, 1663.

BRISTOL."

The Earl of Bristol having exhibited against the Lord Chancellor, Articles of High-Treason, and other Misdemeanors, this Order was made by the House of Peers:

Die Veneris, July 10, 1663. "Ordered, by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That a copy of the Articles or Charge of High Treason exhibited this day by the earl of Bristol, against the Lord Chancellor, be delivered to the Lord Chief Justice; who with all the rest of the Judges are to consider whether the said Charge hath been brought in regularly and legally, and whether it may be proceeded in, and how, whether there be any Treason in it or no, and make report thereof to this House on Monday next if they can, or else as soon after as possibly they may."

Whereupon, all the Judges met at Serjeants-Inn in Fleet-street, and my lord of Bristol repaired to us thither, desiring to see the Order; which being read, he told us he came out of respect to know of us whether we were informed how it came into the House of Peers, whether as a Charge or not; but one of the Judges who had been present when it was delivered in, saying, 'We were tied up by our 'Order,' his lordship took some exception at the manner of his expression, as if his lordship's address was unnecessary at that time, and taking it as a rebuke unto him, went away; but according to our Order, which supposed it to be a Charge of High Treason, and not mentioning Misdemeanor, we did upon consideration unanimously agree upon this ensuing Answer, which on Monday the 13th of July, the Lord Chief Justice Forster did deliver in, viz.

"We conceive that a Charge of High Treason cannot by the laws and statutes of this realm be originally exhibited by one peer against another unto the House of Peers, and that therefore a Charge of High Treason by the earl of Bristol against the Lord Chancellor, mentioned in the Order of Reference to us of the 10th of this instant July, hath not been regularly and legally brought in, and if the matters alledged in the said Charge were admitted to be true, although alledged to be traitorously done, yet there is no Treason in it *."

* See lord Hale's Treatise on the Jurisdiction of the Lords' House of Parliament (published by Mr. Hargrave, 1796), pp. 94, 95, and Mr. Hargrave's Preface to that Treatise.

Which Answer being given in, the earl of Bristol took some exceptions at it, and some of the Lords inferred thence, that if it were irregularly and illegally brought in, it was a libel; but we satisfied them that it was not under consideration of us, whether it came in as an Information or Charge; our Order required us to give Answer to it as a Charge. 2dly. We did not meddle with any thing concerning accusing him of Misdemeanor, for our Order reached only to Treason. 3dly. It did not follow that if this Charge were irregular or illegal, that therefore it was criminal: There might be precedents to give colour to such kind of proceedings, for which, till it be declared or known, that they are illegal, they are titular, and ought not to be punished.

But it was much insisted on, That we should deliver the Reasons of our opinions, lord Bristol and his friends seeming unsatisfied.

We replied, That it was never known, that when the Justices to whom questions were referred from parliament had unanimously agreed in their Opinions, that reasons were required from them. Yet notwithstanding, it being the desire of the Lords, after some things premised, and a desire that this should not be drawn into an example, (which the Lords assented unto, as I took it, for no order was entered concerning it, there being no Order, as I think, for delivering our Reasons entered, and it was agreed amongst us, that no note should be reduced, lest we might be required to deliver our Reasons in writing; nor had I time to digest it in writing, having only Monday night after conference with my brethren to think upon it,) I did on the next Tuesday, being the 14th of July, deliver the Reasons of all the Judges, of their opinions, by their consents. To the first point, "That a Charge of High-Treason cannot originally be exhibited by one Peer against another unto the House of Peers," the emphasis of the word originally was shewed.*

For first, an Indictment of Treason against a Peer may be removed up to the Lords House to be tried, as it was in the 31 Hen. 6, in the earl of Devonshire's Case, but a steward was then to be made.

Secondly, If an Impeachment came from the House of Commons unto the Lords House, we did not take upon us the consideration, whether this could be proceeded in or not, for it was not the case to which we were required to give Answer.

We replied, Upon the Statute 1 Hen. 4, c. 14, which recites the many great inconveniences and mischiefs by appeals, and provides that all appeals of things within the realm, shall be tried and determined by the good laws of the realm made and used in the time of the king's noble progenitors, and appeals of things out of the realm before the constable and marshal: But we relied upon the clause ensuing, And thereupon it is accorded and assented, That no appeals be from thenceforth made, or in any wise pursued in parliament, in time to come. I shewed appeals in this statute, and accusations by single persons, were one and the same thing, and that this statute reached to all appeals, charges, accusations or impeachments delivered in, in parliament, whereupon the person accused was to be put to his answer, and that they were but several names of the same thing, I shewed first historically that the appeals the 11 R. 2, * and 21 R. 2, were but accusations by those Lords of felony against the other, and differed from the case of the dukes of Hereford and Norfolk, which was to be tried as 21 R. 2, Pl. Cor. in Parl. No. 19, is by the course of the civil law, and thereupon battle was waged. That though it concerned Hen. 4, in interest to confirm the 11 R. 2, and repeal the 21 R. 2, he being appellant in the former, yet he saw the mischief so great, that he himself made provision against them for the time to come, and indeed, the mischief was so great that it ceased not after the destruction of many lords and families (there being lex talionis in that 21 R. 2, used towards most of those appellants in the 11 R. 2,) till it tumbled king R. 2, first out of his throne, and then into his grave.

That there were but two sorts of proceedings in capitalibus, the suit of the party, which was called an appeal, or the suit of the king, who ought to proceed by indictment, and so to trial by virtue of Magna Charta. 'Nec super eum ibimus,' &c. and that, in an appeal, being the suit of the party, there was no prerogative of appearance, if it were an appeal at the common-law, 10 Edw. 4. Lord Gray's Case. That an appeal was taken in the law-books frequently for an accusation by the party, I cited Westm. the 1st, c. 14, where the word appeal reaches to indictment; and 9 Coke, 119,† lord Zanchar's case, that an appeal hath two significations, one general and frequent in our books for accusation, and Stamford, 124, in case of an approver, the

* Sir M. Hale, mentioning this case, says, "By the statute 1 Hen. 4, ch. 14, all these kinds of appeals in parliament are wholly taken away: And therefore, when the now earl of Bristol, prepared Articles of High-Treason against the earl of Clarendon, upon a reference to all the judges, and upon great consideration, the judges unâ voce returned their opinions 'That those Articles were contrary' to that statute of the 1 Hen. 4, and could not 'be preferred in the Lords' House by the said 'earl, or by any other private person.' But impeachments by the House of Commons of High-Treason or other misdemeanors, in the Lords House, have been frequently in practice, notwithstanding the statute of 1 Hen. 4, and are neither within the words nor intent of that statute; for it is a presentment by the most solemn grand inquest of the whole kingdom." felon after confession may appeal, that is (saith he) accuse others, coadjutors with him to do the felony. C. P. C. 129, appellant cometh from the French word appeller, which signifies to accuse; or appeach, and 1 Co. Inst. sect. 189. Appel signifieth an accusation; and therefore to appeal a man is as much as to accuse, and in ancient books he that doth appeal a man is called accusator, vide 9 Edw. 2, Articuli Cleri, c. 16. That I knew no reason why in those tumbling times of R. 2, (which caused this statute, for the statute-roll is 'Coment ad auterment este eus en temps la darrein roy,' R. 2,) they should proceed by way of appeal, but because they were then allowed at the suit of the party, to accuse any other of treason, but at the king's suit there ought to be an indictment, and an indictment could not be found but by jury.

That in all other cases, an appeal was to be brought by the party concerned, the wife or heir, or party robbed, &c. But in case of Treason, any man may appeal another, and therefore in all reason it must be understood of an accusation, and any man might accuse another of Treason; and if it can be proved by witnesses, it must not be tried by battle, as other appeals may. I concluded that the 8 Hen. 6, No. 38, this statute, the 1 Hen. 4, c. 14, is recited, and desired it should be duly kept and put in execution; that Stamford 73 and Coke Pl. Cor. 31, 132, agree that appeals of High-Treason, were commonly used to be sued in parliaments till the 1 Hen. 4, c. 14. Since which time this manner of appeal hath gone out of use; and I said, I had searched many precedents, and though of late there may be a precedent (as it was of the earl of Bristol's father against the duke of Buckingham, of some kind of impeachment) yet I did confidently believe there was not since that statute 1 Hen. 4, c. 14, any one precedent of such an impeachment at the party-suit whereupon there was any indictment: In truth, in the earl of Bristol's case, the Commons House did impeach the duke of Treason, and so the earl of Bristol's impeachment proceeded not.

For the second point, "That there was no Treason in the charge, though the matters in it are alledged to be traitorously done." I said we had perused each article seriatim, and we had found no Treason in them; the great charge, which is endeavoured to be proved by many particulars, was, That he did traitorously and maliciously, to bring the king into contempt, and with an intent to alien the peoples affections from him, say, &c. such and such words, &c.

And so it runs on, That in pursuance of the traitorous intent, &c. he did, &c. and that in farther pursuance of the said traitorous design, &c. And in like manner was most of the articles upon which the characters of treason seemed to be fixed. I said that it is a transcendent misprision or offence to endeavour to bring the king into contempt, or to endeavour to alienate the people's affections from him, but yet it was not treason. This statute, 13 Car. 2 C. 1. makes treason during the king's life; but if a man calls the king Heretic, or Papist, or that he endeavours to introduce Popery, (which is more in express terms than the article of that kind insinuates) or by words, preaching, prayer, to stir up the people to hatred or dislike of the person of his majesty, or the established government; the penalty is only disability to enjoy any place ecclesiastical, civil, or military, and subject to such penalties as by the common law or statute of this realm may be inflicted in such case, (which is fine and ransom, with imprisonment) and it limits a time and manner of prosecution.

There was an objection made yesterday upon the 25 E. 3. That this being in parliament, the king and parliament had power to declare treason, and then we ought to have delivered our opinions with a qualification, unless it be declared treason by parliament where this charge is depending; to this I answered,

1. It is not treason in presenti, and if such a declaration should be, non constat, whether it would relate to the time past.

2. That I conceived that the statute as touching that declaratory power, extended but to such cases as were clearly felony, as single acts, if not treason, (the words being) whether it be treason or other felony; but in respect of the doubts of escheats, which, if treason, belonged to the king; if felony, to the lords of the fee, it was left to the parliament. I did not say we resolved the point.

3. That admitting the declaratory power did extend to other cases than such as were before the judges, and was not taken away by 1. Mar. cap. 1. or any other statute, yet I read my lord Coke's opinion at large, Pl. Cor. Fol. 22. That this declaration must be by the king, lords and commons, not by any two of them alone; and we were now in a judicial way before the House of Peers only; and I did affirm as clear law, that by this judicial way no treasons could be declared nor adjudged, but as were expressly within the letter of the 25 E. 3. and said, That statute 25 E. 3. was a second Magna Charta, and that their ancestors thought it their greatest security to narrow, and not to enlarge treason, and cited 1 H. 4. cap. 10. to which in the parliament-roll Rot. No. 17. is added (it coming of the king's free grace) that the lords did much rejoice and humbly thank the king; and I read the statute 1. M. cap. 1*.

That the now earl of Bristol in my lord of Strafford's Case, was the great asserter of the law against constructive and accumulative treason, which, if admitted, their lordships could better suggest unto themselves, than I express, how great a door they would set open to other inconveniencies and mischiefs to the peerage.

* As to Treason at Common Law declarable by Parliament, though not within 25 Edw. 3, See the note to Lord Capel's case, ante, vol. 4, p. 12, 13, and the case of the Earl of Danby A. D. 1678; infra.

I concluded with reading the Act, 14 Car. 2. for reversing the attainder of the earl of Strafford; the first part whereof I read to them, wherein is expressed, That they, who condemned him, did purposely make an act of parliament to condemn him upon an accumulative treason, none of the pretended crimes being treason apart, and so could not be in the whole, if they had been proved.

After I had spoken to this effect, the earl of Bristol seemed to acquiesce, inasmuch as concerned our opinions as the case was delivered to us: but it being to be put to the question, Whether the Lords did concur with the Judges opinions, and himself being concerned in the illative, that therefore the charge was illegal and irregular; yet not being intended by him, as he said, as a charge, but an information, he desired (though as the case was put to us, it it was a good inference) that the voting of that might be spared till it was resolved by the Lords whether he delivered it in as a charge, or only as an information for the matter of the charge, if it should be thought fit for their lordships to proceed in it: after some debate upon the question, the Lords resolved the same day, according to our opinions,

1. "That a charge of high-treason cannot by the laws and statutes of this realm be originally exhibited by one peer against another, unto the House of Peers.

2. "That in these Articles, if the matters alleged in them were admitted to be true, there is no treason in them. And because the Lords unanimously concurred in them (Lord Bristol freely as any other) it was by order entered, That these Votes were nem. con."

Note, That in Judge Hutton's Reports, the Resolution of the Judges is expressed to be, That a peer cannot be impeached but by indictment, and Mr. Rushworth in his Collections, Fol. 272, expresses such an opinion to be delivered by the judges, in 1 or 2 Car. but upon search it was found to be entered in the Journal of Parliament of that time, but it was cautious, referring to the common-law only. But that for proceedings in parliament it did not belong to them to determine, or to that effect; but no mention of 1 II. 4. cap. 14. It hath been credibly reported that some of the Judges in my lord of Strafford's case, being asked some questions, did with the like caution deliver their opinions, and did speak with reservations, (as the case is put) though they upon hearing did know the case mis-put? which, after troubled the conscience of one of them, (ut audiui) being a grave learned man; for "Suppression of the truth is the oppression of the innocent." Vide Peacock's Case, Co. 9. Rep. Fol. 71. But we having the case referred to us in parliament upon Articles exhibited in parliament, did resolve to deliver our Opinions without any such reservation; the act of 1 II. 4. being express against appeals in parliament (and of acts of parliaments after they are once made, none under the king, and without him, are interpreters but the judges. See King's Answer printed in the old print of 3 Car. 1. at the end of the Petition.) And therefore did deliver these Opinions which I conceive of great benefit to the Lords themselves, and a just ground for farther enquiry to be made, whether such impeachments may be in the House of Peers for other misdemeanours, without the king's leave, or being exhibited by his attorney.

And secondly, to take into consideration the validity of impeachments of treason by the House of Commons, notwithstanding the late precedents, which yet ended in a bill, and so in the legislative, not judiciary way.

Thus ended this attempt against the earl of Clarendon; but thus far it had its effect, in diminishing the king's favour towards him, and lessening his interest with the Lords, and with the people, whereby he became exposed to a second attempt, four years after.

Aug. 30, 1667, the king removed him from his place of lord chancellor; and the House of Commons impeached him of high treason, and of high crimes and misdemeanours, in the manner following:

Proceedings against the Earl of CLARENDON, A. D. 1667, upon an Impeachment of High-Treason and High Misdemeanors.

[The following passages relating to these Proceedings are extracted from Burnet:

"The Dutch war had turned so fatally on the king, that it made it necessary for him to try how to recover the affections and esteem of his people. He found a slackening the execution of the law went a great way in the city of London, and with the trading part of the nation. The House of Commons continued still in their fierceness, and aversion to all moderate propositions: but in the intervals of parliament the execution was softened. The earl of Clarendon found his credit was declining, that all the secrets of state were trusted to Bennet, and that he had no other share in them than his post required. The lady Castlemain set herself most violently against him. And the duke of Buckingham, as often as he was admitted to any familiarities with the king, studied with all his wit and humour to make lord Clarendon and all his counsels appear ridiculous. Lively jests were at all times apt to take with the king. The earl of Clarendon fell under two other misfortunes before the war broke out. The king had granted him a large piece of ground near St. James's to build a house on; he intended a good ordinary house; but, not understanding those matters himself he put the managing of that into the hands of others; who run him into a vast charge of about 50,000*l.* three times as much as he had designed to lay out upon it. During the war, and in the plague year, he had about 300 men at work, which he thought would have been an acceptable thing, when so many men were kept at work, and so much money, as was duly paid, circulated about. But it had a contrary effect. It raised a great outcry against him. Some called it Dunkirk house, intimating that it was built by his share of the price of Dunkirk. Others called it Holland house, because he was believed to be no friend to the war: so it was given out, that he had the money from the Dutch. It was visible, that in a time of public calamity he was building a very noble palace. Another accident was, that before the war there were some designs on foot for the repairing of St. Paul's: and many stones were brought thither. That project was laid aside during the war. He upon that bought the stones, and made use of them in building his own house. This, how slight soever it may seem to be, yet had a great effect by the management of his enemies. Another misfortune was, that he lost his chief friend, to whom he trusted most, and who was his greatest support, the earl of Southampton.

"As soon as the peace was made, the king saw with what disadvantage he was like to meet his parliament. So he thought the disgracing a public minister, who by his being long in so high a post had drawn upon himself much envy, and many enemies, would cover himself and the rest of his court. Other things concurred to set this forward. The king was grown weary of the queen: and it was believed he had a great mind to be rid of her. The load of that marriage was cast on the lord Clarendon, as made on design to raise his own grandchildren. Many members of the House of Commons, such as Clifford, Osborn, Ker, Littleton, and Seimour, were brought to the king; who all assured him, that upon his restoration they intended both to have raised his authority, and to have encreased his revenue; but that the earl of Clarendon had discouraged it, and that all his creatures had possessed the house with such jealousies of the king, that they thought it was not fit to trust him too much, nor too far. This made a deep impression on the king, who was weary of lord Clarendon's imposing way, and had a mind to be freed from the authority, to which he had been so long accustomed that it was not easy to keep him within bounds.

"Yet the king was so afraid to engage himself too deep in his own affairs, that it was a doubt whether he would dismiss him or not, if a concern of one of his amours had not sharpened his resentment; so that what other considerations could not do, was brought about by an ill grounded jealousy. Mistress Steward had gained so much on the king, and yet had kept her ground with so much firmness, that the king seemed to design if possible to legiti-mate his addresses to her, when he saw no hope of succeeding any other way. The duke of Richmond, being a widower, courted her. The king seemed to give way to it; and pretended to take such care of her, that he would have good settlements made for her. He hoped by that means to have broke the matter decently; for he knew the duke of Richmond's affairs were in disorder. So the king ordered lord Clarendon to examine the estate he pretended to settle. But he was told, whether true or false I cannot tell, that lord Clarendon told her, that the duke of Richmond's affairs, it was true, were not very clear; but that a family so near related to the king could never be left in distress, and that such a match would not come in her way every day; so she had best consider well, before she rejected it. This was carried to the king, as a design he had that the crown might descend to his own grandchildren; and that he was afraid, lest strange methods should be taken to get rid of the queen, and to make way for her. When the king saw that she had a mind to marry the duke of Richmond, he offered to make her a duchess, and to settle an estate on her. Upon this she said, she saw she must either marry him, or suffer much in the opinion of the world. And she was prevailed on by the duke of Richmond, who was passionately in love with her, to go privately from Whitehall, and marry him without giving the king notice. The earl of Clarendon's son, the lord Cornbury, was going to her lodgings, upon some assignation that she had given him about her affairs, knowing nothing of her intentions. He met the king in the door coming out full of fury. And he, suspecting that lord Cornbury was in the design, spoke to him as one in a rage that forgot all decency, and for some time would not hear lord Cornbury speak in his own defence. In the afternoon he heard him with more temper, as he himself told me. Yet this made so deep an impression, that he resolved to take the seals from his father.

"The parliament were upon their first opening set on to destroy lord Clarendon. Some of his friends went to him a few days before the parliament met; and told him, many were at work to find out matter of accusation against him. He best knew, what could be brought against him with any truth; for falsehood was infinite, and could not be guessed at. They desired, he would trust some of them with what might break out, since probably nothing could be concealed against so strict a search. And the method in which his friends must manage for him, if there was any mixture or allay in him, was to be very different from that they could use, if he was sure that nothing could be brought out against him. The lord Burlington and bishop Morley both told me, they talked to this purpose to him. Lord Clarendon upon that told them, that, if either in matters of justice, or in any negotiations abroad, he had ever received a farthing, he gave them leave to disown all friendship to him. The French king, hearing he had sent for all the books of the Louvre impression, had sent these to him, which he took, as thinking it a trifle, as indeed it was: and this was the only present he ever had from any foreign prince: he had never taken any thing by virtue of his office, but that which his predecessors had claimed as a right. But now hue and cry were sent out against him: and all persons, who had heard him say any thing that could bear an ill construction, were examined. Some thought, they had matters of great weight against him: and, when they were told these would not amount to high treason, they desired to know what would amount to it.

“When twenty three articles were brought into the House against him, the next day he desired his second son, the now earl of Rochester, to acquaint the House, that he, hearing what Articles were brought against him, did in order to the dispatch of the business, desire that those, who knew best what their evidence was, would single out any one of the Articles, that they thought could be best proved; and, if they could prove that, he would submit to the censure due upon them all. But those, who had the secret of this in their hands, and knew they could make nothing of it, resolved to put the matter upon a preliminary, in which they hoped to find cause to hang up the whole affair, and fix upon the Lords the denial of justice. So, according to some few and late precedents, they sent up a general impeachment to the Lords bar of high treason, without any special matter; and demanded, that upon that he might be committed to prison. They had reason to believe the Lords would not grant this: and therefore they resolved to insist on it; and reckoned, that, when so much money was to be given, the king would prevail with the lords. Upon this occasion it appeared, that the private animosities of a court could carry them to establish the most destructive precedent that could have been thought on. For if this had passed, then every minister upon a general impeachment was to be ruined, though no special matter was laid against him. Yet the king himself pressed this vehemently. It was said, the very suspicions of a House of Commons, especially such a one as this was, was enough to blast a man, and to secure him: for there was reason to think, that every person so charged would run away, if at liberty. Lord Clarendon’s enemies had now gone far: they thought they were not safe till his head was off: and they apprehended, that, if he were once in prison, it would be easy either to find, or at least to bring witnesses against him. This matter is all in print: so I will go no farther in the particulars. The Duke was at this time taken with the small-pox: so he was out of the whole debate. The peers thought, that a general accusation was only a clamour, and that their dignities signified little, if a clamour was enough to send them to prison. All the earl of Clarendon’s friends pressed the king much on his behalf, that he might be suffered to go off gently, and without censure, since he had served both his father and himself so long, so faithfully, and with such success. But the king was now so sharpened against him, that though he named no particulars, he expressed a violent and irreconcilable aversion to him; which did the king much hurt in the opinion of all that were not engaged in the party. The affair of the king’s marriage was the most talked of, as that which indeed was the only thing that could in any sort justify such a severity. Lord Clarendon did protest, as some that had it from himself told me, that he had no other hand in that matter, than as a counsellor: and in that he appealed to the king himself. After many debates, and conferences and protestations, in which the whole court went in visibly to that which was plainly destructive both to the king and to the ministry, the majority of the House stood firm and adhered to their first resolution against commitment. The Commons were upon that like to carry the matter far against the Peers, as denying justice. The king seeing this spoke to the duke, to persuade Lord Clarendon to go beyond sea, as the only expedient that was left to make up the breach between the two houses; And he let fall some words of kindness in case he should comply with this. The earl of Clarendon was all obedience and submission; and was charmed with those tender words, that the king had said of him. So, partly to serve the king, and save himself and family, but chiefly that he might not be the occasion of any difference between the king and the duke, who had heartily espoused his interest, he went privately beyond sea, and writ a letter from Calais to the House of Lords, protesting his innocence in all the points objected to him, and that he had not gone out of the kingdom for fear, or out of any consciousness of guilt, but only that he might not be the unhappy occasion of any difference between the two Houses, or of obstructing public business. This put an end to the dispute. But his enemies called it a confession of guilt, and a flying from justice; Such colours will people give to the most innocent actions.

“A bill was brought in, banishing him the king’s dominions under pain of treason if he should return: And it was made treason to correspond with him, without leave from the king. This act did not pass without much opposition. It was said, there was a known course of law when any man fled from justice: And it seemed against the common course of justice, to make all corresponding with him treason, when he himself was not attainted of treason; Nor could it be just to banish him, unless a day were given him to come in: And then, if he did not come in, he might incur the punishment upon contempt. The duke, whom the king had employed to prevail with him to withdraw himself, thought he was bound in honour to press the matter home on the king; which he did so warmly, that for some time a coldness between them was very visible. The part the king had acted on this matter came to be known; and was much censured, as there was just cause for it. The vehemence that he showed in this whole matter was imputed by many to very different causes. Those who knew him best but esteemed him least, said to me on this occasion, that all the indignation, that appeared in him on this head, was founded on no reason at all; but was an effect of that easiness, or rather laziness of nature, that made him comply with every person that had the greatest credit with him. The mistress, and the whole bedchamber, were perpetually railing at him. This by a sort of infection possessed the king, who without giving himself the trouble of much thinking, did commonly go into any thing that was at the present time the easiest, without considering what might at any other time follow on it. Thus the lord Clarendon fell under the common fate of great ministers; whose employment exposes them to envy, and draws upon them the indignation of all who are disappointed in their pretensions. Their friends do generally shew, that they are only the friends of their fortunes: and upon the change of favour they not only forsake them in their extremity, but, that they may secure to themselves the protection of a new favourite, they will labour to redeem all that is passed by turning as violently against them, as they formerly fawned abjectly upon them: And princes are so little sensible of merit or great services, that they sacrifice their best servants, not only when their affairs seem to require it, but to gratify the humour of a mistress, or the passion of a rising favourite.”]

October 26, 1667.

Mr. Edward Seymour * charged him viva voce with many great crimes, whereupon a debate

* According to lord Clarendon's own account (Continuation of his Life, 445); “After many days spent in close contrivances and combinations, Mr. Seymour, a young man of great confidence and boldness, stood up in the House of Commons, and spake long and with great bitterness against the Chancellor, and of his great corruption in many particulars, by which, he said, ‘he had gotten a vast estate. That he had received great sums of money from Ireland, for making a settlement that every body complained of, and that left that kingdom in as great distraction as ever it had been. That he had gotten great sums of money indirectly and corruptly from the plantations, the governments whereof he had disposed; by preferments in the law and in the church; and for the passing of charters. And that he had received 4,000*l.* from the Canada company for establishing that company, which was so great and general a grievance to the kingdom. And, which was above all this, that he had traitorously persuaded, or endeavoured to persuade, the king to dissolve the parliament, and to govern by a standing army; and that he had said ‘that 400 country gentlemen were only fit to give money, and did not understand how an in-rose what proceeding ought to be had upon in it, some moving to impeach him in the name of the Commons till articles should be prepared; others urged that witnesses should be first examined to see how the charge could be made good, lest failing, it should reflect on the honour of the House. After long debate a committee was appointed to search records for parliamentary proceedings in the like cases, and to make report.

Oct. 30th. The report being made by sir Thomas Littleton, that various proceedings were found in several parliaments, it occasioned a long debate, several members speaking to the effect following.

Sir Tho. Littleton. In cases criminal, we find proceedings to have been, sometimes by articles, sometimes by word of mouth; but in capital crimes no proceedings appear till the earl of Strafford's Case [A. D. 1644, ante, vol. iii. p. 1381.] against whom the House carried up a general impeachment, the reason whereof seems to be this: Some votes were made in the House, at which the king takes offence, as if they would proceed upon common fame; whereupon they vindicate their proceedings as done in a parliamentary ‘vasion was to be resisted.’ He mentioned many other odious particulars ‘which’ he said ‘he would prove,’ and therefore proposed, ‘That they would presently send up to the Lords to accuse him of High Treason, and require that his person might be secured.’”

It may seem as if lord Clarendon did not think the four hundred country gentlemen competent even to direct the application of money which they had granted, for as Mr. Hatsell (3 Prec. 81), notices, his lordship mentioning an appropriation clause proposed by sir George Downing, expresses himself thus: ‘The Solicitor General brought in the Bill for Supply, according to course, in that form as those bills for money ought and used to be; and after it had been read a second time, when it was committed, Downing offered his proviso; the end of which was, ‘to make all the money that was to be raised by this bill to be applied only to those ends to which it was given, which was the carrying on the war, and to no other purpose whatsoever, by what authority soever,’ with many other clauses in it so monstrous, that the Solicitor, and many others who were most watchful for the king's service, declared against it as introductive to ‘a commonwealth, and not fit for monarchy.’ Lord Clarendon's Contin. p. 315. See further, in p. 316, 317, et seq. the arguments that were used for and against this proviso, at the Committee of Council, which met in lord Clarendon's bedchamber, he being ill in bed; ‘the King present.’

In the same volume, Mr. Hatsell having occasion to mention some very ancient instances of parliamentary appropriation of grants, and of examination into the particulars of expenditure, says, “The antiquity of this practice of appropriating the grants of Parliament, shews way, and appoint a committee to withdraw for about half an hour to consider the matter for a conference with the Lords about the charge, and upon their report a general charge is carried to the Lords' bar; the principal charge then was for advising to bring over the Irish army, and the single proof was sir Henry Vane, so the impeachment went up for High-Treason though no member would positively say he would make the charge good. So for the bishop of Canterbury there was no impeachment; but a charge in general. And if you take not the

the little foundation there was for the lord Clarendon's observation, "That sir G. Downing's proviso, 'to make all the money that was to be raised applicable only to those ends for which it was given, and to no other purpose whatever,' was introductive of a commonwealth, and not fit for a monarchy." Fortunately this idea of sir G. Downing's was fully adopted at the Revolution, and has from that time been strictly adhered to. It is, however, but doing justice to the character of lord Clarendon (at the same time that he is stated as being averse from the appropriation of the public revenue to the services voted by the House of Commons) to repeat the following anecdote, which is to be found in Welwood's Memoirs, p. 121: "It looks as if Heaven took a more than ordinary care of England, that we did not throw up all our liberties at once, upon the Restoration of king Charles 2.: for though some were for bringing him back upon terms, yet, after he was once come he possessed so entirely the hearts of his people, that they thought nothing was too much for them to grant, or for him to receive. Among other designs to please him, there was one formed at court, to settle such a revenue upon him by parliament, during life, as should place him beyond the necessity of asking more, except in the case of a war, or some such extraordinary occasion. The earl of Southampton, Lord High Treasurer, came heartily into it, out of a mere principle of honour and affection to the king; but Lord Chancellor Clarendon secretly opposed it. It happened that they two had a private conference about the matter; and the Chancellor being earnest to bring the Treasurer to his opinion, took the freedom to tell him, 'That he was better acquainted with the king's temper and inclination than Southampton could reasonably expect to be, having had long and intimate acquaintance with his majesty abroad; and that he knew him so well, that if such a revenue was once settled upon him for life, neither of them two would be of any further use; and they were not in probability to see many more sessions of parliament during that reign.' Southampton was brought over: but this passage could not be kept so secret, but that it came to king Charles's ears; which, together with other things wherein Clarendon was misrepresented to him, proved the true reason why he abandoned him to his enemies." This is confirmed by bp. Burnet; See p. 319.

same course now, but insist upon examining witnesses first, the difficulties will be unanswerable; for is it like that men before they shall see you in earnest will have their names produced against the Earl of Clarendon? If this be your proceeding, we must never expect to impeach a great man more. If you think there is nothing in the charge, leave it; but if you think 'tis worth your while, take heed of making such a dangerous precedent as by neglecting it to wound your liberties; but proceed in the usual way with a general impeachment.

Serj. Maynard. I stand not up to give advice, but to speak to matter of fact in the business of Strafford and Canterbury; I attended that business from the beginning. Sir John Clotworthy informed something against Strafford to be direct treason, that he had assumed an arbitrary power in Ireland, and dispossessed one Savage by force of arms, and undertook to prove it. Sir Henry Vane also told them, that he had a note taken out of his father's cabinet, containing the advice which Strafford gave the king in that case; namely, the king wanting money, and the question being how he should supply it, he replied, 'That if the parliament was refractory and would not, you stand loosed and absolved from rules of government; you have an army in Ireland which you may employ to reduce them.' Then there was a debate whether they should accuse him of treason. And Sir Edward Herbert (the Attorney) said, If you are persuaded the truth is, as is, pretended, you may. And so it was; but when the close committee had examined the business, they moved the House, that some lawyers might be added to them; and had they gone, when they said they were ready, they had not touched one hair of Strafford's head. Then it was considered what was fit to be done: To accuse him of treason would be a dangerous precedent, and if out of many other crimes a treason could be drawn; thereupon it was resolved, not to demand judgment from the Lords, because some articles were not treason. Then it was propounded not to state what his offences were, lest it should give advantage to inferior courts so to proceed; but said, he deserved to be accused of treason; and in conclusion a proviso was added, not to make that case a precedent. For the bishop of Canterbury, the four articles were general and he was long in prison without any proceeding against him; but after long time he demurred, then new articles were framed, on which he died.

Mr. John Vaughan. You have heard a charge opened of a strange nature, and I know not what part of it can be proved, but the reputation of this House is at stake, and of the king too: For, where a charge is brought in by some of your members, whereof one article is, That he should say such words of the king, as by a statute made by you is a premunire, and to give counsel to levy war upon the kingdom; is it agreeable to your duty to the king and kingdom to let it die? For the person concerned, I know not which way his honour can be whole without his giving an answer to this charge; for mark the consequence, if the king should take him to favour again before cleared, will not the world say a person is received to favour again, who gave the king counsel against the kingdom, and traduced the king, and how can he be whole in his honour this way? Objection. But it will be said, we must have ground to put him to answer. Answer. Whether you have ground enough to prove I know not, but you have ground enough to make him answer to clear himself. Suppose those two articles had been charged on a member of this house, what would it have become that member to do? Should he sit still and say, I will make no answer, but see whether the house will make more proof? If he should do so, the not making an answer is reason enough to charge him.—I can give you instances of persons charged in parliament, who, though not nominated, yet being (as it were) pointed at, petitioned that they might answer, and so would any man; but when this is bruited up and down, will not the world say, You never ask the party whether he is guilty? The duke of Suffolk was charged upon Common Fame, and if that were a ground for a charge then (which I do not say it was), so it is in this case; but he moved that he might be heard; and though it was desired he might be committed, yet it was justly rejected till he had answered. Then for the nature of the charge, if it be true, it is very high, but whether it be treason is another matter; it is brought to you under no name, when you make the charge, it becomes you to say what it is; therefore choose a committee to reduce the accusation into heads, and bring them to you, without which you cannot right yourselves, nor him, if innocent.—For the way of it, it cannot be thought fit to publish your witnesses and the matter before-hand; if in private causes the defendant and plaintiff should have a publication before hand, no cause would be rightly judged, much less when you have publication of all which concerns the one, but nothing of the other. Again, if a witness be examined concerning matters in his own knowledge, if he gives evidence, where he is not brought judicially to give it, if he hath testified any thing which brings him within the statute of false news, how can he avoid the penalty? For it is not enough for him to say he knows it, but he must have others to justify it.—As for the persons who bring the charge, they are your own members, which the writs return for honest and discreet men; and if you are satisfied of that, how can you reject their complaint, though grounded upon Common Fame, as all accusations are, seeing they tell you, they can bring proof of what they say?—Then for Common Fame, if a man spends largely, and hath no visible way to get an estate, no man accuseth him to have gotten it unlawfully; yet he may be put to clear himself from what Common Fame charged him with. Upon suspicion of felony, I may bring a man before a magistrate to clear himself; so in the course of indictments and presentments, a charge is given of what things are to be presented; then a proclamation is made, That if any one can give evidence, he may be sworn, but if no evidence appear, yet they may indict. Then it will be said, the oath is a material thing, but we are proceeding without an oath. To this I answer, What this house shall charge is of more authority than the oaths of ordinary witnesses; peers, though not upon oath, are supposed to do right; so are we upon the reputation of our honesty and discretion.

Mr. Laurence Hyde.* I am sensible the house may think me partial, but I shall endeavour to shew myself not so much a son of the earl of Clarendon as a member of this house; and I assure you, that if he shall be found guilty, no man shall appear more against him than I; if not, I hope every one will be for him as much as I; let every man upon his conscience think what of this charge is true, for I believe that if one article be proved, he will own himself guilty of all.

Sir Heneage Finch. An Impeachment there must be, if there be cause; such accusations are not to be passed over in silence. I believe not one truth in the law more than this proposition, That there is no such thing as Treason by common law, or by equity, and we hold our lives by that law: Before the 25th of Edw. 3, a man could scarce speak any thing but it was Treason, in parliament or out; but no man ought to die as a traitor, who hath not literally offended that law, or some other made since: There is indeed in that law a proviso about the parliament's declaring what is Treason; but note the danger of taking declaratory powers, which I fear hath brought us into a reckoning of blood, which we have not yet paid for. The power of parliaments is double, Legislative, which hath no bounds; Declaratory, by pronouncing judgments. And though I know not what the Legislative power of a parliament cannot do, yet it is not in the power of the parliament, king, lords nor commons, to declare any thing to be Treason, which is not in the common law felony before. The proviso in Strafford's case was, it is true, made for inferior courts; but I hope we shall not so proceed as must needs draw after it a Ne trahatur in exemplum; and your own act this parliament shews, that all done by Strafford, apart, or together, was not Treason: And it behoves us to take heed we thwart not our own argument.—For the manner, then, consider how you should proceed if it were out of parliament, and how the bringing of it into this House alters it. If it were out of parliament, without doubt the accusation should be proved before-hand, and those who discover it are guilty of felony. This provides for the subject, that the witnesses must be two, and for the king, that none shall discover the evidence. But suppose the charge be for misdemeanours, the trial then is not to be by the Lords, but by the Commons; for the Lords are his peers only in cases capital. How then doth the bringing it into parliament alter the case? If the parliament set aside laws in this case, we should be happy to see law declaring what is the power of parliaments. There is no precedent produced which is singly of weight to guide you, therefore if you proceed, let it be as near as possible by the good old laws; namely, that there be an accusation founded upon an oath, and the evidence kept secret. I propose that way for the very reason that others oppose it, viz. the accusation goes over the kingdom, and it will bring dishonour to the house, the king, and the earl: For the honour of the House it will be hard to say, the charge was brought in upon misinformation. A person accused for advising to bring in arbitrary government, &c. and for saying the king is not fit to govern; if this be true, though it be not Treason in the formality of the law, it deserves no less punishment than if it were; but if not found guilty, consider the case. If one say, A killed a man, and it is not so, must not he give reparation? We have an accusation upon hearsay, but if it be not made good, the blackest scandal which hell can invent, lies at our door.

Then Sir Tho. Meers moving to refer it to the Committee of Grievances:

Mr. Vaughan. You should have put the first question before another had been moved, the earl of Middlesex's* (Cranfield's) case, will not hold parallel; he was accused of bribery, which might be proved by their own books, but this is for scandalizing the king, &c. And where shall the Committee of Grievances enquire about it? You say let them hear the persons. But suppose they be of the Lords' house, Can you send for them? Or if you do, will they come and say it? The matter of this accusation is such, that if it lies in the knowledge of a single person, if he delivers it extrajudicially (which he doth, if not upon oath) he may be undone by it, and hazard his person too: At the Committee of Grievances the persons must be known, and what they can say, and then we may conclude what will follow: Besides, their quality may be such as they cannot be brought, or their discretion such as they will not answer.

Sir Richard Temple. Tell but the Lords that a man in public place hath misbehaved himself, and they will sentence him, if he purge not himself; never yet were witnesses examined before the trial in case of treason or felony, for then if there be two witnesses, a way may be found by poison, or some other way, to take away one.

Serj. Maynard. No man can do what is just, but he must have what is true before him; where life is concerned, you ought to have a moral certainty of the thing, and every one be able to say, Upon this proof, in my conscience, this man is Guilty. Common fame is no ground to accuse a man, where matter of fact is not clear: To say an evil is done, therefore this man hath done it, is strange in morality, more in logic.

Upon the whole Debate* it was voted; "That the Committee do reduce the Accusation to Heads, and present them to this House."

November 6, 1667.

Sir Thomas Littleton reports that the Accusation was reduced to Heads, which he read in his place, and afterwards delivered the same in at the clerk's table, which are as followeth, viz.

I. "That the earl of Clarendon hath designed a standing army to be raised, and to govern the kingdom thereby, and advised the king to dissolve this present parliament, to lay aside all thoughts of parliaments for the future, to govern by a military power, and to maintain the same by Free Quarter and Contribution.

II. "That he hath, in the hearing of the king's subjects, falsely and seditiously said, That the king was in his heart a Papist,—Popishly affected, or words to that effect.

III. "That he hath received great sums of Money for the procuring of the Canary Patent, and other illegal Patents, and granted illegal Injunctions to stop proceedings at law against them, and other illegal Patents formerly granted.

IV. "That he hath advised and procured divers of his majesty's subjects to be imprisoned against law, in remote islands, garrisons, and other places, thereby to prevent them from the benefit of the law, and to produce precedents for the imprisoning any other of his majesty's subjects in like manner.

V. "That he hath corruptly sold several offices, contrary to law.

VI. "That he procured his majesty's Customs to be farmed at under rates, knowing the same; and great pretended Debts to be paid by his majesty, to the payment of which his majesty was not in strictness bound; and hath received great sums of money for procuring the same.

VII. "That he received great sums of money from the Company of Vintners, or some of them, or their agents, for enhancing the prices of Wines; and for freeing of them from the payments of legal Penalties, which they had incurred.

VIII. "That he hath, in short time, gained to himself a greater estate than can be imagined.

to be lawfully gained in so short a time*; and, contrary to his oath, hath procured several Grants, under the great seal, from his majesty, to himself, and his relations, of several of his

* There is not any proof of corruption in Clarendon. He is said, indeed, to have been privy to Charles the Second's receipt of money from Lewis the Fourteenth. But of this charge (a heavy charge we may with Mr. Fox admit it to be) no proofs have been advanced. Of his averseness to corruption, Burnet relates an anecdote which should be here mentioned in honour of Clarendon.

"At this time Monsieur Fouquet was gaining an ascendant in the counsels of France, Cardinal Mazarin falling then into a languishing, of which he died a year after. He sent one over to the king with a project of an alliance between France and England. He was addressed first to the earl of Clarendon, to whom he enlarged on all the heads of the scheme he had brought, of which the match with Portugal was a main article. And, to make all go down the better, Fouquet desired to enter into a particular friendship with the earl of Clarendon; and sent him the offer of 10,000*l.*, and assured him of the renewing the same present every year. The lord Clarendon told him, he would lay all that related to the king faithfully before him, and give him his answer in a little time: But for what related to himself, he said, he served a great and bountiful master, who knew well how to support and reward his servants: He would ever serve him faithfully; and, because he knew he must serve those from whom he accepted the hire, therefore he rejected the offer with great indignation. He laid before the king the heads of the proposed alliance, which required much consultation. But in the next place he told both the king and his brother what had been offered to himself. They both advised him to accept of it. Why, said he, have you a mind that I should betray you? The king answered, he knew nothing could corrupt him. Then, said he, you know me better than I do myself: For if I take the money I shall find the sweet of it, and study to have it continued to me by deserving it. He told them, how he had rejected the offer; and very seriously warned the king of the danger he saw he might fall into, if he suffered any of those, who served him, to be once pensioners to other princes: Those presents were made only to bias them in their counsels, and to discover secrets by their means: And if the king gave way to it, the taking money would soon grow to a habit, and spread like an infection through the whole court."

The story of the attempt to bribe him is told with more circumstantiality, and in particular, with a lively representation of the peremptory and indignant warmth with which he rejected the pecuniary offer, by lord Clarendon himself, in the 'Continuation,' &c. The conclusion of his narrative is worth insertion.

majesty's lands, hereditaments, and leases; to the disprofit of his majesty.

IX. "That he introduced an arbitrary go-

"That afternoon the king and duke (who was likewise informed of the correspondence) came to the Chancellor, and found him out of humour. He told him, 'that Fouquet could not be an honest man, and that he had no mind to hold that correspondence with him;' and thereupon repeated what had passed in the morning, with much choler: Which made them both laugh at him, saying, 'the French did all their business that way;' and the king told him 'He was a fool,' implying 'that he should take his money.' Whereupon the Chancellor besought him 'not to appear to his servants so unconcerned in matters of that nature, which might produce ill effects;' and desired him to consider, 'what the consequence of his receiving that money, with what secrecy soever, must be. That the French king must either believe that he had received it without his majesty's privy, and so look upon him as a knave fit to be depended upon in any treachery against his master; or that it was with his majesty's approbation, which must needs lessen his esteem of him, that he should permit his servants of the nearest trust to grow rich at the charge of another prince, who might the next day become his enemy.' To which the king smiling made no other reply, 'than that few men were so scrupulous;' and commanded him 'to return a civil answer to M. Fouquet's letter, and to cherish that correspondence, which' he said 'might be useful to him, and could produce no inconveniency.' And so, when La Bastee (who could not forbear to use new importunity with him to receive the money, till he found he was much offended) brought him the cipher, he delivered him his letter for M. Fouquet. And the next week after his return, the king of France writ to him in his own hand, 'that the correspondence M. Fouquet had invited him to, was with his majesty's privy; and that he was well pleased with it.' And so the correspondence continued till that great man's fall: And then the king sent all the letters which had passed, and cipher, to the Chancellor, and writ to him, 'from that time to communicate with all freedom with his ambassador,' which he was before restrained from."

In the Œuvres de Louis XIV. Memoires Historiques, Premiere Partie, p. 66, that king, after stating his motive for wishing the marriage of Charles the 2nd, with the Princess of Portugal, gives the following account of his unsuccessful attempt to bribe Clarendon:

"Je n'oubliai donc rien pour le porter à ce mariage, et parce que c'est une cour où l'on fait d'ordinaire beaucoup par l'argent, et que les ministres en cette nation ont été fort souvent suspects d'être pensionnaires d'Espagne, et que le chancelier Hyde, très-babile homme pour le dedans du royaume, paroissoit alors avoir un fort grand pouvoir sur l'esprit du Roi, je liai avec lui en particulier une négociation très-se-vernment in his majesty's Plantations; and hath caused such as complained thereof before his majesty and council, to be long imprisoned for so doing.

X. "That he did reject and frustrate a Proposal and undertaking, approved by his majesty, for the preservation of Nevis and St. Christopher's, and reducing the French Plantations to his majesty's obedience, after the commissions were drawn up for that purpose; which was the occasion of our great losses and damages in those parts.

XI. "That he advised and effected the Sale of Dunkirk to the French king, being part of his majesty's dominions; together with the ammunition, artillery, and all sorts of stores there; and for no greater value, than the said ammunition, artillery and stores, were worth.

XII. "That the said earl did unduly cause his majesty's letters patents, under the great seal to one Dr. Croucher, to be altered, and the enrolement thereof to be unduly razed.

XIII. "That he hath, in an arbitrary way, examined, and drawn into question, divers of his majesty's subjects, concerning their lands, tenements, goods and chattels, and properties; determined thereof at the council-table; and stopped proceedings at law, by order of the council-table; and threatened some that pleaded the statutes of 17 Car. 1.

XIV. "That he hath caused Quo Warrantos to be issued out against most of the corporations of England, immediately after their charters were confirmed by act of parliament; to the intent he might receive great sums of money from them, for renewing their charters; which when they complied withal, he caused the said Quo Warrantos to be discharged, or prosecution thereupon to cease.

Il refusa mes offres avec d'autant plus de mérite, qu'en même temps il avoua à cet envoyé, qu'il étoit lui-même d'avis du mariage de Portugal pour l'intérêt du Roi son maître, à qui il le fit après cela parler en secret."

XVI. "That he hath deluded and betrayed his majesty and the nation in foreign treaties and negotiations, relating to the late war: and discovered and betrayed his secret counsels to his enemies.

XVII. "That he was a principal author of the fatal counsel of dividing the fleet about June 1666."

Mr. Edw. Seymour, after having charged the lord chancellor, in general, thus expressed himself: He makes the earth groan by his building* (the monument of his greatness) as we have done under his oppression: And speaking of the king's being a papist, said, As if the ills he had done must be supported by greater.

Sir Tho. Littleton. [On presenting the Articles.] If he did not the crimes alledged, he is able to clear it upon others; he winned after a peace. At the beginning of the war he had no preparations. The wind was wonderfully in a corner, that the Dutch could not come out. He gave perpetual assurance that the French would not come out. he made plots, and a committee of Lords and Commons were appointed to enquire; but all came to no effect; nothing discovered. He made those plots as a ground to raise an army. The Commons do of course send to the Lords. The course is that the Lords do desire him to be secured.

Lord Cornbury†. If any one Article in this Charge be proved lord Clarendon will submit to the rest.

Another particular touching the dividing the fleet, being delivered in, was added to the rest; and the Heads again read at the table; on which a debate arose, whether the Heads of the Accusations brought in against the earl of Clarendon should be referred to a committee to take the proofs.

Mr. Dowdswell moves to have the Heads

* "The king had granted lord Clarendon a large piece of ground near St. James's, to build a house on. He intended a good ordinary house; but not understanding these matters, he was run into a vast charge of 50,000*l*. Some called it Dunkirk-house, intimating that it was built by his share of the price of Dunkirk. Others called it Holland-House, because he was thought to be no friend to the war." Burnet.—Lord Clarendon says himself, that he was not so much ashamed of any one thing he had done, as he was of the vast expence he had made in the building of his house, which had more contributed to that gust of envy that had so violently shaken him, than any misdemeanor that he was thought to have been guilty of. He adds, that it cost a third part more than he intended. Life, p. 512.

† The earl of Clarendon's eldest son. "He was so provoked at the ill usage his father met with, that he struck in violently with the party that opposed the court." Burnet.—On king James's accession he was made Lord Privy Seal, and died in 1709.

mitted to enquire the truth, and argues that common fame is not sufficient to bring him upon the stage..

Sir F. Goodrick seconds it, because new matter was now added to what was formerly charged viva voce in the house.

Sir R. Howard. Suppose the earl innocent, and yet charged and imprisoned (which is the worst of the case) he afterwards appears innocent and is discharged, receiving no more hurt than other subjects have done; namely, one great man lately, (the duke of Buckingham *.) Object. But why should you commit him? Ans. For proof, whether the articles be true or not; suppose men for self-preservation will not venture to come, not knowing how they may trust themselves, and so you have no proof, he very guilty, and you not able to proceed; is the inconveniency greater for an innocent person if he prove so, to suffer a few days, than for you to lose your reputation for ever. If this man be not brought to his trial, it may force him to fly to that which he counselled, that is, that we may never have parliament more.

Sir John Goodrick would have the gentleman make his own case. Moves that the impeachment may not go out of the house, till recommended to a grand committee.

Col. Birch † said that sir W. Pennyman, an evidence against lord Strafford, was checked for not offering to give his evidence.

Mr. Vaughan. You admit the Accusation to be matter for a charge, if the committee find proof; if you intend to make this a distinct case I leave it to you; but if this be to settle the course of the proceedings of the house, I am against it; for this is ordering a way of proceeding in the earl's case, which shall not be a general rule. Though I cannot say one of the articles to be true, yet I know them to be a full charge if made good, and you are prescribing a course neither proper nor ever practised. A witness who speaks without oath is subject to damage; not so upon oath, because the law compels him: and whereas it hath been said, if witnesses attest before the House of Commons, what judges dare meddle in it; I answer such judges are meddled in the Case of sir John Elliot, &c. and the Ship Money.

* See an account of this business, 4 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 341.

† "Col. Birch was a man of a peculiar character. He had been a carrier at first, and retained still, even to an affectation, the clownishness of his education. He got up in the progress of the war to be a colonel, and to be concerned in the excise. And at the restoration he was found to be so useful in managing the excise, that he was put in a good post. He was the roughest and boldest speaker in the house, and talked in the language and phrases of a carrier; but with a beauty and eloquence that was always acceptable. He spoke always with much life and heat; but judgment was not his talent." Burnet.

Sir John Holland. No man impeached in the House of Commons but blasted for ever after; therefore we should be wary how we proceed. If any person will undertake to make it good, as sir Henry Vane did lord Strafford's impeachment, he is for an impeachment.

Mr. Seymour, speaking of precedents, said, that precedents in the church by the fathers are rather to facilitate assent, than impose belief—fitter for lower courts than a parliament. As soon as their own matter is accorded, treason is done away, as in the late precedents. One argument of the earl's guilt is, that he has not put himself upon his trial all this while. We are now disputing whether we shall ever impeach any person. Of his own knowledge many persons have been menaced in case they give evidence. 'Serpens qui serpentem devorat fit draco.' Lord Clarendon has reserved to himself the monopoly of bribes. He says he has a moral assurance of the proof of all his charge.

Sir R. Howard. If we proceed only by the common law, we may be censured at some of the bars below; we must do it to satisfy and then not satisfy by doing it. Though common law has its proper sphere, 'tis not in this place, we are in a higher sphere. If impeachments of this nature be not allowed, we have no way left of impeaching a great person. M. de la Pole so charged, and lord chancellor, who then governed all, and probably in the fault then.

Sir Henry North says, the amends he can make for any impertinency is not to hold them long. Understands the charge upon common fame only. Being without evidence, moves to have the articles argued head by head, what they amount unto.

Sir Rob. Atkins. We have things at the third hand; persons without doors say they know it by information. Urges the shame of accusing an innocent person; and credulous persons will retain some of the accusations, though false.

Sir W. Lowther. In parliament 1 Car. common fame was a good ground of proceeding in any accusation from the House of Commons. Resolved then upon the question in Dr. Turner's case against the duke of Buckingham.

Sir Tho. Strickland. Lord Strafford complained of nothing done before his trial, but at his trial, and put it home to the Lords as their own case in accumulative treason. The hardship he rejects, but the easy one in proceeding he would have. Never knew a child named before born, and so would not have the impeachment.

Mr. Waller.* The door was locked in the debate of lord Strafford's and the abp. of Canterbury's case. The reason, because of the greatness of the men. The king might dissolve the parliament before the impeachment.

* "Waller was the delight of the house: and even at 80 he said the liveliest things of any among them. He was only concerned to say that which should make him be applauded, He deserves the character of being one of the great refiners of our language and poetry: He was for near 60 years one of the best of our writers that way," Burnet. See also Johnson's Life of him.

Sir R. Temple. In several impeachments no witness but from impeachments without doors. Grand juries present upon their own knowledge, and if the fact known by any, bound to present. M. de la Pole was impeached, for common fame. When voted impeached, then time to inform a committee for accusations.

Sir John Holland. In lord Strafford's case information was to the committee of grievances by sir John Clotworthy—He moves for particular charge before impeached—Torches afar off make a greater show than near at hand. From lord Bacon.

Sir Ch. Wheeler. Charges him with countenancing the Non-conformists. He charges the clergy with drunkenness in the proclamation, forgetting gluttony, himself so guilty of, he made many a poor gentleman believe at Paris, that he came from his Embassy in Spain, full of money—he sent prince Rupert into Germany—engrosses all money and counsels—corresponds with Cromwell, and had money from him—oppressed the duke of York, till his alliance with his daughter.

The question being then put, that the Heads of the Accusation be referred to a Committee to take the Proofs, and Report; it passed in the affirmative 194, to 128. The House then proceeded on the Heads of Accusation.

November 7.

The House resumed the farther consideration of the Heads of the Accusation delivered in against the earl of Clarendon.

*Sir Tho. Osborne. The king ready to change his religion!—no money remaining—no person in employment, but who can buy it—we are upon our last legs—no one man ever had more employments—threatens any man that gave advice—no vessel to swim without his hand at the rudder—no money issued out of the treasury without his approbation.—Sir Wm. Coventry brought orders out of the chancellor's closet, when the king was with him—if any other men had the thoughts, they had not the power—he has no pique against him, but

* Sir Tho. Osborne was a very plausible speaker, but too copious, and could not easily make an end of his discourse. He had been always among the high cavaliers, and missing preferment, he had opposed the court much, and was one of lord Clarendon's bitterest enemies." Burnet.—He was afterwards made Lord Treasurer and earl of Danby, and at last duke of Leeds.

† This expression (said by lord Clarendon himself to have been laid to his charge by Mr. Seymour) was, "That 400 country gentlemen were only fit to give money, and did not know how an invasion was to be resisted." Life, p. 445.

as he is one of the 400† (of the House of Commons) thought by the Chancellor useless and inconsiderable.

The First Article read.

Sir Rob. Howard heard from persons of quality, That it would be proved.

The Second Article was read.

Lord St. John. Persons of great quality have assured him to make it good, and if they perform not, he will acquaint the house who they are.

The Third Article read.

Mr. Ed. Seymour. Sufficient persons will make it good, with this addition, when he received the money, he said, 'so long as the king is king, and I lord chancellor, the patent will stand.'

The Fourth and Fifth Articles read:

Sir R. Temple. Divers have undertaken to make them good; if they do not I will name them.

About the receiving Money of Vintners.

Sir Rob. Carr. That he knows who will prove it.

About his getting a great Estate so suddenly.

Mr. Ed. Seymour. I suppose you need no proof, the sun shines at noon day.

Sir T. Littleton. The matter of fact in the Article is easily made out, for his place as chancellor could not be worth above 4 or 5,000*l.* per ann.

About introducing an Arbitrary Government in the Plantations.

Sir T. Littleton and sir T. Osborne alledged, that one Farmer and others came from the Barbadoes to complain of it, and lodged their petition in this house, but were imprisoned that they might not be heard.

About frustrating Proposals for preserving Nevis, &c.

Sir Ch. Wheeler. The war, fire, and plague, not so great a loss as Nevis and St. Christopher's. Nevis worth 20,000*l.* per ann. to the king, and he receives not a shilling of it.

About the Sale of Dunkirk.

Sir T. Osborne said, a great lord told him that the earl had made a bargain for Dunkirk three quarters of a year before it was known.

Mr. Waller. Paying for Dunkirk would entitle it to the crown, and us to the keeping it. The king might as well sell the Isle of Wight.

Mr. H. Coventry. It is as much treason to part with Dunkirk, as disband the guards; both being mentioned in the preamble of the act for supplying the king.

Sir R. Howard, thinks it was treason to sell the guards, if any enemy was in being. It is the way to confirm somebody else in the sale of Tangier too. A great man has said, if it could not be kept, it might be sold. He has heard the king of France should say, he hoped his next purchase should be London.

Mr. Prynce never heard that the selling a place with the king's consent, and the king had the money, was treason; but delivering a fort before reduced to extremity, is treason

Mr. Vaughan. Dunkirk was an acquisition by arms, and therefore not alienable: Tangier, a portion with his wife, and therefore he might dispose of it. Dunkirk as much the king's dominion as Scotland or Ireland, and to sell it is treason by the law.

Sir Edw. Harley*. The king, apprehending that the Spanish ambassador might importune him for it, bid him prepare an act for annexing it to the crown of England. The Act of 1,500,000*l.* does, he conceives, declare it to be part of the king's dominions. He left there, in ready money, as appears, 9,640*l.* according to the settlement of 600*l.* a week. A place of extraordinary relief to us.

Mr. Swynfin, in the charge of corresponding with Cromwell, alleges the act of indemnity.

Mr. Vaughan. The chancellor might, in his defence, plead that or any other pardon, from the king.

Sir R. Howard would have him plead to it, that they may know the king's enemies from his friends.

Mr. Dodswell let slip a word, viz. 'violent stream against the chancellor;' called to the bar by many; at last put to explain himself; he professed no reflective intention, and humbly craved the pardon of the house.

Mr. Hampden† spoke to that part of the act of indemnity, wherein the person grieved should have his treble damages in any court.

Sir John Denham‡. The lord chancellor could not be out-lawed; but he is not clear in equity.—This Article was accordingly left out.

Mr. Thomas will make good, when it is convenient, the article of council-table-orders, against law.

Sir Edw. Masters asserts the article of Quo Warrantos for the corporation of Canterbury.

The 16th Article was then read.

Sir R. Howard. No man can deny that corresponding with the king's enemies is treason. If it be not, treason has neither name nor definition.

Sir T. Littleton. Deluding his majesty in all foreign treaties relating to the late war. Setting out no navy, in expectation of peace, and has undertaken that the French would not engage against us, this last summer, when we expected a peace in April, and had it not till August.

Mr. Waller. He might hold correspondence

* He was governor of Dunkirk when that town was sold, he strenuously opposed the sale of Dunkirk, and by his interest in the house of commons procured a bill to be brought in, at the Restoration, for annexing it inseparably to the crown. But it was laid aside after being once read.

† Eldest son of the famous patriot. He had before been chosen one of the five Knights of the shire for Bucks, by the Protector in his parliament 1656, who also about the same time created him a lord, or a member of his upper house. Ath. Oxon. vol. 2.

with the king's enemies, and not betray him to his enemies.*

Lord Vaughan desires that betraying his secret counsels may be put into the Article; it will be made out by a person of honour, that he would have discovered his secret counsels to his enemies. He spoke thrice to this.

Sir John Holland moves that it may be declared by the members who gave the inducement for this head, whether they received information from a foreigner or not.

Mr. Henry Coventry. Possibly a foreign ambassador, and no oath can be given him.

Mr. Vaughan. Achilles was said to be shot-free, and some would have the king to be treason-free. Positively says, it must be from a foreigner, or no way.

Lord Vaughan. Tied upon his honour not to discover the persons. At last, after some time, brings this answer in writing to the table, 'That lord Clarendon hath deluded his majesty and the nation in foreign treaties and negotiations relating to the late war, and discovered his majesty's secret counsels to his enemies.'

The question being propounded, That it may be declared, by the members that gave the inducement for this Head, whether they received information from a Foreigner, or not; and the question being put, that the question be put, it passed in the negative. It was then resolved That these words; 'and discovered and betrayed his secret counsels to his enemies,' be added to that Head.

The 16th Article being then read, as amended, and the question being put, That the earl of Clarendon, upon this Head, be impeached of Treason, it passed in the affirmative 161 to 89.

About Sealing Dr. Crowther's Patent.

Mr. Street. The king gives the living to Crowther, in the grant is a mistake of a county, Crowther finds the mistake, and petitions the king to amend it; the king calls for the chancellor and seal, and in the king's presence it was amended and sealed.

Sir Thomas Littleton. The crime seems as great as a Chancellor could commit; the king was to present by such a day, or not at all; the Error was found after the day, so that the king (by act of parliament) had lost his right. The Chancellor did alter the patent, and the record was fetched away by one of the Chancellor's servants, and brought back, rased and altered, which might be done (and in other cases is done) where a word only hath been mistaken; but that is in case of something perfectly in the king's power, and to save new seal-

* "This was no sooner said than a young confident man, the lord Vaughan, son to the earl of Carbery, a person of as ill a face as fame, his looks and his manner both extreme bad, asked for the paper that had been presented from the committee, and with his own hand entered these words, 'That being a privy counsellor, he had betrayed the king's secrets to the enemy.'" Lord Clarendon's Life, ing; but here could be no new sealing, the time being elapsed: It was to throw another man out of his freehold, and is a great crime.

About drawing Mens Lands into Question.

Mr. Thomas. I shall be able to make it out.

About Quo Warrantos to Corporations.

Sir Thomas Littleton. This is so public a thing, that it need not be proved.

About the Settlement of Ireland.

Sir R. Howard. I doubt not but it will be made out.

About Foreign Treaties.

Sir Thomas Littleton. This will appear by the Treaties themselves, putting us in hopes of peace, and so hindering the Fleet's setting out.

About Mischance of the War.

Mr. Thomas. I want not persons to bring to make it good.

Sir Thomas Littleton. Sir Edward Sprag desires money to give an intelligencer, and has it; Sprag brings the intelligencer to the king, the king commands him to meet him at the Chancellor's, there he met the king, and then order was given to divide the Fleet.

Mr. Marrell chargeth Mr. Seymour with saying in his Accusation, That the king was insufficient for government, which is now omitted in the Charge, and desires he may declare where he had it.

Mr. Seymour. The party that told me at first differed something afterwards, therefore I rather withdraw it than to trouble you with uncertainties; but a gentleman in the House can give you further satisfaction in it.

Sir John Denham. A peer of the land heard the earl of Clarendon say in a coach, That the king was an unactive person and indisposed for government: This will be made good.

Upon debate it appearing probable that these Words were spoken before the Act of Oblivion, it passed over.

About the Customs.

Sir R. Temple. I have been informed that he had a share for underletting the customs, and 40,000*l.* bribe for getting pretended debts from the king.

Sir Tho. Osborne. The earl of Clarendon said, bid who would for the customs, none should have them but the old farmers.

Mr. Prynne. Having gone over the Articles, we should know where and when the words were spoken.

Mr. Seymour. That will be a way to suppress the evidence. I hope you will impeach him at the Lords bar, and in due time produce your witnesses.

Mr. Prynne. You must resolve to impeach him of treason, or misdemeanor, and name it accordingly.

Sir Ed. Walpole. You ought first to give a Title to your Impeachment; for if it be for treason, you will move for commitment; if it be for impeachment in general, not.

Mr. Coleman. What is laid before you is only by hear-say, but no assurance that it will be made good; only that if they who reported it do not make it good, you shall know who they are. In the earl of Strafford's case (the worst of precedents) the House proceeded not, till one spake in the House upon his own knowledge, and another engaged his reputation to make it good.

Sir Rob. Atkins. Those who have given you inducements to proceed, do it at third hand, and though they may know the credit and impartiality of those that told them, yet you do not.

Sir Tho. Littleton. A question should be put, Whether this House hath sufficient inducement to impeach? Afterwards consider what the title shall be, then appoint a committee to frame articles.

Which question being put, was carried in the affirmative. Then adjourned.

November 9.

The first Article read.

Sir John Goodrick. Treason ought to terminate in an overt act, which designing is not, therefore pray read the statutes. Thereupon sundry statutes were read: viz. 25 Ed. 3, 1 Hen. 4, c. 10, 1 Ed. 6, c. 12, 1 Q. Ma. 13 Car. 2, 14 Car. 2, c. 29.

Mr. Steward declared it to be transcendent misdemeanor, but no treason.

Mr. Vaughan. Two questions will be considered, one, Whether what is charged in the Article was treason in common-law before 25 Ed. 3. That so we may understand the nature of treason: the other, Whether by any subsequent act it is made otherwise.

Mr. Waller. The advice given to the king I look upon to be this: to establish a new government; to be governed by Janizaries instead of a parliament; to have a Divan and a great minister of state, instead of Vizier-Bassau, a worse plot than that of the 5th of November: there, if the Lords and Commons had been destroyed, there would have been succession, but here both had been destroyed for ever. Then, in order to the debate, consider how the law looks on it; for though we may accuse on less evidence than she may judge, yet we must be cautious in naming the crime: what therefore doth the law call this before 25 Ed. 3.? Then look whether the power of constructive treason be taken away since.

Sir F. Goodrick. The matter concerns life, therefore we should be wary in the exercise of legislative power; you are not tied to rules, but you are now a step towards judicature: the common-law is Jus non Scriptum, and though every treason includes felony, yet not every felony treason, 25 Ed. 3. There is a declaratory power, whether a thing be treason, or other felony, not whether it be treason, and could not be declared treason if not felony before. In cases capital at common-law, they might declare it treason, but in cases not capital at common-law they never exercised their declaratory power.—Among other things that statute declares false coined money to be treason, which is but felony at common-law; afterward money being imported, which was not according to the stamp, there was no punishment for it, but as a misdemeanor: therefore 4 Hen. 7. Provision is made against that practice, and it is made treason; but if the parliament's declaratory-power could have made it treason, what needed a statute on purpose? So that I cannot think the article before you is treason, it not coming within the words of the statute.

Mr. Vaughan. I shall speak to the first question, whether this article was treason at common-law; and first remove what some have asserted, namely, that nothing is treason, but what was felony before 25 Ed. 3, where petty treason is spoken of, the wife killing the husband, &c. These words follow, if hereafter it come into question whether there be another treason? It shall not be resolved by the judges, till the parliament determine it; for in petty treason, if it be treason, it must be felony, because there is killing.—Then comes more, whether raising, &c. and it follows whether it be felony or trespass: and the thing itself is more strange. None ever doubted, but that all treasons of 25 Ed. 3, was treason before, and was so resolved 12 queen Eliz. That by that act the king declares what should be treason: namely, if any man vitiates the king's eldest daughter, &c. But by this doctrine if it were not treason, what was it? Only adultery or fornication, when it is the eldest daughter, not the youngest.—It hath been in all ages a reputation to persons who have been counsellors to princes according to emergencies to give counsel to extricate them out of danger, and therefore hard to tax a minister of state in a case which he acquaints his master with; for there can be no treason but against the king himself.—I will shew you what I mean, it is true this is a treason which cannot arise from misprision, because it was spoke to the king himself; but as a minister of state he has liberty to give counsel for the king's safety. If a person be able to inform his master what alliances are good for him, it is his duty; so what trades are profitable, what not, &c. So where men or money are wanting, to advise how to extricate is commendable; but when it comes to this, that he breaks in upon the laws, invading the contract between the king and his subjects, it will be as if a man adviseth, that if the king wants money, he may set up high-way men to take it, and bring it to him, and so the skillfullest for breaking the law shall be esteemed the best counsellor; therefore whoever thinks to serve his prince by breaking the laws, he is so far from a wise man, that he is the highest criminal, &c. Then for the nature of the thing, the treasons declared 25 Ed. 3, were declared by the king's commission, and the treasons were of that nature which concerned counsel, &c. they were not like to be declared. And there is a passage in Glanvil, called 'Seductio Domini Regis,' that is, deceiving the king to what is pernicious to him; and his people.—

Now see the nature of this crime: if a man counsel his prince, and practise it such a way as shall render him prince of conscience, who hath broken his oath, and all this to his injury, so that he hath no assent to it. Compare this with any treason of 25 Ed. 3. Consider it: Here is a person who gives the king advice, which at once must make his people see he hath broken all his faith to his kingdom (and is not the counsel of governing by an army such?) all the laws broken, to keep which the king has sworn, and this the king put upon, though not inclined to: I assert not this upon the earl of Clarendon, but upon the article. Who doth this counsels the highest treason against the common-law, because others are so; but if a man will pretend to give counsel, wherein many shall have no benefit by the law, he breaks all parts, and therefore I think this counsel was treason at common-law.

Mr. Coleman. The question is, Whether it be in your power to declare this article treason by 25 Ed. 3. If he advised an army against the king's consent, it is against the statute; but I suppose that the expression in the article was advice to the king in aid of his government. Your enacting power is a kind of omnipotency, but in a declaratory power you can declare no more than is committed to you, and with safety to the subject you cannot declare this treason: Then what must be our rule in declaring I dare not say: for scarce any man can tell what was treason before 25 Ed. 3, was made to bring things to a certainty, and what was uncertain to them who made that law cannot be certain to us now. As the judges can declare no other treason, so in your declaratory power, neither can you declare treason unless there be resemblance to some other like case: The advice said in the article to be given the king, cannot be within that statute, unless the counsellor must run the hazard of his advice.

Mr. Vaughan. The greatest declarations of treasons which ever were, equal not those 22 Rich. 2, in Nottingham castle: the Judges are called to deliver their Opinions upon their faith, and they declare the acts to be treason, because felony before, and though some of them were hanged for it, yet the parliament declared the same thing.

Serj. Maynard. Was what is mentioned, treason by the common law, though so said by the Lords? and what was so declared was repealed, 11. 4.

Sir Tho. Littleton. Pray resolve whether it was treason by common law; and if so, when made so. Some think not, because they find not the parliament declaring them treasons, as being so at common law, and that that statute was made to bound them, but that was only to bound inferior courts, not themselves; for the parliament makes not a new crime, and then condemns it, but the crime was before, and the parliament declares it.

Sir Ed. Thurloe. Hath the parliament declaratory power now? Yes, but it must be by king and parliament, so it was in the case of the Genoa Ambassador.* The Judges would not conclude the articles treason, nor would the Lords alone; and if you come to an equal declarative power with them, you must examine witnesses, or go by a bill.

Serj. Curleton. The question is, Whether it be treason by the practice of England; the common law is the custom of England, and the usage is grounded on precedents. I know not one precedent where words or intentions were treason at common law, for they are not treason where no act follows.

Sir R. Temple. The article is treason by common law, and judges have recourse to Glanvil, &c. who say, that giving advice to overthrow the realm is treason by common law.

Serj. Maynard. The question is, Whether he shall be impeached of treason upon this article? If you go to treason at common law before 25 Ed. 3, you fly out of sight, for the word Seductio was soon after called Seditio, seducing, but not said to what; nor were those authors ever reputed of authority: It is true they are sometimes quoted for ornament, but not argument, and not one case in one hundred of Glanvil is law; but when a case comes that is the sheet-anchor of life, and estate, you should be wary; for by wit and oratory that may be made treason which is not; and this which is a great crime ought not, because great, to be made treason.—Object. But it will be said, levying war against the law, is against the king, and here was an intent to alter the law.—Ans. True; yet a design to levy war is not treason within the statute, here is nothing of act, but words to that end: If a counsellor gives bad advice, it makes it not treason, but by a bill it may be made what you please. By that statute of 25 Ed. 3, are more treasons than are mentioned; for it saith if any case happen, the judges shall stay till the king and parliament hath declared, so that there is a power, but the modus is the question, whether by impeachment or bill; you may the latter, not the former. It was done in Strafford's Case;† but you have repealed it, and have said 'None of which pretended crimes are treason;' and what was pretended against him? That he had traitorously endeavoured (which is worse than designed) to alter the government, &c. Now where is the difference? Here is advice to raise an army, there to use an army raised, and these you have called pretended crimes, and no treason, which is not comprehended by a law; but to impeach as a traitor, and yet the thing no treason, is strange.

* See this Case 3 Co. Inst. p. 8. Rot. Parl. 3 Ric. 2, No. 18. Placit. coram Rege Hil. 3 Ric. 2, Rot. 8. 12. Co. Rep. 16. Holin. Chron. vol. 3. p. 422. Killing the King's Ambassador had formerly at the common law been adjudged Treason, 22 E. 3. Assis. pl. 49. and may still be so by Parliament, for the statute of 25 E. 3, is a restraint only upon the Judges, but not upon the Parliament.

† See vol. 3, p. 1381.

In this house, other than by bill, you have no power; you carry your impeachment to the Lords, and they may give judgment without coming back to you; declaring by bill is by way of judgment, but as an impeachment, is only an accusation: so that whatsoever the consequence is, the Lords judge it, and it never comes back to you; and if you go by bill you make it treason ex post facto.

Mr. Vaughan. Concerning what you have declared about Strafford's, that this case is, if not less, equal to it, and you have declared that not one charge against him is treason, is true thus far; when that act was made I repaired to it, because there were some things which should not have passed so, if there had not been something to secure such charges as these; for there is no expression of any particular charge, but that the charge against the earl of Strafford was not, in the particular, treason; and in the close of the Bill, it is said, that the whole proceeding shall be taken away: and if so, no man should speak against the particulars, but look on it as repealed.—Then, this is said to be levying war, and it is true, it must be actual, and so not within the charge. And the charge against Spencer was for counseling the king, &c. and is called levying war against the kingdom, and the judgment against him was but banishment; because the sentence was mitigated at the instance of the king.—And for counsel, though counsel is given but in words, yet words are more than counsel, and are an action, otherwise a counsellor is sworn to nothing.—But it may be thought I have not dealt ingenuously with the house, than which I abhor nothing more; when the case of Strafford was before the Lords, I was of opinion the Parliament had no declarative power left, because 1 Hen. 4, there was an abolishing of all declared treason, and that no treason for the future should be so, and then the treason about the Genoa ambassador was gone, and all declared treasons were gone, 1 Hen. 4, and no statute hath recovered them; and if all actual treasons were taken away, 1 Hen. 4, or if not then, 1 Ed. 6, then what doth the first of queen Mary do, unless it take away all declaratory treason?

Upon the whole, the question was, Whether to accuse of treason upon the first Article?

Yeas, 103. Noes, 172.

November 11.

The Second Article was read.

Mr. Prynn. Let the Act made by you, about defending the king, be read, because it limits prosecution to a time, to see if this be within time.

Mr. Vaughan. In things wherein there is a public defaming the king, it becomes no man here to defend the person accused; if the charge be not proved, let the party himself plead it; you had that which induced you to impeach him, and have declared not to impeach of treason upon, the first Article: and if any man will add to the rest of the Articles he may, but you ought to accuse.

Mr. Solicitor Finch. None accuseth but for justice sake, and should be glad if the party accused prove himself innocent. There is a duty to the king, and to truth, and it is not fit that an article of this kind, brought into the House, should be laid by, upon pretence that the time is elapsed; for the crime is more than what is mentioned in the act made by you; it is an offence at common law, and if it be prosecuted by fine and imprisonment, no time is limited.

The Third and Fourth Articles read and voted.

Mr. Vaughan. Your reading every Article is needless, unless it be to see whether any one may be charged as treason, for if one may be objected against, so may all, as to misdemeanors.

Fifth Article read.

Sir John Shaw. The Old Farmers had not the customs till others said they would give no more, and they had no reason to thank the Chancellor, because they gave more than others: and I declare upon my life I know no reward given him.

Sir Thomas Littleton. It appears by the Farmers confession that they had it 50,000*l*. under, besides time of payment, which was 30,000*l*. more.

Mr. Seymour. You are at liberty to receive objections to the Articles, but though others bade more, they were told they should not have it, and had about 1,000*l*. each given them to bid no more.

Sixth, Seventh, Eighth and Ninth Articles read and voted.

The Tenth.

Mr. Vaughan. This is an Article of an high nature, Dunkirk was then as much a part of his majesty's dominions as Ireland, and if the sale of it be nothing, I know not what you would think of it if England should be sold; you lately debated whether on the first Article he should be accused of treason, and found by the statute of 25 Edw. 3 he could not, though it was absolute treason at common law; and it is reported abroad that I said that the right of the parliament in declaring treason is taken away, which I did not, for there are treasons not mentioned in that statute. Therefore it provided that the judges should not upon any offence treason proceed to judge, until declared before the king, and parliament, and what is signified by it? If we think before the King, Lords and Commons, that is impossible; for how can the Commons possibly declare before the King and Lords? nor was that the case, but this, that there is the ultimate power of determining what the law is in a doubtful case. In writs of error let them pass from court to court, at last they come to the Lords, 24 Edw. 3. If the judges cannot resolve what the law is, it is to be brought thither, that is, where it is questionable, but that is not in the House of Commons, any more than in a writ of error: how then is the case here? If a question be whether a thing is treason or not, it shall be resolved, where the law useth to resolve, that is, before the king in parliament, that is in the Lords' House. Had the words of the act been these, There shall be no proceeding until resolved by the king in the Lords House, and suppose that clause taken away, that treason shall not be resolved; but suppose it shall be declared otherwise, doth it follow it is taken away? No. If you charge treason which is not within the statute, it is another thing; but I said not, there is no treason at common law.

Mr. Solicitor Finch. There was a great mischief in the declaring treason by parliaments; for Mortimer* was made a traitor for incroaching upon royal power, which every man, who incroacheth upon any power, doth. Hence the Commons petitioned the king to explain what incroaching upon royal power was, and when no Answer could be gotten to it, 25 Edw. 3 they petitioned it might be declared certainly, and so treasons were enumerated; and if the Judges be in doubt, it is provided that the King and parliament shall first declare it.—Declaration in parliament, is a declaration before the King, Lords and Commons. Would our ancestors leave what is to be resolved treason to the Lords, and themselves have no share in it? And Talbot's being declared treason by the Lords, it is said to be no treason by judge Coke (3 Inst. 22.) because the Commons had no hand in it; there is no treason in common law, because there can be no treason where there is no way to judge it, which is not at common law.

Mr. Vaughan. When the law is made uncertain the Lords must declare it; it appears there were treasons at common law not mentioned, 25 Edw. 3. It is one thing for a matter to be treason, before, and the parliament declare it; another, for the parliament to make a thing treason which was not.

Sir W. Lewis. I desire to be resolved, whether Dunkirk was annexed to England, because a bill to that end was carried, but not passed.

Mr. Waller. To shew that Dunkirk was annexed to England, consider we were passing a bill for 1,200,000*l*. But when we were making a preamble to the bill, we were to seek for reasons for giving the money, seeing we had no war, some said to keep Dunkirk, but we were told we should take heed of looking upon it as annexed unto the crown; but it was replied, Dunkirk was looked upon as a frontier town, and accordingly noted in the bill. Therefore the sale of it treason.

Mr. Coveney. Had it been part of the crown of England, what needed a bill to make it so?

Mr. Frynne. It cannot be treason, because sold by the king's consent.

* See No. 8; vol. 1. p. 51.

Mr. Vaughan. If the king agreed to it, doth it follow that he, who adviseth the king to a thing destructive to his kingdom and king, is not a traitor? If any part of the king's dominions may be alienated, especially when a parliament is sitting, for they concurring, it may be alienated; by the same reason the king may alienate Ireland or England too without the parliament. For by what act of parliament doth the king hold Ireland or England? It is by acquisition; I say not Tangier, for that was part of his portion, and is his own: but Dunkirk would have been the kingdom's if not thus disposed of; and though it might have been alienated with the parliament, it could no more without, than England or Ireland.

Mr. Ed. Hartl. The act of parliament for annexing was not this parliament's, but of the convention, and came in thus: the king was pleased to tell me, that the Spanish ambassador might press him to part with it, which he had no mind to do: therefore he would have a bill to annex it to the crown, which shews it was the king's will to have it annexed; accordingly this parliament passed it, and Dunkirk might have been as useful as Calais.

At length this Article was passed by, without determining whether Treason or not.

Eleventh, Twelfth, Thirteenth, Fourteenth and Fifteenth Articles read and voted.

The Sixteenth Article read.

Lord Vaughan. I brought in this Article; his betraying the king's counsels was to the French king during the war, and that in the secrecy of state, which was the occasion of the late mischiefs.

Sir Tho. Osborne. That is direct adhering to the king's enemies, and if so it is Treason.

Mr. Solicitor Finch. This must be Treason if you have any inducement to believe it.

Sir Rob. Howard. I have heard it from an eye-witness who told it me, and added that we are neither to be trusted nor dealt with, who were so betrayed.

Serjeant Maynard. Betraying the king's counsel to his enemies is doubtless Treason. Corresponding is another thing. Betraying must be without the king's knowledge, otherwise it is but delivering the king's words to his enemies.

Sir John Brampton. Did this information come from a subject, or from one of the king's enemies?

Sir Rob. Howard. I would not have brought your information from one of the king's enemies, nor did I ever converse with them during the war.

Col. Birch. We cannot accuse of Treason except it be said, betraying the king's counsel, or corresponding with his enemies.

Mr. Vaughan. You have declared that you have had inducement to impeach, and ought to put the question, whether on this article he shall be impeached of Treason.

Mr. Solicitor Finch. To betray the king's counsel, taken generally, is not treason, for it may be to the king's friends; but to his enemies, it is if the article be so.

Lord Vaughan. Let it be put, betraying is majesty's secret counsels to his enemies during the war.

Then the question was put, whether these new words delivered by the said Lord Vaughan should be added. And carried in the affirmative.

Sir John Hull. Was this information given by an enemy or by a subject?

Mr. Vaughan. It must come from a foreigner or you could not know it; may not the king have from a foreigner, a discovery of Treason against him? The end of questioning it must be to know the man, for it might as well be asked whether his beard be red or black.

Sir Thomas Mcres. The words are 'discovered,' not 'betrayed,' and discovering may be with the king's consent.

Lord Vaughan. Add the word, 'Betraying,' for so I meant it.

Serjeant Maynard. They who give the information say not they had it from more than one witness, which stat. Ed. 6. requires, and only one of them names the earl of Clarendon.

Mr. Seymour. This exception is proper to be made before the judges.

Then the question was put, Whether to impeach of Treason on this article, Yeas, 161. Noes, 89.

Sir Tho. Littleton. That an impeachment of Treason and other crimes and misdemeanours be carried up to the Lords against him by Mr. Seymour.

Serjeant Maynard. For misdemeanour he may have counsel, not for Treason: Therefore so distinguish the charge that he may have counsel.

Resolved, "That a Charge be carried up."

Resolved, "That the Speaker and the whole House carry it."

November 12.

It being considered that if the Speaker go up with the charge, some dispute might arise about carrying the mace and otherwise; it was Resolved, 'That Mr. Seymour carry it.' Accordingly, he went, where at the bar of the House of Lords, the lord keeper Bridgman being come to the bar to meet him, he delivered himself to this purpose:*

"My Lords;

"The Commons assembled in parliament, having been informed of several traitorous practices, and other high crimes and misde-

* "By a mistake, instead of the earl of Clarendon's impeachment, the earl of Strafford's, which lay on the table, was put into Mr. Seymour's hands, and he was obliged to trust to his memory when he came to the Lords' bar; but he afterwards delivered a paper of the impeachment to the clerk." Grey's Debates.

meanours, committed by Edward earl of Clarendon, a member of this honourable House, have commanded me to impeach him; and I do accordingly impeach him of high-treason and other crimes and misdemeanours in the name of the said Commons, and of all the Commons of England, and they have farther commanded me to desire your lordships to sequester him from parliament, and to commit him to safe custody, and in convenient time they will exhibit articles against him."

November 15.

The Lords sent down to desire a Conference in the Painted Chamber. At which the earl of Oxford delivered a paper in writing (without any debate) the contents whereof were to this effect: "The Lords have not committed the earl of Clarendon, because the Accusation is only of Treason in general, without charging any thing in particular."

Mr. Garraway. I had rather the House should lose the punishment of this man, (though a great offender) than that this House should lose its privilege: for if this House may at no time impeach a lord without giving in particular articles, it may fall out to be at a time (as in the duke of Buckingham's case) where a great man by his interest with the king procured the dissolution of the parliament, and then the accusation falls.*

Mr. Vaughan. Either you can justify your proceedings, so as to satisfy the Lords what you have done, or you cannot; you must name a committee as well to consider what you are to do, if your reasons satisfy not, as to draw those reasons.

Mr. Solicitor Finch. Without doubt this House was not mistaken in demanding that the party accused for Treason should be committed; that is, that treason is worthy of commitment, and you may find precedents that persons have been accused of Treason, and thereupon have been committed: but the case is this, treason is an offence for which bail cannot be taken; the Lords tell you not they will, or will not commit: but it is true, persons have been committed for treason, and persons accused of Treason, judges may commit or not.—Consider this law. Let the crime be what it will, and imprisoning till the charge is given is but an imprisoning to security, not to punishment: otherwise the law is not just: and if the judges of the King's Bench have a judgment of discretion, whether to commit or not; can we wonder that the lords have not imprisoned, till they know the article, when they have judgments of discretion though they knew it? You may find precedents, but it is not an argument it must always be so: but as the judges have a latitude much more than the Lords; the impeachment from the Commons of England is properly the king's suit, for there is no treason but against him, and if the judges may bail in that case, may not the Lords? But you are not told he shall be bailed, but they desire to know what his crime is, and then you shall know their answer; the resolution seems reasonable, having gone no further, I cannot except against it.

Sir Thomas Littleton. The Long Parliament had some good precedents which we are not to cast away, lest we smart for it.

Resolved, "To resume the debate to-morrow."

November 16.

Mr. Vaughan. The Lords do not say commitments should follow because treason is bailable by the King's Bench: it is true, the King's Bench bails for treasons, but how? If persons be brought thither for treason directly, there is no bail; but when a commitment is by the council-table for suspicion of treason, then if the matter fall not out to be what was expected, they give notice to take bail; else the great article of the Great Charter, namely, that justice should not be delayed, nor denied, would be to no purpose; and in such a case a man may be in prison for ever. On the other side, what is the case of committing for treason? When a person is committed by the council table, they say they do no more but by special command of the king, and that is the ground of his committing; and were not this so, what would follow! Intelligence would be given of a treason discovered, wherein many might be concerned, and if they who commit should commit with the treason, all the complices would escape; and therefore sometime they make it treason general. Then for the case, before you have gone up with a charge of treason generally, which is to the Lords a warrant sufficient for commitment, say they, we will know the particulars; then will not the same inconveniences follow, if other persons be concerned, and so the danger of all exposed upon the nicety.—If a business comes before this house, which concerns others, and may prove treason, if we go to the Lords, (for we have not jurisdiction except in case of our privileges) but are not yet ready to bring up particulars, and desire the Lords to apprehend such persons, would it be reasonable for them to refuse it, there being no inconvenience like to follow the doing it, much the not doing it? I say not to commit them, and we not prosecute, for that is delay of justice.—Q. But why do the Lords refuse?—Ans. Though I have great respect to the Lords, yet to clear something in point of privilege, the Lords have the same privilege with us in point of speech, their members, &c. as they are essential to pass laws; but that great privilege which they often assume as peers, is as the king is there present in the highest court: how then will it fall out in respect of this privilege? If the king be there, there be many things which the Lords as peers cannot pretend to, for the king hath often sat there not only in passing bills, but in judgment. Had this Charge then come before the king there, it had been reason if the king should have said, 'I desire to know what this treason 'is;' we must then have told it, because he, whom it concerned, required it; or if we desired commitment, he, who could release or pardon him, might say, 'Let him be bailed.' The Lords indeed retain this privilege, but it is in the king's right, not as peers.—Now we have carried a Charge, if the Lords bail him, I know not what would follow, for no example can be given of it, and I think they will not do it, if the king do not direct it.—On the other side, I would be glad we might be no more troubled, than is necessary, because others are listening what we do, and think there is nothing in the case: therefore I am not for delay, but for satisfying others, that what we have done is not barely for imprisoning the earl of Clarendon, but for justice; and if you go this way, give the Lords the reasons why we sent the Charge as we did, and yet keep up their Privileges, and declare so to them.—But then we must go up with more than that head, on which we resolved to impeach of Treason, for your Article must be so formed as to make it a charge fit to be answered for time and place, and that Article hath something of that, which must be penned so as to make it more certain; for the Article goes but thus: That there was discovery and betraying of the king's counsels to his enemies, and if you leave it there, those, who scruple doing any thing, because particular treason is not mentioned, will say; You say he hath discovered and betrayed counsels to enemies, but as we trust you not what is treason, but we will know it; so we know not whom you mean by enemies; for we may think them not so: Therefore appoint a committee to form articles.

* But see the note to this Case of the duke of Buckingham, ante, vol. 2. p. 1446, and Mr. Selden's speech on that occasion, (2 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 405) from which should have been inserted in that Case, (p. 448) as follows: "All this time we have cast a mantle on what was done last parliament; but now, being driven again to look on that man, let us proceed with that which was then well begun; and let the charge be renewed that was made last parliament against him, to which he made an answer; but the particulars thereof were so insufficient, that we might demand judgment on that very answer only." See too Lord Danby's Case, A. D. 1678, post. and lord Stafford's Case, A. D. 1680.

Mr. Sol. Finch. It is a great mistake to say, That the power of the King's-Bench to take bail for Treason, is no other but what is asserted, as if the Judges there had only power from Magna Charta; when a man is committed upon suspicion of Treason, and no prosecution follows, and the party bringing his Habeas Corpus, the Bench bails him, because he should not lie there eternally. It is not to be said the Judges bail for Treason; seeing no crime is produced; for when a man hath been accused of Treason for coining false money, and brought to the bar, the Judges have bailed him, not because they ought, but from that discretionary power wherewith the law trusts them; they may bail if they will, for no other judicature, but they can bail in that case; for seeing imprisonment before trial is only that the prisoner may be forthcoming, if they see there is no danger of escaping they may take bail, for he is a prisoner when bailed, and the bail is his keeper; but there are few cases of this kind, wherein they will bail, they have a fundamental power to do it, placed in them to preserve the rights of the crown; and the Lords will not think themselves less trusted with the rights of the crown than the King's-Bench. Yet though the Lords may bail, they will not exercise their discretion, when there is a probable truth in the Impeachment; shall we then refuse this intimation from the Lords, who saying, Because they have not a particular article of Treason do not secure, seem to imply, that if they had, they would, though they might refuse. The right of bailing comes not from an imaginary apprehension of the king's sitting there, though some kings have sat there in judicature, but from their inherent authority of being trusted with the right of the crown: Let us do then what becomes us, and not let the Impeachment miscarry upon a misunderstanding, but draw up the article. But how is it possible to draw it as an article which you expect he should be imprisoned upon? For your impeachment is in the nature of an Indictment, and must contain so much of certainty as to put him to plead, that so he may not demur.—How may it then be circumstantiated, so as that he may be put to plead; if you do it according to 25 Ed. 3. (for discovering the king's secrets to his enemies is within that statute.) The first part of the article is not pleadable, for we must shew how he adhered to the king's enemies and we must add what the council was that he betrayed, else he will deny to plead and say, I can avoid it: Therefore consider what kind of certainty this article must have to make him plead; for the other articles, it is enough to say them without proving time or place, if the facts were after the Act of Oblivion; but in Treason, the matter must appear in the Indictment, for he hath liberty not only to plead Not Guilty, but to avoid it: Therefore prepare the Article accordingly.

Mr. Vaughan. What is moved is to put you upon an impossible business, for an article presented from the parliament needs not that certainty, as if it were to be tried at the King's-Bench.

Sir Tho. Littleton. It is not for the honour of this house to recede so easily from such a privilege, for besides the earl of Strafford's Case, we have express precedents for, but none against us. We have heard that ye must have no more impeachments, because they are dangerous and tend to rebellion. Consider the archbishop of Canterbury's Case, Finch, Ratcliff, and others in the Long Parliament, and we should not so easily part with them. Willliam Delapool being commonly reported to be no true man, (which is a less charge than Treason) desired he might acquit himself, and the Lords required no special matter before they imprisoned him, and afterward he was accused more specially,

Sir Rob. Atkins. In the Case of Anselm archbishop of Canterbury the Commons accused him, but the Lords did not commit him, and gave no other reason for it, but that he was a great man; and yet afterwards he was condemned as a traitor, though the king reduced his punishment only to be banishment. Though a privilege is much spoken of, yet I shall never be fond of any privilege which shall intrench upon my liberty as a subject.

Mr. Vaughan. I hear it objected, That as you charge a lord generally, so may the Lords a commoner, but that cannot be; for the Lords cannot cause a commoner to be committed though for Treason, without your consent: Therefore put a question, whether a Committee shall be named to draw up Reasons to justify what you have done.

Resolved, "That the Question shall be put."

Resolved, "That a Committee shall draw Reasons."

November 18.

The Committee brought in their Reasons, viz. "1. What can or ought to be done by either house of parliament is best known by the customs and proceedings of parliament in former times; and it doth appear by example that by the course of parliament the Lords have committed such persons as have been generally charged by the House of Commons for High-Treason, to safe custody, though the particular Treason hath not been specified at the time of such charge.

2. "That a commitment for High-Treason in general, is a legal commitment, and if the party so committed bring his Habeas Corpus, and the cause of his commitment thereupon be returned for High-Treason generally; he may lawfully be remanded to prison by the judges upon that return.

3. "If before securing the person, the special matter of the treason should be alledged, it would be a ready course that all complices in the Treason might make their escape, or quicken the execution of the Treason intended, to secure themselves the better there.

4. "If the House of Peers should require the particular Treason to be assigned before the party charged be secured, they leave the Commons uncertain and doubtful (and that from time to time) how particular they must make their charge to their lordships satisfaction; before the offenders be put under any restraint.

5. "The Commons conceive, that if they should desire the Lords to secure a stranger, or native commoner, upon the suspicion of treason, which the Commons had of him, and which was by them under examination to be evidenced to their lordships in due time; their lordships in justice for the safety of the king and people, would secure such person or persons, upon the desire of the Commons, and in such case there would be no difference between a Lord and a Commoner so desired to be secured.

"6. The proceedings of inferior courts, between the king and the subject or subject and subject, and the discretion of judges in such courts, is bounded and limited by the discretion of the parliament, which trust them; and 'tis not left to the discretion of the judges in ordinary jurisdiction to give the king, or take from him inconvenient power for the subject, nor to dispense the law partially between subject and subject for malice or affection; but the discretion of the parliament, which is the whole public, comprehending the King, Lords and Commons (for the king's presence is supposed to be in the Lords House) is, and ought to be unconfined for the safety and preservation of the whole, which is itself. It cannot be malicious to a part of itself, nor affect more power than already it hath, which is absolute over itself and part, and may therefore do for preservation of itself whatsoever is not repugnant to natural justice."

Mr. Prynn. I like not the first Reason, because it cannot be called a custom, where only one parliament hath done it.

Mr. Swinfen. The great strength lies upon this first Reason, and is like to be a precedent; for exact precedents I find none, except that of Michael Delapool, and in the Long Parliament: But consider the reasons why there was no express precedent before, and what was the custom of parliaments before. The parliament was wont to proceed formerly by bill, and thus far that proceeding makes against the Lords now and for committing the party accused; for then the proceedings upon treason were by common-law, and because the judges could not proceed, therefore the parliament went by bill, and it cannot be supposed that the parties were at liberty all that while.

Second, Third, Fourth and Fifth Reasons voted, Sixth read.

Mr. Solicitor Finch. I am against this Reason, not as a Reason, but unnecessary; for if the former Reasons satisfy not, this will not, because it supposeth things not in question. Our debate must at last end in this question, betwixt privilege of parliament and former proceedings; And there being no privilege in case of treason, why should not former proceedings sway? Except we call that treason which is not, for otherwise no privilege will help. Therefore add this to your Reason, That there is no Privilege for treason, and the Lords ought not to think that the Commons will call that treason which is not, or if they do, the Lords may by a speedy trial determine it.

Resolved, "That a Conference be desired with the Lords, and the Reasons carried up."

November 21.

The Lords sent down to desire a Conference about the subject matter of the last Conference. But the Commons doubting that if they should consent to it, the Lords might afterwards refuse a Free Conference, because the business in dispute concerns Judicature, which belongs to the Lords, and so the impeachment generally falls:

Resolved, "To send an Answer by messengers of their own: And accordingly did with Order to acquaint the Lords how far they had proceeded, and they expected they should rather have desired a Free Conference."

November 23.

The Debate about the freedom of speech in parliament was resumed, and the report read of the proceeding about sir John Elliot, Mr. Hollis, &c. 5 Car. 1. *

Mr. Solicitor Finch. If you are satisfied that the Judgment passed upon them was illegal, two ways you have to be safe: By taking notice of that judgment, giving your opinion upon it, and carrying it up to the Lords, that judgment will be utterly damned; else you may proceed by act, but consider then the consequence. For if you go by act, you bound the liberty of speech, unless in penning it you prevent it, but an unknown limitation is better than bounding, for an act itself is subject to exposition, but your vote, and the Lords concurrence, is not.

Mr. Vaughan. It is not safe for you to circumscribe privileges, therefore that must be done which may take away what destroys them. The laws and rights of this kingdom are rights by common law, or act of parliament; what is an act of parliament, may be repealed by parliament; what is common law may be altered by parliament, and whatever is both, may be altered by a new law; and how is it possible to do one or the other without liberty to speak about it? And how can there be any inconvenience about freedom of speech, about any thing which cannot be a law, without passing King, Lords, and Commons?

Then it being moved to put the question for confirming that Report. And it being reply'd that some Passages in that business, viz. about keeping the Speaker in the chair, were not warrantable, and so not to be joined in the question with the rest;

Mr. Vaughan. That business which is so much talked of, and condemned, I shall state to you. The House is to adjourn itself, though sometimes the king adviseth them to adjourn themselves (as then he did) but the adjournment is always made by a question, and without it the Speaker cannot leave the chair. The Speaker acquainting the House then with the king's message, sir John Elliot stood up to speak, but the Speaker would not hear him, but was going to leave the chair; whereupon some said, if you go out without a question, the parliament is dissolved, upon which he was leaving the chair; some kept him, and told him, If this be a House, you, as Speaker, have no place in it but the chair; and this was all the irregularity in that business so much talked of.

Resolved, "That the Judgment given against sir John Elliot &c. 5 Car. was an illegal judgment, and against the freedom and privilege of parliament."

The Lords sent for a present Conference, after which Report was made that the Lords had voted the Commons denying them a Conference lately, was contrary to the course of parliamentary proceedings, and gave Reasons why it was not yet time for a Free Conference.

November 25.

After debate whereof it was resolved to grant them that the Commons agreed to the Conference formerly desired. At which the Lords declared that they had considered of the Precedents and Reasons formerly sent them by the Commons, but were not satisfied to secure the earl of Clarendon, or to sequester him from parliament, until some special treason be assigned.

November 28.

The Commons sent to the Lords to desire a Free Conference upon the matter of the last Conference. To which the Lords concurring, Mr. Vaughan, sir Rob. Howard, sir Tho. Littleton and others, were appointed to manage it, who went up immediately to that end.

November 29.

Mr. Vaughan made Report of the Conference with the Lords yesterday to the purpose following.

The Lords told us, That no precedent can be against the law.

We answered,

If that can be made good, we shall press precedents no more: But what they most stood upon was the Petition of Right, where it is provided that none shall be committed without special cause, whereby the party may answer according to the law; thence they infer that our proceedings are against law, because a general charge is against the Petition of Right.

Commons. The case of the Petition of Right, stated will clear this, which was this: Some persons were committed by no other warrant, but the king's special command, they bring their Habeas Corpus to the King's Bench to know the cause: This cause was returned by the Judges, that they could not bail a man, when so committed, because they knew not the cause, nor had any way to bring him to his trial.—Then the Petition of Right provides, That the cause should be returned, whereby the crime might appear, and that before and after the Petition of Right to this day, if upon bringing a Habeas Corpus, it be returned that the party is imprisoned for treason, the Judges ought to remand, unless there be some special cause to make them take bail. So that the Petition of Right, was against them, for they say a man ought not to be imprisoned upon a general charge, because it is the Petition of

* See their Cases, ante. vol. 3. p. 293.

Right. We say it is not against the Petition of Right, because the Judge may remand the party, if there be not special cause.

Then the Lords said, That the reason why the Judges remanded in that case was, because the party committed knew it was for treason: Therefore they re-committed.

'We owned it because it was the rule for the Judges to proceed by, but that was no rule for proceeding of parliament; for as a magistrate commits for treason, and is supposed to be acquainted with it; so also is he with the probability upon the proof: But the Lords insist not now upon that, but specify treason, and if the course of parliaments so much varied in such cases, that was no concluding proof, why they should have special treason. And for the other part,

That upon the Return, there should be a cause returned, that so the party might answer: for when a return is made, if the course be such as that the party ought not to be imprisoned, the Judges free him; otherwise they leave him to come to his trial.

Then to the Precedent about the earl of Strafford, they replied, that it was made in bad times. And we answered, That as good laws were made before in and after that time as any other; and if the Lords then might make such laws, we could not see why it should be a good time to make laws, and no good time to administer to persons the laws already made.

Farther, to their Objection, that in the time whence those precedents were brought, there was a face of war: We answered, That could not alter the case, for the law calls no time a time of war, whilst the courts of justice have freedom, as they had when Strafford, Finch, Canterbury and Ratcliff were impeached: And it was strange that in the parliament-house there should be such a consternation as to make their proceedings invalid, when in other courts there were none: besides, in Holland for many years there was a constant scene of war, and can we imagine that there was not justice done at that time.

Then they pressed Precedents against ours, one 14 Ed. 2, against the Spencers, where a great man moved the king to commit one of them, and the king answered, 'it could not be unless cause was shewed.' We replied, This was a Precedent like that, a man was committed, because he was committed; for there was no allegation of treason.

Second Precedent was 33 Hen. 8, against lord Stanhope, the Commons moved the king to imprison him, and the king answered 'he would consider of it.' We answered, That was no denial, but a thing usual with the king, and that motion was to the king himself, which differs from this case, for that was not alledged to be treason: Besides, had it been treason, it was against the king himself, and being an offence against himself, he might (if he would) not imprison, because he may discharge a man, or pardon him, though for treason: but this Case is not so, because the Lords' justice is but ministered to the king.

21 R. 2, Arundel, archbishop of Canterbury who, as they said, was impeached of treason, but not committed.

Answer. The Case was this: There was a commission issued out by Rich. 2. That that bishop and others should regulate what was amiss by evil government, and the king was offended at the granting of it, and at Nottingham sent for the Judges, and charged them upon their allegiance to give true answer to what questions he should ask them; and the first question was, Whether that commission so granted, was not invading his prerogative? They answered, Yes. Then he asked, How they ought to be punished, who procured it? They answered, 'as Traitors.' In the 21 the bishop is charged by the Commons, and the treason alledged is, That he had procured himself to be put into the commission.

This being the case, we said, that if a fact be called treason, which afterwards appears to be none, there could be no commitment. For if a man call another man's coming into his ground treason, it falls of itself; therefore the bishop was not committed.

The Lords said farther, That all those Articles were declared to be Treason, which before could not possibly be Treason to commit a man, because the nature of them must be Treason at common-law, and 'till these treasons were declared, which was not 'till 21 Ed. 3, they were not treason so as to imprison, or try any man for them.

We replied, All that parliament was repealed, yet the precedent was the more authentic. But I think that lord (it was the earl of Bridgewater) understood not what he said, at least I did not.

Then about the earl of Strafford's precedent, the Lords said, that the very Impeachment was taken away by the act of this parliament, because the Impeachment is recited in it. Namely, 'Whereas the earl of Strafford was impeached, &c.' But every clause in that Act of Attainder is taken away now, therefore the impeachment; and you cannot make use of any part of it.

We replied, It is true, the Act of Attainder is taken away, but the very act of repeal doth recite that very clause (whereas Thomas earl of Strafford was impeached, &c.) and the act cannot take away any thing which strengthens its own supposition.

Then the Lords said, that they should be willing to comply with the Commons, but that they must be tender of their own judicial proceedings.

Commons. It is true they ought, and we supposed that the Lords might be jealous that we should intrench on their power; but the Commons were so far from that, that they thought the judicial power better lodged with them than in the Commons themselves could be; but we would open the Objection. Their lordships being the Judges in this case might think, that for the Commons to take upon them to know what was Treason, would be an assuming to themselves what was only proper to the Lords, and that it was so now in charging the earl of Clarendon generally.

Lords. The Objection is right.

Commons. For our knowing Treason, we have many among us who are justices of peace, trusted by law to know and commit, and (if the parliament be not sitting) even to commit a peer himself for Treason; and the knowing what is Treason is so far from being improper to the House of Commons, that every man in the nation is bound to know it; for was it ever known, that ignorance of the law could ever excuse a man from breaking the law? Laws are made to be known by subjects, especially those which concern the king; and unless they could find a reason, why the parliament embodied should be more ignorant than particular persons, the present case must be clear. That the jealousy of the Lords arose from a fallacy thus, The Lords have judicial power concerning Treason, and must of necessity know it; the Commons have no judicial power over it, therefore cannot know it; that is, because the Commons know what law is, therefore they have judicial power over law. To this was not any thing replied.

Farther, We said that because they insisted upon us to specify Treason, because by committing upon a general they might wrong the party by committing him without cause, and because they themselves were not informed in their consciences what they did: They would do well to consider the many inconveniencies which might follow, if the charge of Treason was not general, but particular; and suppose it was special, their lordships would know no more by it. For suppose a man impeached for counterfeiting the Great Seal, which is express Treason, and he may be impeached for, yet neither their lordships nor the party could have any advantages by that specification, because there might be as many questions what is counterfeiting the Great Seal, as what is Treason.

For instance: One Leak*, a clerk in Chancery, intending to forge a patent, puts together two pieces of parchment, and had fitted them, and put them together with mouth-glew, that they appeared as one: Then a grant was written upon the outmost, and a seal affixed, so that the Great Seal is put to a true thing; then he cuts off the edges of the parchment, so as to sever them, takes off the written one, and leaves the seal on the blank, then forgoth the grant and makes use of it. This was questioned before the judges, whether it was Treason or not, that is, whether counterfeiting the great seal or not? If it were, it was Treason, otherwise not. They resolved, it was not counterfeiting the great seal, and so not Treason, but Misprision. And if it had been Treason, they Resolved, that an Indictment had been enough to impeach him. Then suppose you have such an impeachment before you for counterfeiting the great seal, you have special Treason, and imprison him; but when it is brought to question, it appears not to be Treason, therefore he is wrong imprisoned: And if your lordships will examine what knowledge you have of this fact, you have no more than if it had been a general Treason.

Lords. There is a case put there, as we are content to take a special Treason, but expect not the proof as there it was.

Commons. If it were a case put, so is your lordships reply, for it was put ex concessio, because you agreed that if the Treason was special, the party was to be committed, and this case was to shew their lordships, they were in no better case then, than if the Treason were general.

But the Lords still pressing that the Impeachment itself of the earl of Strafford was repealed in the act about him.

Commons. We replied, One part of the act ought to be severed from the other, and that which is without exception shall stand, though the other be taken away: For, suppose a man prosecutes in a court of justice, for what he apprehends to be his right, and yet the cause goes against him, and he hath no effect of his suit, afterward the party (being an evil-minded man, and thinking to reach his ends) forgoth a deed, or suborns witnesses, and then begins a suit in some other court, and by those ways attains his ends. Then a bill comes before this parliament to reverse the judgment, reciting that such a person hath been a suborner of witnesses, &c. so, and so, and therefore the judgment is made void; certainly though this person is named to be an evil-minded person, yet this lays no blemish on his first proceedings. So that it appears by the act, that the proceedings against the earl of Strafford were legal at first; if those afterwards, when the times became tumultuous, were not, it is not to be applied to what was well done and legal: Then we told them that we had pressed them with four precedents, and to three of them nothing was replied.

Lords. They answered, the reason why lord Finch was committed, was because of his flight.

Commons. He was fled before the impeachment; but it was ordered, That he should be committed when found.

Then we told them, That we must report to them, that be the treason what it would, we could not go to the Lords to have it punished without the disadvantage, which the publishing the treason before-hand would expose us to by making of witnesses, escaping of parties, and the like, then bade them consider, whether if we should lay before them a treason in every thing circumstanced as Gun-Powder-Treason, they would not imprison the party till the whole matter was opened.

Lords. They answered to hear that case put, for in matter of state, other courses are to be taken, and they could see no inconveniency in publishing that to the Lords, which must be published before 400 in the House of Commons.

* Co. 12. Rep. 15. Kelyng, 80. See this Case cited in Biggs's Case, 3 Peere Williams, 431.

Commons. The Commons may proceed with what secrecy or openness they please, and the Lords are not to take notice of their proceedings, whether open or secret.—Farther, That by a matter of state must be understood, when a parliament is not sitting, and we know not whither to resort; but when a parliament is particularly called to prevent the mischiefs threatening the kingdom, if that be not capable of remedying, no other council could, or we are not bound to resort to that, we are excluded from that to which we ought to resort.

Lords. That the Lords bade us take heed of the liberty of the subjects, to which they are now fain to have regard, bidding us consider the bishop of Canterbury's long imprisonment, without knowing the cause, and they must satisfy their consciences, lest they should commit for treason, and it not proved so.

Commons. It appears not that the bishop of Canterbury should have lain less time, had the impeachment been special; and for the liberty of the subject, we know not how a subject should have more liberty by special matter, than general; Special being but adding a formal title, and the subject goes to prison, as well for the one as the other.

For their consciences. Suppose a person accused generally, they are then to know whether it be treason, and is not it as much that they commit an innocent person? So as if the matter was special.

REPORT of the FREE CONFERENCE about committing the Earl of CLARENDON on a general Charge.

Nov. 29. The Lord Chamberlain and the other Lords appointed to manage the Free Conference with the Commons yesterday, reported the substance and effect of the said Free Conference, as followeth:

"This Conference was managed, on the House of Commons part, by sir Robert Howard, Mr. Vaughan, Mr. Swinfin, and Mr. Waller. The introduction was made by my Lord Chamberlain; who told the Commons, That this Free Conference was desired; by them; and though that house had lately declined giving the Lords a Conference when desired, yet the House of Peers upon this occasion had dispensed with some forms, to keep a good correspondence with the House of Commons, and were willing to confer freely with them and ready to hear what they had to say.

"Sir R. Howard was the first that opened the business. He said, this Conference was not upon particular account of any person, but in relation to public justice.

"The Lords closed in the same, and were very glad it was so understood; for they had no particular regard to the earl of Clarendon in what they had resolved, but to the justice of the kingdom; in the administration whereof in this particular, nothing was ordered in the case of the Peer now impeached which they should not have insisted upon in the case of any commoner.

"Then Sir R. Howard and the rest of the Commons proceeded; and made the subject-matter of this Free Conference to be some of the Reasons formerly given by the Commons, which they enforced what they could; and the proceedings of the earl of Strafford's Case, the abp. of Canterbury, lord keeper Finch, and sir G. Ratcliff's. But the precedent chiefly pressed, was the earl of Strafford's; on which by large discourse (which intimated their insisting mainly on that) they urged that precedents did shew best the course of parliaments, which was the law of parliaments; and that the precedents they had vouched, especially that of the earl of Strafford's, were clear in the point: that the end of the act of repeal was to repeal the act of attainder, and the proceedings relating thereunto; that the manner of impeachment and commitment, and other proceedings thereupon, were still in force; and that the latest and newest precedents were the best. They descanted long upon the words of the act of repeal, to evince what they had said; and distinguished the first year of the Long Parliament for gravity and wisdom, from the rest, which was disorderly and unquiet; and said, That their precedents were made in the first year; and that proceedings in times of peace, when the courts of Westminster were open, were always allowed for good; and concluded that the Lords ought to commit upon every general impeachment of the Commons for treason: and this grew to be the question stated at this Conference: which the Commons affirmed, and the Lords denied. Some things were also said by the Commons, of the credit that was to be given to all the Commons of England, which they represented; and that they could not be supposed to intend any thing herein but public justice and safety, &c.

"The Lords answered, and argued from the very same act for reversing the earl of Strafford's attainder, as followeth: That this precedent was not allowable, being in an ill time, and branded by an act of repeal, by which it was clear, this very parliament intended it should never be made use of; for besides that the act of attainder recites the very impeachment particularly, and other proceedings thereupon, and stands absolutely and totally repealed, which is enough to condemn the whole, yet they were so careful that this precedent which led on the other three should never rise in judgment again, that they further enacted in express words, That all records and proceedings of parliament relating to the said attainder be wholly concealed and taken off the file, or otherwise defaced and obliterated, to the intent the same may not be visible in after-ages, or brought into example to the prejudice of any person whatsoever; in which general words, every circumstance and passage of that precedent must needs be included, none being excepted, so that this left the course of parliament for accusations and trials for treasons as it was before. And there were no other proceedings previous to the said Attainder, but the said impeachment upon trial, and proceedings thereupon.

"The Lords said, They could not allow all for good that was done in parliament whilst the courts of Westminster sat; nor would the Commons, if they reviewed the transactions of the Long Parliament. They absolutely denied the newest precedent to be the best. Antiquity was always venerable; laws, and old precedents, with a constant course of them, were most to be esteemed. They had both for them in this controversy.

"The Lords gave these further Reasons in Answer to the Commons, and to shew why they ought not upon every general accusation of treason by the Commons to commit to custody the person or persons accused: That there could be no precedent of commitment produced upon a general accusation of treason before the earl of Strafford's case; which must necessarily have been, to make it the course of parliament. The last drops of a river make not a stream or course, but the constant current. So a new precedent, but of yesterday as it were, and within the sad memory of us all, could not be called the course of parliament. It seems contrary to natural justice and reason that a person accused should be punished before he knows his crime; and though the imprisonment may be said to be for custody, yet there is no person that knows not his fault, but takes it for a punishment; and it is really so, if he come after to be acquitted. It is not suitable to the dignity or trust of judges in inferior courts, much less in parliament, the highest court, that they should be kept ignorant of the crimes, whilst they are pressed to commit to prison upon a general mention of them, or that the prosecutors should conceal what they know from the judges, or have ground to ask what they will, and not let the judges have ground to proceed upon. If the Lords ought to commit upon the Commons impeachment, they seem rather to be executors of process or orders, than judges; which ever implies a power to consider, and do as they shall be satisfied in judgment. The precedents are contrary; as 14 E. 2. M. 7. abp. of Arundel's case, 21 R. 2. the Lord Stanley's case, 38 H. 6.; and W. de la Pole duke of Suffolk's case; as the Commons themselves, in the argument at the free conference upon the Petition of Right, by sir Edw. Coke, acknowledged, and urged strongly, as being in the very point; This was 28 H. 6. No. 16, &c. Such a course of proceeding would not leave it in the power of the House of Peers to preserve Magna Charta and the Petition of Right (which favour liberty) from invasion; and herein the Lords insist not only for themselves, but for all the Commons. Though this be a House of Commons excellently composed; yet the admitting this claim of theirs just or warrantable, if ever there should be a House of Commons ill disposed or engaged in faction, as such have been, they might by pretence thereof make dangerous inroads upon the justice and ancient government of the kingdom, terrify and discompose the highest judicature, and invade that freedom which ought to be in parliament, and indeed bring the House of Lords to as small a number as they please to leave unaccused. Judges in inferior courts may bail for treason specified; a majore, may the House of Lords refuse to commit till specification, or bail after. There are no real mischiefs or inconveniences the other way, but many appear by committing before the Judges be satisfied in the crimes. The practice of all judges and justices, in favour of liberty, and to prevent oppression, is to examine upon oath the particular crimes before commitment, that the ground may appear to them for commitment, or else they are of duty to bail where the offence is bailable, though the accusation may be laid to be treason; much more should the parliament be careful herein, who gives examples and precedents of justice to all other courts. If the king and his counsel are not to imprison without special crime, as the Commons now argue, and did so before in the conference for the Petition of Right, to which the Lords agreed, and yet the king is 'caput parliamenti;' whence comes this power of the House of Commons by vote to enforce a commitment? And how dangerous is it to the subject! The Petition of Right having concluded, That no man ought to be imprisoned or detained without being charged with something to which they might make answer according to law; how will it stand with that to commit upon generals, to which no man can make answer or defend himself?

"There were no new Reasons offered by the Commons; and therefore the Lords told them, That having considered of those they had given, and over-ruled them, after a rule twice given by the highest court, it is not to be disputed but the parties must submit; or as they resolved last session, there could be no proceedings or dispatch in causes.

"At this Conference, Mr. Vaughan said, The Commons do think the judicature so well and safely lodged in the Lords, that the Commons do not wish any part of it.

"The Commons would not agree, that the case of William de la Pole was upon the Impeachment of the Commons; and said, That the case of archbishop Arundel was repealed 1 H. 4. But the first the Lords evinced clearly, by the record which was present; and the repeal of Arundel's case did not weaken, but strengthen it as a precedent in this case, being in the repeal it was in the least impeached in the point the Lords vouched it for. And the chief ground of not repealing the acts of that parliament was, for the hard measure it shewed to the House of York, for maintenance of whose title the said archbishop was a chief instrument.

"Some members of the House of Commons urged their former third Reason before, That, if, before securing the person, the special matter of treason should be alledged, it would be a ready course that all complices in the treason might make their escape, or quicken the execution of the treason intended, to secure themselves the better thereby. To which the Lords made Answer, "That it would be very hard with the subject, if they should be committed when neither the judge nor the accuser did know the crime; and if, in this case, the House of Commons, who were the accuser, did know it, they might safely impart it to the Lords, for though in 500 counsellors, there may be allowed to be wisdom, yet there is not to be expected secrecy."

The Lords took this Report into consideration; and after a long debate, the question being put, "Whether, upon the Report of the last Free Conference given the House of Commons, and upon the whole matter, their lordships are satisfied to commit the earl of Clarendon, and sequester him from parliament, before particular treason specified or assigned?" It was resolved in the negative.

December 2.

The Lords confirmed their proceedings, and sent down a Message to the Commons to this effect: "That upon the Report made to them of the last Free Conference, they are not satisfied to commit or sequester from parliament the earl of Clarendon, without the particular treason be mentioned or assigned." This threw the Commons into a great ferment, and occasioned several warm speeches.

Lord Torrington* (General Monk's son) moved not to part with any privileges of the Commons of England, but adhere to the general impeachment.

Sir Rob. Howard. The matter before us, is of as great concernment as ever came before us; if there should be malice supposed in a nation against itself, it might be exercised by giving a particular charge, as well as a general; many of the Lords are convinced by the reasons we gave and concur, thinking our precedents good, and have entered their protestation in the Lords House, asserting the rights of the Commons of England to impeach generally: so that (excepting the Spiritual Lords) I think I may say the major part of the Lords are for us; and should we give up this, we may be wrested out of all right, and the Commons have no way to proceed to an impeachment, but some men to be so great, as not to be fairly reached. Therefore adhere.

Mr. Waller. The Lords are a noble estate, but whatever the matter is, they have of late some advice given them, which makes them proceed as they never did yet; for scarce any thing happens betwixt us, but they inroach upon us. The Militia is now as burdensome to the fifty pound man in the country, almost as all other taxes, and the Lords have gotten this advantage of us, that they touch not the burden of it with their finger: so in time of the plague, the Commons must be shut up, but not they, insomuch that a good act provided to that purpose passed not; we impeached the lord Mordaunt, and could not bring him to the bar (though formerly I have known an earl and a lord brought thither). You desired a free Conference about it, but could not obtain one to this day. Rome was at first modest, and only meddled with spirituals, but afterwards concerned themselves so much with other matters, that every thing almost was made to be in Ordine ad Spiritualia, and many kingdoms thereupon break from them. The Lords now insist upon one thing, because they say it is in order to their judicature, perhaps hereafter they will tell us we must come to them on our knees, because it is in order to their judgment. Consider therefore whether there be any hope of giving them satisfaction; then, whether you will adhere, and what you will do afterwards; for the present my motion is to adhere.

Mr. Vaughan. It is truly said, the business before you seems to be as great as hath been in parliament; many of the consequences being invisible, therefore before you resolve what to do, take the whole matter before you. The difference between the Lords and us, is upon a general impeachment of treason; the Lords, after a Free Conference, say, they will not commit unless special treason be mentioned or assigned; those whom you employ to manage the Conference were very unwilling to differ with them, but it seems it hath produced nothing, and I have nothing to make me believe, but that the reason is, that the Lords were resolved (say what we would) not to be satisfied; for I know nothing which they offered, but it was fully answered, nor any thing left undone to satisfy them if they would have been satisfied; what I have to say now is to clear something which the Lords may make such sound of.—When we urged precedents, and made them our principal reason, we told them, the way to decide what was in difference betwixt the Houses, is, the usage of parliaments; but to our precedents we received no full answer.—Then the Lords used this reason, namely, that they cared not for precedents, because it was against the express law of the land. I answered them, we would join with them, if they could shew law against it, and expected what they would answer, but heard nothing: much discourse there was, without application, of the Great Charter and of a statute of 28 Ed. 3, but not applied; so that I thought law in a Lord's mouth, was like a sword in a lady's hand, the sword might be there, but when it comes to cut, it would be awkward and useless.—But I hear since, that their meaning was this

* Macpherson, in a note to his Life of James the Second, written by himself, p. 37, asserts, that the Impeachment was moved in the House of Commons by the Duke of Albemarle's son, a youth of fifteen years of age, and calls this an artifice of the party to engage the Duke thoroughly on their side.

(which must be cleared by mentioning some laws) that by Magna Charta it is provided, "That no man shall be taken or imprisoned, or condemned, but by the law;" and thence they infer, That no man may be imprisoned, but it must be by his peers, or by the law of the land.—Again, 5 Ed. 3. No woman shall be attached upon accusation, or be adjudged of life or limb, but according to the law.—25 Ed. 3. No man shall be taken by a Petition to the king or his council, unless by indictment, of lawful people, or by process of writ at common-law, and (say they) this case is to none of these.—28 Ed. 3. No man shall be imprisoned without due process according to the old law of the land: But this case being neither by presentment nor indictment, the Lords would not stand upon our precedents, but relied on this, as if it were enough in bar of all our precedents.

Therefore to open this, and the danger of the consequence, there are in the land many different laws, and proceedings in these laws, and imprisonment upon them; and yet not one of them by presentment, indictment, or trial by peers, though the Lords thought this was the law, and there was no other. 1. It is known that the crown-law, or prerogative, is distinct law from that between party and party. 2. There is the law and custom of parliament, called a law, 'ab omnibus querenda, à multis ignorata, et à paucis cognita.' 3. Then the Canon-law, (and it is much the Bishops forgot that) and there is nothing in that law, more than standing in a white sheet, which proceeds not by indictment, or presentment, yet there is imprisonment even in that law. 4. There is the Law of Admiralty, and the Articles of Oleron, where there is proceedings of another nature, and by imprisonment. 5. The Law of Merchants, or of the Staple. 6. The Law of Arms, where is imprisonment and death, and yet different proceedings from the common-law in the Great Charter: now no man thinks that all those courses of proceedings are taken away by the common-law, and it is gross ignorance to think it. 7. The Law of the Forest, which is most different: so that to urge Magna Charta to this purpose, as if all proceedings in those cases must be according to the common-law, is absurd.

Then there are divers Writs in the Register. One, When a man hath received the king's money to serve him, and went not, then there is a writ to arrest him upon a certificate from the captain under whom he was to serve. Then the ordinary Writ, which belongs to the law ecclesiastic, de Excommunicato Capiendo. Another, de Apostata Capiendo, to recover a regular run away from his convent. Another, called ne exeat Regno, to imprison a man, who will not give security not to go out of the kingdom, and this is not traversable any where, because it suggests that he will machinate somewhat hurtful to the kingdom, and upon that suggestion he is imprisoned. Another, when a man hath a Leprosy. Another, to burn Heretics, which concerned the bishops also, if they had pleased to think of it. These Proceedings are no way agreeable to those mentioned in the common-law.

Then consider how this Resolution of the Lords strikes at the law of parliaments. 1. It is certain that all imprisonment by parliament is not by presentment, indictment, &c. So that by this means that power is taken away. 2. Contempt against parliamentary authority, who-soever he is to appear before them, and disobeys them, they may imprison him in the Tower, and yet it is not against Magna Charta.

Whither therefore tends this? The conclusion must be, that no Impeachment by the Commons must go on, unless it be by presentment, and so there is an end of all that, for which the parliament is principally called; unless we are part of those 500 contemptible ones, who are only fit to give money; That may be reserved for us, but nothing else; though 23 Ed. 3. saith, 'For Redress of Grievances in the kingdom a parliament shall be called every year.' I would know which way we should redress abuses, if we are so far from remedying in parliament, that we must be shut out to the common course in other courts?

Obj. The Lords may say, if you find the statutes broken, and short, you shall have new.

Ans. And when these new ones are broken, then we shall have a remedy; so rise up remedy, and go to the remedy, ad infinitum, for there is no more reason to think that a second law shall be maintained more than the first, and what way a mischief shall be redressed, other than by parliament, I know not.

So that by this Resolution of the Lords, and denying to commit upon this ground (for they shewed no other) every thing for which a parliament is useful is denied us.

After all this come to the very case. If a Treason be committed, and the fame is that A. B. is Guilty of it, it is lawful to apprehend him for it. If a Hue and Cry pursue a man, though he be not of evil fame, yet he may lawfully be imprisoned. If it proves false, he hath his remedy; but that obstructs not the law to bring him to trial. Any watchman may arrest a night walker, and hath a warrant in law for it, and this is as good process in law, as any original writ.

And after all this, consider with what kind of colour, when there are weighty reasons why we should not mention special Treason, and that mentioning it generally, answers the Petition of Right, the whole Commons of England (who are in no degree represented by the Lords, they only represent their own persons) should be denied the securing a person impeached unless a particular charge be given, how prejudicial soever to the kingdom.

Another thing, there is no right which a man hath in this land, or any part of the world, but his right is such, that if it be kept from him, he hath a means to come to it, otherways it is

'Damnum sine injuria;' for where the law gives no remedy, there is but a supposition of right: By the same measure it will follow, that there is no civil wrong can be done to any man, but the law provides a remedy, if that wrong be done; and if by the law there is no remedy, it is no wrong: consider then this case.

There are in this kingdom, in the civil state of it, three estates which the king hath then in making laws: There are three estates, whereof the king is principal; sometimes they are mentioned as the king's three estates, and he none of them: The estates in general are the Commons of the kingdom, (who are perfectly represented in this House) the Lords another, and the King another; and these are such, that there is no petitory action, nor the laws directed to any one of them, but the laws you make, are to distribute justice in other courts. For instance, If all the Commons of England, who are one of the estates, should accuse one of themselves, the party can have no wrong, because the parliament can have no action brought against them, nor can they be supposed to do any thing for malice. It is the same between the body of the Lords and Commons; and there is no law either to vindicate the one or the other; but they stand as if there were no communicable law betwixt them: but the measure between them is that which is good for the whole; for they are the makers of laws for others, but no laws can be fancied to reach the whole of the Commons, or of the Lords.—So that it is easily to be seen, how it hath been put upon us; so that now we are in such a Case, we know not to what ends we shall proceed upon this or any other Impeachment; for by this judicial power, you shall be excluded from any proceedings by laws of parliaments, and so you take away the whole right of the kingdom.

Quest. But now what shall you do?

Ans. I see many inconveniencies which may happen both ways, but I see so many this way, that if any man gave such counsel as is charged upon the earl of Clarendon, it is not so dangerous, as the Case before you; for the inconveniencies attending that counsel would quickly shew itself by the misery following; but this is a small thing begun with, which, like a canker, may eat till it be incurable, and that is as absolutely justifiable as this.

And now I have said this, I am perplexed what to say more, for all can bear me witness, what respect I have endeavoured to preserve to the House of Peers, but I am so sensible of this, that though I cannot forget my respect to them, yet I must lament the condition into which they have brought themselves first, and us next, for they cannot think to avoid it. The House of Peers is but a new style, called so, as Jurors are called Peers, from the word Par; for every commoner hath his Peers as lords have; and the whole style formerly was Archbishops, Bishops, Dukes, &c. But Pares Regni is a new style. It is called the Upper House, and is to be looked upon with reverence. The Lords have a jurisdiction; but in this Case, I must be plain, their granted jurisdiction ariseth from the House of Commons, if you impeach not there, your judicial power will be very little. If a lord be to be tried for treason, the Lords are but his Jurors; and though they try him upon honour, not upon oath, yet they are no more his triers, than as out of parliament; The judge of Treason in the Lords House, is constituted by the king, as a Lord High Steward, and is no other judge, therefore I know not the judicature they speak so much of.—There is another for Writs of Error, which are there determined, but the jurisdiction of that is very little, for the inconveniency of the Lords determining what could not be determined in other courts, is so found out 25 Eliz. They are to be brought first into the Exchequer Chamber.—There is another way when persons carry Complaints to the Lords, which is a question, for commoners ought not to carry complaints there except in some cases from Chancery; therefore this matter of jurisdiction, which they talk of, is not such a wonderful thing as they would make it.—Therefore whatever we shall do after it, your rights be so much concerned, that you know not where the stay will be, it is necessary that you make a Committee to draw up a Protestation to be made by this House concerning this matter. The invasion of your right in it, and the danger to the kingdom by it.

Mr. Colman. The Lords say, That committing upon a general impeachment is against law, and I think it will appear so; I deny not, but a Mittimus without special cause is legal, and grounded upon the Petition of Right, the reason of which is to secure men against commitment by a special Warrant, and a Judge ought not to discharge where treason is alledged, but in this case it is different; The Judges cannot discharge a man committed after examination, but the Lords ought not to commit a man, except there be particular treason.—If I come before a Justice of Peace, and say, I accuse this man of treason, will any wise man commit him? he makes his Warrant indeed, but he that accuseth must go farther and make it more particular, and the special matter must appear before he commits, and this is the present case. The common law is, That no man ought to be committed without particular cause; because no man can commit in capital matters, without taking examination before-hand, otherwise no man can justify a commitment: Therefore I am not satisfied that the Lords had not reason to deny. The Commons are in the nature of a Grand Jury to present, but the Lords are the Judges; Commitment is not the judgment, but in order to it, and the Lords have a discretionary power in the case: The Lords say not that they will not commit, but that they are not satisfied to do it without special matter, therefore we ought to send it up.

Sir Rob. Howard. I have attended the Reasons given against making a protestation, and whatever is said, is but levelling a House of Commons with every private accuser; a Justice of Peace (it is said) must have evidence before he commit, and this House has had inducements to impeach; and may not a House of Commons judge what is treason as well as a Justice of Peace? The inconveniencies and dangers laid before you, if you proceed, are nothing in comparison of those on the other side. Had the Lords imprisoned, they had before this had the particular charge, and the protestation is not to stop it, but to make way for it some other way; for it will resolve into a remonstrance, by which you may give the nation an account of your proceedings to come to a trial of this business.

Mr. Vaughan. By the protestation spoken of, is meant to preserve the rights of this House upon the whole matter, and to give the reasons of your proceedings.

Sir Tho. Meres. What is said, not being explained, I know not what is meant by the Protestation; if it be but to enter it into our books, I am not against it; if it be an appeal to the nation, pray consider what you do.

Mr. Vaughan. This way of Protestation differs from entering in our books, but the best way is to draw it up, and bring it to you, and then any man may take exceptions against it; for the meaning is, that this House claims its rights.

Mr. Garraway. First make your Protestation, and then appeal to the king.

Mr. Vaughan. None can surmise that you mean an appeal to the people by what is moved, for what is done, must be done to some part of the parliament; the king, lords, or yourselves: and they who speak of it (if it were done with evil intent) deserve to be called to the bar; when it is brought before you for your approbation, you may either retain, or reject it.

Sir Walt. Young. I desire that the House may know before-hand to whom they are to remonstrate, and on what ground, and therefore to adjourn their debate now.

Mr. Trevor. What appeal you make ought to be to the king, but bring it in hither and give it what name you please.

Sir Rob. Atkins. As I would be tender of your privileges, so of giving offence to the Lords, therefore we shall endeavour to be unanimous in this House; a Protestation is named, I am a stranger to it, and would understand clearly what it is, before we do it; That it is a course warranted by precedents and proceedings of parliaments, considering what effect it hath had in late times, therefore we may do well to adjourn the debate and consider of it.

Sir Tho. Littleton. This Protestation will be like that in the lord Maynard's case, but somewhat longer, and ought to go no farther than to one of the estates, and be kept within the walls.

Mr. Swinfen. You sent up a Charge to the Lords in general, desiring that the earl of Clarendon should be secured, and in convenient time you would send up articles; from that time it hath not been done, and the Lords have passed several votes about it since, but you have not passed one.—First they voted, that they had not complied with your desires for want of particular treason; Then you give them reasons, they are not satisfied with them; then a Free Conference, they are still unsatisfied; and all this while you have not come to any resolution: so that till you come to a vote, no man knows but that you are satisfied with their answer: for when the matter of the Protestation is brought in, we shall not be ready for it till we have resolved, that what the Lords insist on, is an obstruction of justice, and you cannot agree with them without great inconvenience to the nation; Therefore put a question, "That the Lords, not having agreed to secure the earl of Clarendon upon the general Impeachment, have obstructed the public justice of the kingdom in proceedings of Parliament, and is of dangerous consequence." This is necessary, because the Lords have heard nothing from you, but endeavour to satisfy them.

Sir John Goodrick. This question will be a greater accusation of the whole House of Lords, than the other is of the earl of Clarendon. If you will go by way of Protestation, and keep it within your own walls, I like it better than this question.

Sir Rob. Howard. The putting this question is no charge upon the House of Lords: and therefore if that gentleman thinks it so great an one, sure he thinks the Charge against the earl of Clarendon to be a very small one. Is there any obstruction to justice? If not, why do we not comply? If there be, we cannot it seems complain without charging the Lords. Keeping it within your own walls, is but like a man, when he is alone, muttering arguments to himself, and commending himself for it. If you meet with any obstructions, pray first put the question, whether you are obstructed.

Sir Rob. Atkins. It is no light matter to charge the Lords with obstructing justice; therefore the thing being new, pray adjourn it till to-morrow, that we may be more of one mind.

Then the Question was stated, namely,

"That the Lords not having complied with the desire of the Commons in committing the earl of Clarendon, and sequestering him from parliament upon the Impeachment from this House, is an obstruction to the public justice of the kingdom, and is a precedent of evil and dangerous consequence."

Resolved, That the Question be put, And being put, Resolved in the affirmative.

Resolved, "That a Committee be appointed to draw up a Declaration to vindicate the Proceedings of this House."

December 3.

A Message from the Lords by two Judges, That they have received a large Petition from the earl of Clarendon, which intimates that he is withdrawn.

Sir Tho. Tompkins moved to take care to get the sea-ports stopt.

Sir Tho. Littleton. I believe he is now past stopping, but we should do it, though it have no effect; lest it look as though we would have him escape.

Sir Rob. Howard. The Lords seem now mistaken in their opinion at the conference, they said there was no fear of his running away; and in our House it hath been jested that he was not like to ride post. Besides, the expression in the message is ('withdrawn') which may be an inward chamber, therefore it is fit to desire to see the Petition, and command some members to prepare something to vindicate yourselves in discharge of your duty.

Mr. Scymour. You cannot take notice to the Lords of the Petition, unless they think good to communicate it to you, but make the declaration.

Mr. Vaughan. I look upon what the Lords say as doubtful, therefore beware lest you do something misbecoming you. They only say, that he is withdrawn, but not what is his Petition; for the saying that he is withdrawn, is not the matter of a Petition. Perhaps he is gone into the country, the message seems light, and you are to take no notice of it. If it be of moment, and they think us concerned, they should let us know it; and I cannot think so of the Lords, that they would use that word, if he were fled; therefore send a message, to know whether fled or withdrawn.

Mr. Sol. Gen. When a Delinquent signifies to his judges, that he is withdrawn, it cannot signify any thing, but that he is withdrawn from their judgment. None but a mad man will tell them that he is fled, fearing what may follow; it would be well if their care would prevent his flying; but, you cannot answer it, if you hear they do nothing, and so seem to say; fare him well.

Upon all which motions, Ordered, "That sir Tho. Clifford (comptroller of the king's household) be sent to the king, to desire the ports may be stopped."

December 4.

The lord Fitzharding makes Report from the king, that the Message for stopping the Ports being delivered him, he had taken care accordingly.

A Message from the Lords to desire a speedy Conference:

From which Mr. Solicitor reports; We attended the Lords at the Conference, which was delivered by, the duke of Buckingham, who said to this purpose, That the Lords had commanded him to deliver to us that scandalous and seditious Paper sent from the earl of Clarendon, desiring us to present it to you; and to desire you in convenient time to send it to them again, for it had a stile which they were in love with, and desired to keep it.

Which said Paper was read, and is as follows, viz.

"To the right honourable the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, in parliament assembled, the humble PETITION and ADDRESS of EDWARD earl of CLARENDON*.

"May it please your Lordships,

"I cannot express the unsupportable trouble and grief of mind I sustain, under the apprehension of being misrepresented to your lordships, and when I hear how much of your lordships time hath been spent upon the mention of me, as it is attended with more public consequences, and of the differences of opinion which have already, or may probably arise between your lordships and the honourable House of Commons; whereby the great and weighty affairs of the kingdom may be obstructed in the time of so general a dissatisfaction.

"I am very unfortunate to find myself to suffer so much under two very disadvantageous reflections, which are in no degree applicable to me. The first, from the greatness of my estate and fortune, collected and made in so few years, which if it be proportionable to what is reported, may very reasonably cause my integrity to be suspected. The second, That I have been the sole manager and chief minister in all the transactions of state since the king's return into England, to August last, and therefore that all miscarriages and misfortunes ought to be imputed to me and my counsels.

"Concerning my Estate, Your lordships will not believe, that after malice and envy hath been so inquisitive and so sharp-sighted, I will offer any thing to your lordships, but what is exactly true; and I do assure your lordships in the first place, That (excepting from the king's bounty) I have never received nor taken one penny but what was generally understood to be the just lawful perquisites of my office, by the constant practice of the best times, which I did in my own judgment conceive to be that of my lord Coventry, and my lord Elsmore; the practice of which I constantly observed, although the office in both their times was lawfully worth double to what it was to me, and I believe now is.

"That all the courtesies and favours which I have been able to obtain from the king for other persons in church or state, or in Westminster-hall, have never been worth to me 5*l.* :

* "When the Chancellor found it necessary to withdraw himself, he thought it as necessary to leave some address to the House of Peers, and to make as good an excuse as he could for his absence without asking their leave; which should be delivered to them by some member of their body (there being many of them ready to perform that civil office for him) when his absence should be known, or some evidence that he was safely arrived on the other side of the sea; and that time being come (for the packet boat was ready to depart when the Chancellor landed at Calais,) the earl of Denbigh said, He had an Address to the house from the earl of Clarendon, which he desired might be read." Lord Clarendon's Life, p. 458.

So that your lordships may be confident I am as innocent from corruption as from any disloyal thought, which after near thirty years service of the crown, in some difficulties and distresses, I did never expect would be objected to me in my age.

"And I do assure your lordships, and shall make it very manifest, That the several sums of money, and some parcels of land, which his majesty hath bountifully bestowed upon me since his return into England, are worth more than all I have amounts unto; so far I am from advancing my estate by indirect means. And though this bounty of his hath very far exceeded my merit, or my expectation, yet some others have been as fortunate at least in the same bounty who had as small pretences to it, and have no great reason to envy my condition.

"Concerning the other imputation of the credit and power of being chiefest minister, and so causing all to be done that I had a mind to; I have no more to say, than that I had the good fortune to serve a master of a very great judgment and understanding, and be always joined with persons of great ability and experience, without whose advice and concurrence, never any thing hath been done.

"Before his majesty's coming into England, he was constantly attended by the then marquis of Ormond, the late lord Culpeper, and Mr. Secretary Nicholas, who were equally trusted with myself, and without whose joint advice and concurrence, when they were all present (as some of them always were) I never gave any counsel. As soon as it pleased God to bring his majesty into England, he established his Privy-Council, and shortly out of them he chose a number of honourable persons of great reputation, (who for the most part are still alive) as a committee for foreign affairs, and consideration of such things as in the nature of them required much secrecy, and with these persons he vouchsafed to join me: And I am confident this Committee never transacted any thing of moment (his majesty being always present) without presenting the same first to the council-board; and I must appeal to them concerning my carriage, and whether we were not all of one mind, in matters of importance.

"For more than two years I never knew any differences in the councils, or that there were any complaints in the kingdom, which I wholly impute to his majesty's great wisdom, and the intire concurrence of his counsellors, without the vanity of assuming any thing to myself; and therefore I hope I shall not be singly charged with any thing that hath since fallen out amiss. But from the time Mr. Secretary Nicholas was removed from his place, there were great alterations; and whosoever knew any thing of the court and councils, know well how much my credit hath since that time been diminished, though his majesty graciously vouchsafed still to hear my advice in most of his affairs: Nor hath there been, from that time to this, above one or two persons brought to the council, or preferred to any considerable office in the court who have been of my intimate acquaintance, or suspected to have any kindness for me; and most of them most notoriously known to have been very long my enemies, and of different judgment and principles from me, both in Church and State, and have taken all opportunities to lessen my credit with the king, and with all other persons, by mis-representing and mis-reporting all that I said or did, and persuading men I have done them some prejudice with his majesty, or crossed them in some of their pretensions: Though his majesty's goodness and justice was such that it made little impression upon him.

"In my humble opinion, the great misfortunes of the kingdom have proceeded from the war, to which it is notoriously known that I was always most averse, and may without vanity say, I did not only foresee, but declare the mischiefs we should run into, by entering into a war, before any alliances made with the neighbouring princes. And that it may not be imputed to his majesty's want of care, or the negligence of his counsellors, that no such alliances were entered into, I must take the boldness to say, his majesty left nothing unattempted in order thereunto; and knowing very well, that France resolved to begin a war upon Spain, as soon as his catholic majesty should depart this world, which being much sooner expected by them, they had in the two winters before been at great charges in providing plentiful magazines of all provisions upon the frontiers, that they might be ready for the war, his majesty used all possible means to prepare and dispose the Spaniard with that apprehension, offering his friendship to that degree, as might be for the benefit and security of both Crowns.

"But Spain flattering itself, That France would not break with them, at least, that they would not give them any cause by administering matter of jealousy to them, never made any real approach towards a friendship with his majesty, but, both by their ambassadors here, and to his majesty's ambassador at Madrid, always persisted, as preliminaries, upon the giving up of Dunkirk, Tangier, and Jamaica.

"Though France had an ambassador here, to whom a project of a treaty was offered, and the lord Hollis, his majesty's ambassador at Paris, used all endeavours to pursue and prosecute the said treaty, yet it was quickly discerned, That the principal design of France was to draw his majesty into such a nearer alliance as might advance their design; without which, they had no mind to enter into the treaty proposed.

"And this was the state of affairs when the war was entered into with the Dutch, from which time, neither Crown much considered the making any alliance with England.

"As I did from my soul abhor the entering into this war, so I presumed never to give any advice or counsel for the way of managing it, but by opposing many propositions, which seemed to the late Lord Treasurer and myself to be unreasonable, as the payment of the sea-

Mr. Vaughan. If the Lords agree with us, we may spare the declaration, but if they agree not now, they will much less hereafter: your declaration can amount to no more but this, make a narrative of the invalidity of the Lords' Precedents; but then you must of necessity do something more, else your labour is in vain; therefore this Message with these Votes are necessary.

Sir Rich. Temple. I expected that when the earl of Clarendon had been fled, the Lords would have desired the king to issue out a proclamation to apprehend him, seeing they have been the occasion of his escape; therefore now desire their concurrence to go to the king to that end, and if they concur, they have upon the matter granted commitment upon a general impeachment.

Mr. Vaughan. I thought it my duty to offer you what I have done; if you like it not, I desire to be excused in serving you in the declaration, and that they who think it necessary would be pleased to take the pains to do it.

Sir Tho. Lee. If you declare, it will beget an answer, and where will that end? if you send up your Votes, and the Lords agree, your end is answered; for it is a yielding that which they have yet denied; your declaring, and entering it upon the journal, will be to no purpose. It is but like a man, who having been beaten publicly, in the chamber calls him who did it rogue.

Mr. Hampden. I desire that the words, 'Law of the land' may be left out, and the words 'Law of parliament' or, 'Usage of parliament' put instead of them; for it hath been shewed us, that there are several ways of impeachment besides common-law.

Mr. Vaughan. Those words were purposely put in, because at the free conference, when we pressed the law of parliaments, the Lords pressed the law of the land, by way of negative as if the law of the land were otherwise; but rather than that shall be any obstruction put it by law.

Mr. Steward. Leave out the words, 'by law' for if a man be secured, it is implied by them who do-commit that it is according to law.

Then it being moved to draw both Votes in one;

Sir Tho. Littleton. Though you should put both Votes into one, it will not answer your end, for the Lords will not concur with the first part, and yet may make use of what part you grant of it, that in the last, and so have advantage against you: but there is another reason, why you should forbear these Votes, namely, prudence.—The earl of Clarendon being gone, there is an expectation that a Bill should be prepared to do something farther, wherein I hope both Houses will join; if you send up this, you will give disturbance to that Bill; and if you should enter this in your Books, in order to send it up hereafter, they will hear of it, as done to make them swallow their former Resolves. Therefore defer it for the present.

Mr. Trevor. Consider whether the matter betwixt you and the Lords is not well as it is: you have voted, that when a man is generally impeached, he ought to be secured, and that the Lords not having done it, is an obstruction to justice, and what will it signify to carry it to the Lords? what hath since fallen out, justifies you, and lays the disadvantage upon the Lords. The world expects now what you will do further, and that must be by concurring with the Lords.

Sir Tho. Clifford. We all agree to these votes, in order to justify your rights; but what is the use of it? you have already done it in your books, and you cannot expect the Lords should go so much against their own votes; this therefore will but widen the gap, it being telling them they must eat their words.

Sir Tho. Littleton. Those who have had a hand in the Charge against the earl of Clarendon, have been thought sometimes too violent, sometimes too remiss as not able to make out the charge; but what I speak now, is for your honour, which will be wronged in this proceeding; I am for bringing the impeachment to something; and therefore against these votes: now you make a declaration of your own rights, and entering it upon your books, that not only the vote may appear, but the ground of it, but not to declare to the Lords, which will beget an answer, and exasperate. It is now unreasonable to make the Lords retract, therefore lay it aside; for though I am confident that gentleman did it to no such end, yet if I would design any thing to the earl of Clarendon's advantage, I could not take a better way than this.

Mr. Vaughan. This is but the affirming all which hath been done already, and I am for none of those, who are contriving for any thing out of the House.

Sir Will. Coventry. This question is not now seasonable; though it is a better expedient than the declaration, as things now stand, and considering what hath past, I am apt to think the Lords may do it of their own accord, and you would not willingly have a negative to your votes. Therefore, seeing your votes may be of use hereafter, put no question at all, but adjourn the debate to a proper season.

Mr. Vaughan. I am against the adjourning of it, and have given testimony, that I have done nothing to be thought to do that which is so much for the advantage of the earl of Clarendon, and shall take heed of doing any thing hereafter to be so reflected on.

Sir Tho. Littleton. I hope I avoided any such reflection, nor did I speak any thing to such purpose. I do not believe, nor ever did think any such thing, and hope that gentleman himself believes, that no man in this House hath more honour for him than I.

Sir J. Charlton. Let the world see that you do not intend to restrain your proceedings to the earl of Clarendon; but make it a general care; and therefore are concerned in honour to put the question, Resolved upon the question, that the question be put.

Resolved, "That both the questions propounded by Mr. Vaughan, and put singly in the affirmative, be carried up to the Lords."

December 13.

A Bill was brought from the Lords, to banish the earl of Clarendon, and read.—After reading, several objections being made, and it being alledged that it was an abuse put upon the Commons by the Lords, and that a bill of attainder being propounded, after some debate, the House passed this vote :

Resolved, "That this House taking notice of the flight of the earl of Clarendon, being under an impeachment of High-Treason by this House ; the king's majesty be humbly desired to issue out his Proclamation for summoning the said earl to appear by a day, and to apprehend him in order to his trial."

Resolved, "To send to the Lords for their concurrence to this Vote."

December 14.

A Message from the Lords for a Conference, at which they delivered two reasons, why they could not concur.

1. "First, for that they conceive a Proclamation in the way proposed would be ineffectual, since it is not sub pena convictionis, which cannot be until particulars in order to trial be declared.

2. "That what the House of Commons hath proposed, and do propose at present, is intended in order to a judicial way of proceeding ; but since the earl of Clarendon's flight, their lordships, upon consideration of the whole state of affairs, and of the kingdom, have upon grounds of prudence and justice thought fit, for securing of king and kingdom, to proceed in a legislative way against the said earl, and have to that end past and sent down to them a bill of banishment and incapacity against him with which this vote is inconsistent."

December 16.

The said Reasons from the Lords being reported and considered, and it being moved that the House would declare themselves unsatisfied with them :

Sir Tho. Clifford. I am against passing a vote present upon the Lords' Reasons, but read the bill sent down from thence, and summons him by it to appear by a day.

Mr. Trevor. Some are against the bill, because it goes too far, condemning before hearing, others would have it to go farther. Summons is in order to hearing, trial, and judgment ; of those he hath made himself incapable by flight, and hath in his paper told you, 'That he will neither be heard, nor tried by you : ' Though you expected to have him secured by a general accusation, yet you never expected judgment upon it. Then it is said, This banishment falls short of Treason ; but we are not to pass sentence for crimes, but as a council propound to the king what is necessary in this case : then consider whether this bill will answer our ends, and if it doth, delay will make it worse. I think we should make it reach them. What if he hath life in other parts, his family untainted, and his children alive, and enjoy his estate ?

Sir Rob. Carr. You have ordered to consider the Reasons from the Lords, therefore do it.

Mr. Hen. Coventry. The Motion to read the bill is not against your order, because part of the Reasons given by the Lords is, 'That you have a bill and until you have read the bill you cannot lay by the Reasons.' The earl of Clarendon is fled, you have a tie upon him in having his innocent relations, and by proceeding farther you make him desperate, you are now in an even way with the Lords ; therefore read the bill.

Mr. Swinfen. You may go upon the Reasons, and yet not reject the bill ; for when you sent to the Lords about a Proclamation, and went not upon the bill, it was because what the bill drives at, is the highest punishment next to death. Therefore consider what weight is in the reasons. One of them seeming to put you upon the bill, they put you thereupon on a legislative way ; they will neither secure nor summon him, but will condemn him unheard. They cannot secure him upon a charge of treason, nor yet summon him, but they can condemn him ; and this they put you upon, which is against honour and justice, especially to do it upon reason of state. The legislative power of parliament is great, it hath no bound, but the integrity and justice of parliaments. If reason of state be a motive of parliament to banish one man, so it may be for many. If you go in this legislative way, you bring upon yourselves all the dishonour of the business, but the Lords will have some excuse, which you cannot, for they looked upon the charge so slight, as not to imprison him ; the party is gone, because he was not secured, apprehending (he saith) fear of the multitude, not of his trial ; so that the Lords not giving credit to your charge against him, he says, 'he flies not from justice.' Now if upon this bill you shall banish him, it would be said you could not make good the charge, and therefore laid this sentence upon him.—The precedent is also dangerous : if having gone so far in a judicial way you should now go in a legislative : if upon reason of state, Lords may be banished, it may be by dozens : as you proceed justly, so you will be justified.—Nor is the danger greater if the Lords go by Proclamation, and he be put into custody when he comes ; if he can practise any thing, will not he be less capable when under the Proclamation, than when this bill is passed, which condemns him without hearing ? and I am not for any punishment till heard. In Cromwell's case, who moved in Hen. 8's time, to attain a Lord unheard, the judges declared they might, and it would stand ; afterward the said Cromwell was attainted and condemned unheard, and such counsel usually falls upon those that counselled it.

Sir Rob. Howard. The earl of Clarendon saith, 'That he doth not withdraw from your justice, but for fear of tumults;' but that reason any man may give for his flying, if it will be an excuse; but he might have secured himself from tumults by rendering himself, and his innocency upon his trial would have cleared him. This at last may come to a Free Conference, then you may be left to go along with the king; the House riseth and doth nothing, and then the world will see that this business will assure the king of France, that he hath a man with him so great, as to hinder us from doing any thing against him: therefore as you ought to do something against him, see whether it may not be done by the bill, by resuming his lands, &c. if he come not in by a day. —An exception may be against this way, namely, That there is no attainder; but if there had been such a bill, the thing which should sway me should be the duke of York's marriage: so that if you commit this bill, you may add all severities, except that of attainder, and if he come by a day, then all to be void. If you go by Proclamation, the Lords may not concur, and you lose your ends. By this bill all favour that he can expect is shewed, and this way will be the best confutation of the Lords' Reasons; therefore commit the bill.

Mr. Secretary Morrice. I am for committing the bill, though it be condemning unheard; because he could not but conclude it would be so. 'Et volenti non fit injuria.'

Sir R. Temple. You have proceeded against this Earl in all ordinary ways, and have been baffled by the Lords. In Edw. 3rd's reign, Adam de Berry fled, and a Proclamation went against him, and the Commons neither did, nor ever were bound to deliver their articles till the party appeared, and in that case they delivered not their articles till the last day, when he not appearing was convicted. When you would go by attainder, they tell you, deliver special matter, and we will summon him; when you ask a Proclamation, they tell you, deliver special matter: if you declare the matter to the court, it is upon record, and all may know it. You have tried all ways legal and regular, and they will do you justice in neither. Now what can you do? Except you and the Lords combine in justice together, he must escape, and if you can be made to differ, he goes away in a smoke. If you go to the king for a Proclamation, you must return to the Lords for justice. I am sorry the Ivy hath been so near the Oak, that you cannot touch it, without touching that. There remains a bill before you, and in that you are upon equal terms with the Lords; therefore give him a day to be heard, and if he come, let him; but then his penalties are too low for his crimes; therefore read the bill, go higher, degrade him of honours, forfeit his lands, and whether you will go so far, I leave with you.

Mr. Sol. Gen. It is not impossible to agree with the Lords in their Reasons, but the reason must be because the bill is good. But if any man thinks it is good upon the Lords' Reasons, he is mistaken; and therefore my advice is to proceed upon the bill, though not upon the Reasons from the Lords. Some think the punishment in the bill too little for the crime, others too much, because not summoned; so that it must fall out, that a person impeached by the House of Commons must see the House rise without any marks of displeasure upon him: can any man be heard, who will not be heard? Why should not you proceed in such a way against him, as whose very flight amounts to a confession? And have you not burnt his paper for reflecting upon the House? and can you think he will appear who is departed in despair of the court? And now you are contending to give him time.—Then consider the thing in itself. Suppose the king had a mind to attain him, the king can do it without your help, for he may be out-lawed for high-treason; for though that be reversible at common-law, if he be beyond sea, yet by two express acts of parliament it is otherwise, but the king cannot banish him without your concurrence: suppose him fled and attainted, so that the question is not upon his life, but his estate, suppose your justice satisfied in that, is it not past all manner of consideration that the king cannot upon application restore it, so that all you looked for by attainder, is done by this bill of banishment, for his life is saved by flight, as would his estate by compassion; but there is something in this bill, which, without it, you can never get, that is, you put him under your displeasure, which the king cannot pardon; and will you have it thought abroad, that the earl of Clarendon, fled as he is, hath been something too hard for the two Houses?

Sir Tho. Littleton. If there be a necessity of differing with the Lords, and I thought the difference would produce such effects, I should not speak, but they only tell you it is unnecessary and ineffectual. You have impeached, and are now told if you proceed, it will make difference; but I fear another greater danger than this difference. The world will say you were willing he should fly, because you could not prove; by flying he hath forfeited his estate; if the king give it him again, it is his mercy; but do you justice: therefore press for a Proclamation, for the bill is inconsistent with your honour.

Mr. Vaughan. I have listened with much attention to this discourse, and understand it as little now as at the beginning, the discourse being nothing adequate to that end. You have Reasons from the Lords why they agree not with you, and if you agree with the Reasons, the sum is to read the bill; but if you agree not, you must desire a conference, and if they concur, you may have a Proclamation, if not (as I think they will not) you are where you were: we suppose him not to be in England, and if so, what is the Proclamation more than the king's writ? It reacheth no man out of the kingdom. It is true, in some cases, if the persons are gone out of the land they are summoned, and if they come not, their lands are seized, but it is not by Proclamation, which signifies nothing if the party be gone.—Then go on; suppose the Lords join in desiring a Proclamation, the end of which is appearing and apprehending; possibly you gain one part, that if he be apprehended, they do imprison him upon a general impeachment; but if they agree not, what benefit have you by it? None: but if he appears, to what is it? There is no charge, if apprehended, to answer the general charge.—Then the third way is, If the Lords agree not, that you shall go to the king; and there is a more dangerous rock in that, than in any thing; for we never heard of a commitment ‘per ipsum dominum regem,’ but ‘per mandatum domini regis,’ because against the king lies no damages: what then must you do? Many think it injustice to proceed, if he be not called by Proclamation. But it is plain, if you proceed upon this bill, you go not upon your impeachment, but because he is fled from the justice of the land, wherewith you have charged him in burning his paper; and it imports little, that he saith he is innocent; for why then doth he fly? Shall we abate him of what he ought to suffer for his saying so? He is fled from the justice of the parliament, and therefore is proceeded with; and for what others say, you ought not to regard popular reasons, but to pursue your own; it is enough for you to hear some proofs made: when was it known in any court, that proofs should be taken only on one side? So that you cannot acquit your own justice, nor bring him any ways to answer, he being gone; nor can you have any effect of the Proclamation, though the Lords join in it: therefore unless you will have nothing done after all this, (for he may not be guilty of all charged, who yet hath made himself guilty of what is charged by flying) read the bill.

At last the question was put, whether the bill should be read and committed: 109 for it. 55 against it.

December 18.

The Bill for banishing the earl of Clarendon was reported from the Committee, and read.

Sir Robert Howard. I desire that to the Preface of the Bill this addition may be made; “That whereas the earl of Clarendon was impeached of Treason by the Commons, who desired he might be secured, but was not, and thereupon is fled.” And this to the end the protesting Lords may be gratified, who took so much care of the Commons.

Sir Robert Carr seconds the motion.

Sir John Talbot. I cannot conour with that motion, because we cannot take notice of what the Lords do.

Sir R. Temple. We may take notice of things in the Lords’ books which are records, and there the Protest is entered; and though not to gratify them who owned our right, yet we ought to take care of our own right: And that the world may see we have some cause to pass this bill, neither deal so modestly with a man who flies from justice, as to use his own word (withdraw) but call it flying.

Sir Thomas Gower. Let the words be, ‘that having been impeached, and moved to be secured, hath withdrawn himself.’

Mr. Solicitor. The word ‘moved,’ destroys the bill itself: the word of the bill is to unite the two houses, and this Amendment tends to destroy that end, for the addition to the Preface being insisted on, the Lords will add the reasons for not committing, and so revive the whole matter again. Let the Lords add in their books what they will, your books will as much justify you, as theirs them.

Sir Hum. Winch. Let the words be added, whether the Lords agree, or not, that it may appear upon our books.

Mr. Hugh Boscawen. The preface is but history, yet add these words, and let the Lords insert what they please. I should rather concur with them, than leave out those words.

Mr. Vaughan. Put no question upon these words, but whether the Preface shall go as it is: The bill in probability is a safe bill, because it came from them: But if you begin an alteration, you yourselves render it unsafe; for if you put in these words, then the Lords will add, ‘for want of special matter,’ and so it will come to nothing.

Then the Bill was read the third time.

Mr. Vaughan. I am against the word ‘withdraw,’ and for the word ‘flight’ instead of it, and in regard the justice of this bill depends upon the word ‘flight,’ put it expressly.

Sir R. Carr. I am against this bill, though I was earnest in the matter as any one while I thought there was proof; but now none appearing, I am against the bill, because you are confirming what the Lords have done.

Mr. Vaughan. Many men wonder that no reason is given for passing this bill, but the question is mistaken, the bill is grounded upon his flight after his impeachment, and his flying implies some guilt; if none, it is the safest argument for any man to run away, and then there is nothing to catch him. A proclamation to a man out of the kingdom signifies nothing. But in the whole it is plain, that he saith, that finding the king’s Justice obstructed in parliament, he is fled. Obj. But it will be said, Upon bare flight never was any man punished. Answ. If one man kills another and flies, though upon his trial he shall be acquitted, yet he shall never recover his goods because of his flight. There have been several Acts of Banishment, Spencer, &c. And though in this there is something more severe than in them, namely that none shall correspond with him; yet there is also some advantage, namely, that if he come in by the 1st of February all shall be void; for when the crime is laid, and his flight makes him guilty, he ought not to have a day.

Then the question was put for passing the bill; 65 for it, 42 against it. So the bill passed the Commons, and afterwards obtained the royal assent. It is as follows, stat. 19 Car. 2, c. 10.

An Act for Banishing and Disenabling the Earl of Clarendon.

“Whereas Edward earl of Clarendon having been impeached by the Commons assembled in parliament, of treason and other misdemeanors, hath knowingly withdrawn himself, and is fled, whereby justice cannot be done upon him according to his demerit, Be it enacted by the king's most excellent majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons in parliament assembled, and by authority of the same, That the said Edward earl of Clarendon shall and do suffer perpetual Exile, and be for ever banished this realm, and all other his majesty's dominions, and shall be for ever disabled from having, holding or enjoying any office or place of public trust, or any other employment whatsoever.

“And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That it shall be, and be taken to be treason, for the said Earl at any time to return into, or be found in England, or any other his majesty's dominions, after the 1st day of February, according to the account of England, 1667; and that in case the said Earl shall at any time return into, or be found in England, or any other his majesty's dominions, after the said 1st day of February, That the said Earl shall suffer the pains and penalties of treason, and be made incapable of any pardon from the king's majesty, his heirs and successors, but by act of parliament; and that all correspondence with the said Earl, except it be of his children, or such persons as shall be licensed by the king in council, concerning his estate and domestic affairs only, after the said 1st day of February, shall be, and he taken to be of the same nature as correspondence with a traitor; and the offender therein shall suffer such pains and penalties, as by the laws of this realm are to be inflicted upon such persons as keep correspondence with traitors; and that all letters sent to the said Earl, be shewed to one of the principal Secretaries of State before they be sent; and that all letters which shall be received from the said Earl, be likewise shewed to one of the principal Secretaries within ten days after each receipt, under the penalties aforesaid.

“Provided always, That if the said earl of Clarendon shall on or before the said 1st day of February next, render himself unto one of his majesty's principal Secretaries of State, or to the Lieutenant of the Tower of London for the time being, in order to his trial, which shall be in parliament, That then and in such case, all and every the penalties and disabilities by this act imposed upon the said Earl of Clarendon, shall be utterly void and of no effect, any thing herein before mentioned to the contrary notwithstanding.”

Against this Act, the following Protests were entered in the Lords' Journals.

December 12. An Act for banishing and disabling the earl of Clarendon, was read a third time. The question being put, whether his Bill shall pass; It was resolved in the affirmative.

“I whose name is underwritten do, according to the ancient right and usage of all the peers of the realm assembled in parliament, after due leave demanded from the House in the usual manner and form, as the Journal Book doth shew, enter and record my Protestation and dissent as follows. 1. That without having ever been in prison, or imprisonment appointed, or any legal charge brought, it seems unjust to punish the earl of Clarendon for only withdrawing himself; it not being at all certain to the house, that he is gone out of the kingdom; and if it were known to the Lords that he were fled beyond the seas, though the fault would be very great in a person who hath lately been in such trust, yet perpetual exile, and being for ever disabled from bearing any office, and the penalties in the bill, seem too severe a censure. 2. That it may, perhaps, give some occasion for the scandal to have it believed, that the House of Commons, and others, by standing so long upon pretence of a privilege to require commitment before special matter of Treason assigned, were in doubt, that no proof of Treason could be made out against the party accused; and that they had therefore designed, through terror, to make him fly; and fear, lest he should yet return to be tried, in case they should bring in special matter of Treason, as they ought to do, whensoever they accuse. 3. That by this bill, power being taken from the king to pardon, it appeareth to be a great entrenchment upon his majesty's royal prerogative. 4. That there can be no such case, as have been pretended, ever to cause a necessity in the House of Commons not to acquaint the Lords with the particulars openly made known to them, by which they were first satisfied to find ground to accuse. 5. That the Commons, so far judging any article to be Treason, as to insist upon commitment, without imparting the particulars to the Lords, do seem therein to usurp that first part of judicature from the Lords, who are the highest Court of justice in the kingdom. 6. That to require such commitment seems to be contrary to the Petition of Right and Magna Charta, and the rights not only of the peers, and great persons of this kingdom, but the birth-right even of the meanest subjects; and therefore those proceedings not having been according to law and the ancient rules of parliament, hath given opportunity to the earl of Clarendon to absent himself. 7. The commitment upon a general impeachment hath been heretofore, and may be again, of most dangerous consequence; and as is conceived, the Lords have yet no way for them so well to justify their fair and upright proceedings in the earl of Clarendon's business, and the true regard they have had herein to the king and kingdom, as to decline this Bill of Banishment, and to expect a particular accusation of the said earl; and thereupon according to law and justice to appoint him a day for appearance, which if he observe not, without farther process, sentence might lawfully be pronounced against him. Strafford."

"We having this day given our negatives to the passing of a Bill for banishing and disabling the earl of Clarendon; and having asked leave of the house to enter our dissents, to the end that it may appear to posterity that we did not give our consents to that bill, we do now take liberty to enter our dissents, by subscribing our names. Berkeley of Berkeley, Holles, Ro. Lexington, T. Culpeper."

'The Earl of CLARENDON's Vindication of Himself against the Articles of Treason exhibited against him in Parliament.*

Mr. Seymour's SPEECH to the House of Lords.

"My Lords:

"The Commons assembled in parliament, having received information of divers treason-able practices and designs of a great peer of this House, (Edward earl of Clarendon) command me to accuse the said Edward earl of Clarendon of Treason, and other crimes and misdemeanors; and I do here in their names,

* "As nothing could be more surprising to me, nor I think to any man else, than to find myself, after near thirty years service of the crown in the highest trust; after having passed all the time of his majesty's exile with him beyond the seas, and in his service, and in which the indefatigable pains I took was notorious to many nations; and after I had the honour and happiness to return again with his majesty into England, and to receive from him so many eminent marks of his favour, and to serve him near eight years after his return, in the place of the greatest trust, without ever having discovered that his majesty was offended with me, or, in truth, that he had ever the least ill success from any counsel I had ever given him; or that any person of honour and reputation, or interest in the nation, had ever made the least complaint against me, or had any thought that the miscarriages (for miscarriages were enough spoken of) had proceeded from me, or any advice of mine: I say, as after all this I could not but be exceedingly surprised, to find myself on a sudden, when I had not the least imagination of it, bereft of the king's favour; and fallen so far from his kindness, even within three or four days after his majesty had vouchsafed to condole with me in my house for the death of my wife, that he resolved to take the Great Seal from me: So it was no small comfort to me, to see and know, that very few men of honour or reputation approved or liked what was done; but that the same was contrived, pursued and brought to pass by men and women of no credit in the nation; by men, who had never served his majesty or his blessed father eminently or usefully, but most of them in trust and credit under Cromwell, or never of credit to do him the least service; and who were only angry with me for not being pleased with their vicious and debauched lives, or for opposing or dissuading their loose and unreasonable counsels, which they were every day audaciously administering in matters of the highest moment, with great licence and presumption.

But, above all, it was of the highest consolation to me, when it was publicly and industriously declared, that the king was firmly resolved to destroy me, and would take it very well from all men who would contribute thereunto, by bringing in any charge or accusation against me; when the most notorious enemies I had, were the only persons trusted in employment; men who had most eminently deserved and maliciously traduced the king, and been to that time looked upon as such by his majesty; and all who were believed to have kindness for me, were discountenanced; when men of all conditions and degrees were daily solicited and importuned, by promises and threats, to declare themselves against me, at least if they would not be wrought over to do any thing against their consciences, that they absent themselves from those debates; that all this malice and conspiracy, with so long deliberation and consultation, should not be able at best to produce and exhibit any other charge and accusation against me, but such a one, as most men who knew me, or had any trust and employment in the public affairs, were well able to vindicate me from the guilt of, and even my enemies themselves did not believe: The particulars whereof (as far as I can take notice of them, they having not to this day been reduced to any form, so much as in the House of Commons itself) I shall now examine; and if I shall appear too tedious in the examination and disquisition of them, and to say more than is necessary for my own Defence, and to mention many particular persons in another manner than is usual upon occasions of this kind; I desire it may be remembered and considered, that this is not written as a formal Answer to an Impeachment, nor like to be published in my life-time; a judgment of Banishment being passed against me (without the least proof made, or offered, for the making good any one Article of Treason or Misdemeanor) by act of parliament; but is a debt due to my children and posterity, that they may know (how much soever they are or may and in the names of the Commons of England, accuse Edward earl of Clarendon of Treason, and other high crimes and misdemeanors. I am further commanded by the House of Commons, to desire your lordships, that the earl of Clarendon may forthwith be sequestered from parliament, and be committed to safe custody. They further command me to acquaint your lordships, that they will in convenient time exhibit the articles of the charge against him."

November 14, 1667.

The Vote of the House of Lords.

Resolved, &c.; "That the Lords have not complied with the desire of the House of Commons, concerning the commitment of the earl of Clarendon, and sequestering him from parliament; because the House of Commons have only accused him of Treason in general, and have not assigned or specified any particular Treason."

ARTICLES of Treason exhibited in Parliament against Edward earl of Clarendon.

I. "That the earl of Clarendon hath designed a standing army to be raised, and to govern the kingdom thereby; advising the king to dissolve the present parliament; to lay aside all thoughts of parliaments for the future; to govern by military power, and to maintain the same by free quarter and contribution.

II. "That he hath, in hearing of many of his majesty's subjects, falsely and seditiously said, the king was in his heart a Papist, Popishly affected, or words to that effect.

III. "That he hath received great sums of money for passing the Canary Patent, and other illegal patents; and granting several injunctions to stop proceedings at law against them and other illegal Patents formerly granted.

be involved in the effects of the sharp malice against me) how far I am from any guilt of those odious crimes which have been so odiously laid to my charge. And this being my end, I may be excused if I so far enlarge upon all particulars, that it may be manifest unto them how far I have been from treading in those paths, or having been accessory to those counsels, which have been the source from which any of those bitter waters have flowed, which have corrupted the taste, even almost of the whole nation. And in order to this so necessary discourse and vindication of my integrity and honour, I can only take notice of the printed paper of my Charge, all other correspondence and communication being so strictly inhibited to all kind of men to hold any commerce with me, except my children and menial servants, who only have liberty to write to me of my own domestic affairs, and the letters they write and receive being to be first communicated to one of the secretaries of state." Earl of Clarendon's Letter, dated Montpellier, July 24, 1668.

IV. "That he hath advised and procured divers of his majesty's subjects to be imprisoned against law, in remote islands, garrisons, and other places thereby to prevent them from the benefit of the law; and to introduce precedents for imprisoning of other of his majesty's subjects in like manner.

V. "That he hath corruptly sold several offices, contrary to law.

VI. "That he hath procured his majesty's customs to be farmed at under rates, knowing the same; and great pretended debts to be paid by his majesty, to the payment whereof his majesty was not in strictness bound; And hath received great sums of money for procuring the same.

VII. "That he hath received great sums of money from the company of Vintners, or some of them, or their agents, for enhancing the prices of wine, and for freeing them from the payment of legal penalties which they had incurred.

VIII. "That he hath in a short time gained to himself a far greater estate than can be imagined to be lawfully gained in so short a time: And contrary to his oath, hath procured several grants under the great seal from his majesty, to himself and relations, of several of his majesty's lands, hereditaments, and leases, to the dis-profit of his majesty.

IX. "That he introduced an arbitrary government in his majesty's foreign plantations; and hath caused such as complained thereof, before his majesty and council, to be long imprisoned for so doing.

X. "That he did reject and frustrate a proposal and undertaking, approved by his majesty, for the preservation of Nevis and St. Christopher's, and reducing the French plantations to his majesty's obedience, after the commissions were drawn for that purpose; which was the occasion of such great losses and damages in those parts.

XI. "That he advised and effected the sale of Dunkirk to the French king, being part of his majesty's dominions, together with the ammunition, artillery, and all sorts of stores there, and for no greater value than the said ammunition, artillery, and stores were worth.

XII. "That the said earl did unduly cause his majesty's letters patents under the Great Seal of England (to one Dr. Crowther) to be altered, and the inrollment thereof to be unduly razed.

XIII. "That he hath, in an arbitrary way, examined and drawn into question divers of his majesty's subjects concerning their lands, tenements, goods and chattels, and properties; determined thereof at the council-table, and stopped proceedings at law; and threatened some that pleaded the Statute of 17 Car. 1.

XIV. "That he had caused Quo Warrantos to be issued out against most of the corporations of England by act of parliament, to the intent he might receive great sums of money from them for renewing their charters; which when they complied withal, he caused the said

Quo Warrantos to be discharged, and prosecution thereon to cease.

XV. "That he procured the bills of settlement for Ireland, and received great sums of money for the same in a most corrupt and unlawful manner.

XVI. "That he hath deluded his majesty and the nation, in all foreign treaties and negotiations relating to the late war.

XVII. "That he was a principal author of that fatal counsel of dividing the fleet, about June 1666."

The first Charge, then, that is printed against me, is, "That the earl of Clarendon hath designed a standing Army to be raised, and to govern the kingdom thereby; advised the king to dissolve the present parliament; to lay aside all thoughts of parliaments for the future; to govern by military power, and to maintain the same by free quarter and contribution."

It is no great vanity to believe, that there is not one person in England, of any quality, to whom I am in any degree known, who believes me guilty of this charge; and I want not a cloud of witnesses, (besides the testimony that I hope his majesty himself will vouchsafe to give me in this particular) who from all they have heard me say in council, and in conversation, can vindicate me from this odious opinion. Having had the honour, by the special command of his late majesty of blessed memory, to attend the prince, his now majesty, into the parts beyond the seas, and to be always with him and in his service these many years of his exile, and till his happy return; I always endeavoured to imprint in his majesty's mind an affection, esteem and reverence for the laws of the land; without the trampling of which under foot himself could not have been oppressed; and by the vindication and support of them, he could only hope and expect honour and security to the crown. Upon this foundation and declared judgment, I came into the service of his father, by opposing all illegal and irregular proceedings in parliament; and I never swerved from that rule in my advice and counsel to him or his son. From the time of his majesty's happy return from beyond the seas, I took nothing so much at heart as the establishment of the due administration of justice throughout the kingdom, according to the known laws of the land, as the best expedient I could think of for the composing the general distempers of the nation, and uniting the hearts of the people in a true obedience to, and reverence, for his majesty's person and government. And with what success I served his majesty in this province, (which he was pleased principally to commit to my care and trust) I must appeal to the whole nation; and whether the oldest man can remember, that in the best times justice was ever more equally administered, and with less complaint and murmur, which hath been frequently acknowledged from all parts of the kingdom; and been often taken notice of by the king himself with great approbation, and confessed by most of the nobility upon several occasions. I have often declared in parliament the king's affection and reverence for the laws, and his resolution neither to swerve from them himself nor to suffer any one else to do so: And upon the public occasions of swearing the judges in any courts, I always enjoined them to be very strict and precise in the administration of justice according to law, with all equality and without respect of persons, which the king expected from them; and that as he resolved never to interpose by message or letter for the advancement or favour of any man's right or title, so he would take it very ill if any subject (how great soever) should be able to pervert them: And I do believe, there have never passed so many years together in any age, in which the crown hath not in the least degree interposed in any cause or title depending in Westminster-hall, to incline the Court to this or that side; or in which the crown itself hath had so many causes judged against it in several courts; at least in which former practice and usage on the behalf of the crown hath been less followed: And nothing is more known, than that from the time of the king's blessed return into England, even to the preparation of this charge against me, I was reproached with nothing so much as too much adhering to the law, and subjecting all persons to it; and this reproach hath not been cast upon me by any so bitterly and maliciously, and in places where they thought it might produce most prejudice to me, as by those who now contrived this charge, and who have always been great enemies to the law.

All this, and much more of this kind, is manifest to all the world; and therefore I need not labour more in this Vindication. Yet I cannot but observe, that there is not in all the king's forces, nor was not when his forces were then much greater, one officer recommended by me; and most of them such who professed publicly a great animosity against me; having been, by the malice of some men, very unreasonably persuaded that I was their enemy; that I desired that they might be disbanded; at least so obliged to the rules of law, that they should be every day cast into prison; and they had indeed found that in some insolencies they had committed against the law, and some pretences they had made to privileges against arrests, and the like, that I had always opposed their desires. So that it is not probable that I should contribute my advice for the raising a standing army, and that the kingdom should be governed thereby, when there were very few men so like to be destroyed by that army as myself.

There is another part of this article, how improbable and impossible soever, which in many respects will require a more ample discourse and defence: That I advised the king to dissolve the present parliament; to lay aside all thoughts of parliaments for the future; to govern by military power, and to maintain the same by free quarter and contribution. Which particulars, so compounded and put together, and solemnly undertaken to be proved, even by two privy-counsellors, who pretended to be present at the debate, was in truth the foundation of the great prejudice that was raised against me; and which, though known to be false to the persons who dispersed it, and appeared very impossible to all men who had but an indifferent good opinion of my integrity or discretion; yet the manner of the insinuation, and the circumstances with which it was related, and the private intimation from some privy-counsellors that they would prove it, got so much credit in the House of Commons, that they thought fit to make it a part of my charge; and therefore it will be necessary to set out a clear narrative of that whole debate, upon some particulars whereof those informers, against their oath, and against all kind of ingenuity, have grounded their insinuation, and direct (though hitherto secret) information: All the particulars whereof are so well known to several persons of honour who were present, that I could never have doubted, if the matter had ever been brought to a public examination, I should have received an ample vindication; and, in truth, that the informers themselves, how confidently soever they had undertaken it, would never have justified their accusation.

At the last recess of the parliament it had been prorogued to the tenth of October following, I being at that time indisposed with the gout, and so not able to be present. About the beginning of June (the treaty being then begun at Breda,) the Dutch fleet, under the command of De Rutter, came upon our coast, and seemed to be bound for the river of Thames, which caused a general terror in Kent; upon which, lieutenant general Middleton was suddenly sent down thither to draw the train-bands together, in order to which he convened them to Rochester: The fortifications at Sheerness (which the king believed to have been made defensible, having himself made a journey thither in the winter, and charged the commissioners for the ordnance for the prosecution of it, who no doubt failed much in the execution of his commands) were found so weak, and so utterly untenable, that, upon the approach of the Dutch fleet, the soldiers who were in it (who were very good experienced men, and under excellent officers) were by their cannon forced to quit it, and the Dutch presently landed upon it, and seemed to have a resolution of fortifying it: Upon the news whereof, and of the general distraction in that country, the duke of Albemarle was sent down to Chatham with such troops of horse and foot as could speedily be drawn together of the regiments of guards, and such of the train-bands of the neighbour countries as could be persuaded to march. Upon the General's arrival at Chatham, he writ very cheerful and confident letters, that he had no fear of the Dutch, if they should make any attempt, which he was confident they durst not do; and that he had put a chain over the river, which would stop their ships from coming up: However, the next day, being the twelfth of June, the Dutch fleet advanced, having without the least difficulty broken the chain, and shortly after taken and burned two or three of the greatest ships of the royal navy (which had been very negligently left there, and might well have been brought into security,) and six or seven merchant-ships, whereof some were outward-bound with merchandise; all things being in so great distraction at Chatham, and thereabouts, that nothing was done that was naturally to be expected from an experienced commander, who had excellent officers with him, ready to obey his orders.

The noise of this quickly filled the city of London; and yet the confusion there was not so great as in the court itself, where they who had most advanced the war, and reproached those who were against it, as men who were not solicitous for the honour of the nation, and who never spoke of the Dutch but with contempt, and that they should be cudgelled, were the most dejected men that can be imagined, speaking very bitterly against those who had advanced the war: And truly, the distraction was so great in court and city, as if an army of 100,000 men had encompassed it; and though the Dutch fleet returned out of the Thames, and advanced no farther than Chatham, yet it remained still upon the coast, and landed about Harwich, and attempted the castle of Langhorne-Point, and kept the counties of Essex, Norfolk, and Suffolk, in perpetual alarm for many days: The train-bands which had been drawn together, pretended that the time was expired that they were obliged to maintain themselves; and therefore required pay, or liberty to depart, though the enemy was in view, and themselves like to be made the first prey. The regiments which had been raised without charge to the king, upon the interest of several persons of honour and great reputation, had upon the first musters received one month's pay; but that time was expired; and they must either receive another pay, or take free quarter upon the country, which the time would not bear. In this perplexity, some persons had advised the king to summon the parliament to convene upon a short day, notwithstanding it stood prorogued till October. And when his majesty asked my opinion of it, I told him I thought it could not be done; I was sure it never had been done. To which his majesty replied, That he was assured by many that he might do it, and named Mr. Pryn to be of that opinion. Shortly after his majesty appointed the whole council to meet upon the debate, of which I knew nothing till I came into the room: The king himself told us what we were to debate upon; that we all saw the straits we were in, the general distemper of the nation, the insolence of the enemy; that there was a necessity of having an army; that he had no money, nor knew where to get any, nor could imagine any other way to provide against the inconveniencies which were in view, than by calling the parliament; of which and any other expedient he would receive our advice; expressing so much of his own sense, that it was plain enough that he inclined to that remedy: Upon which three or four of those who sat at the lower end of the table, and who were known to have contrived the counsel, expressed themselves at large; seemed very confident that it might lawfully be done; that no other way could be found to raise money; that men could not be kept together without money; and desired that they who were of another opinion would propose some other counsel. I do not deny, their reasons did in no degree satisfy me; and though I knew very well that the resolution was upon the matter already taken, that there was a great desire in some men (whose malice to me was enough known) to lead me into some expressions of which they might take advantage; yet the obligation of my oath to deliver myself freely, the conceived security of that place, and the opinion that the thing proposed was not reasonable, and would produce many inconveniences to the king's service, prevailed with me to discharge my own conscience, God knows, according to the best of my understanding: I said, I knew well the disadvantage upon which I spoke in so tender a point, and too unpopular a thing it was to be against the convening of the parliament in a time of so great straits, when no other remedy could be found; yet that appearing to me not practicable, I thought, it ought not to be embraced; that it was confessed by all hands, that in the point of law, the convening them before the time to which they were adjourned, was at least very doubtful; and to me, upon all the disquisition I could make, it was very clear that it could not be done; that the temper of both Houses was well known; and it could not but be presumed, that when they came together the first debate they would fall upon would be of the manner of their coming, and whether they were in a capacity to act; and I doubted very much, that there would be very few who would be willing to pass an Act of parliament in so doubtful a season; and then if their meeting was only to confer, when they might say any thing, and, conclude nothing, I thought it well worth the considering, whether in so general a distemper, such an assembly might not interrupt all other consultations and expedients, and yet propose none, and so encrease the confusion: I said, if the necessities were so urgent, that it was necessary to have a parliament convened, and that they could not lawfully re-assemble that which was prorogued till the day to which it was prorogued, as I was confident it could not be, there could be no doubt but that it was in the king's power to dissolve that parliament, and forthwith issue out writs for the calling another parliament, which might regularly be assembled more than a month before the prorogued parliament could meet. And there were many more of the council of the same mind, that it would be best to dissolve the parliament, and to call another. Many declared themselves against this expedient; professing, that though there had at some times appeared many ill humours and misapprehensions in the House of Commons, yet that they were very right in the main, for the king's service; and that there is no hope ever to see another House so well constituted for church and state; and the king himself seemed to have the same opinion, and no inclination to dissolve it; and so resumed the former debate, what was to be done for the present to raise money, or to maintain his army, if he should not call the parliament to meet before the day? The old argument, that there could be no other way to be found out, was urged; and calling with more than usual earnestness in that place, that they who were of another opinion would propose their expedient, the king himself, with some quickness, asked me what I would advise? To which I replied, that if in truth that which was proposed was in the nature of it not practicable, and being practised could not attain the effect, it ought to be laid aside, though another could not for the present be proposed; that I thought it clear, that the parliament could not be assembled in less than twenty days, and that if they were met, and believed themselves lawfully qualified to grant a supply of money, we all know the formality of that transaction would require so much time, that money could not be raised soon enough thereby to raise an army, or maintain that part of it which was raised to prevent the landing of an enemy which was already upon the coast, and (as many thought) ready every day to make their descent; and yet the sending out a proclamation for re-assembling the parliament, would inevitably put an end to all our councils: that, for my part, I believed the Dutch had satisfied themselves with the affront they had given us, and had no thought of proceeding farther; that they could not have men enough on board to make any descent, without our having notice of it; and that the king had all possible security from the king of France, that he had no such intention, and then it would not be in the power of the Dutch, with their own strength to give us any trouble: however, for the present support of those troops which were to guard the coasts, since money could not be found for their present constant pay, without which free quarter could not be avoided, the only way that appeared to be practicable, and to avoid the last evil, would be to write letters to the lieutenants and deputy-lieutenants of those counties where the troops were obliged to remain, that they would cause provisions of all kinds to be brought into their quarters, that so the soldiers might not be compelled to straggle to provide for their own victuals, which would end in the worst kind of free quarter; and that the like letters might be written to the neighbour counties, wherein no soldiers were quartered, to raise money by way of contribution as had heretofore been done, that so the troops might be enabled to stay, and continue in the posture they were in, for defence of the kingdom, in which those other counties had their share of the benefit, and without which they must themselves be exposed to the disorder of our own soldiers, or to the invasion of the enemy upon their retreat, or to both: and it is possible, that in the earnestness of this debate, and the frequent interruptions which were given, I might use that expression of raising contribution, as had been done in the late civil war; but how, from such a debate, in such a place, and with such circumstances, every particular whereof will be justified by many Lords of the Council, who were then present, can naturally be formed any conclusion, or in truth any reasonable imagination, that I have designed a standing army to govern the kingdom by, advised the king to dissolve the present parliament, to lay aside all thoughts of parliaments for the future, to govern by military power, and to maintain the same by free quarter and contribution, I must and am very willing to refer and submit to the impartial judgment of the parliament, and of all discerning men.

The second Article is, "That I have, in the hearing of many of his majesty's subjects, falsely and seditiously said, The king was in his heart a Papist, Popishly affected, or words to that effect."

I have occasion too often, throughout this whole charge, to acknowledge and magnify the great goodness of God Almighty, that since he thought not fit (for my greater humiliation, and it may be to correct the pride of a good conscience) to preserve me entirely from these aspersions of infamy, and those Flagella Linguae, those strokes of the tongue, which always leave some mark or scar in the reputation they desire to wound, that he hath yet infused into the hearts of my enemies, who suggested and contrived this prosecution against me, to lay such crimes to my charge, as my nature is known most to abhor, and which cannot only not be believed, but must be contradicted, and a vindication of me from that guilt must be made, by all men who know me to any degree, or have been much in my company; and as justice would have required it, so the usual form in cases of this kind doth exact, that in so general a charge they should have named one single person of those many in whose hearing I have laid that odious imputation upon the king; and every man will presume, that one such person would have been named, if he could have been found. There is no man now alive, who hath had the honour to be so many years about or near the person of the king, as I have been; no man who knows more the temptations he hath undergone, and the assaults he hath sustained in the matter of his religion, during the whole time of his exile, when almost a total despair possessed the spirits of most men of his own religion, that he would ever recover his regality; and the hopes, and promises, and assurances, were so pregnant, of very many of all conditions, that he should suddenly recover if he would change it: no man knows so well, with what Christian courage he repelled those assaults, or with what pious contempt and indignation he resisted and rejected those temptations; nor hath any man (I think) held more discourses with his majesty concerning religion, and sooner and more clearly discerned the reproaches he would undergo, from that innate candour in his princely nature, which disposed him to receive any addresses, or hear any discourses, which those of several factions in religion, with great presumption, have used to present to him; whilst his majesty hath, with equal temper, and singular benignity, heard all; and pitying their errors, dismissed them with evidence, that their arguments were too weak to make impression in his judgment; which though they knew well, yet either party, out of the vanity of their hearts, used all the endeavours they could to get it believed that the king was propitious to them and their party; and the Papists, being most presumptuous in particular, and in their dark walks in their several counties making it a special argument to their proselytes, and those they endeavoured to make so, that the king favoured them, and was of their religion in his heart; of which and the great prejudice it brought to his majesty, I frequently received advertisements from many persons of honour, and of warm affections to the government; of which I always informed the king, who was exceedingly offended at their folly and presumption, and wished that some of them might be apprehended, and prosecuted with the utmost rigour, and that some such prosecution might be made against all Roman Catholics, that they might all be convicted; which I always gave in charge to the judges accordingly; and upon that and the like occasions had a just and necessary opportunity to enlarge in the presence of many persons of honour and interest in the kingdom upon the sincerity of the king's religion, and his constant exercise of it when he suffered by it; giving such instances of many particulars as were pertinent to the discourse. Of which endeavours of mine, and of some fruit thereof, I doubt not but that many of as considerable persons as are in England will be ready to give me their testimony: and I may without vanity say, that I had more than a common part in the framing and promoting that act of parliament, that hath made those seditious discourses, of the King's being a Papist in his heart, or popishly affected, so very penal as it is; and therefore there is need of an undoubted and uncontrollable evidence, that I did so soon run into that crime myself; which is all I shall for the present say upon the second article.

The third Article is, "That I have received great sums of money for passing the Canary Patent, and other illegal patents; and granted several injunctions to stop proceedings at law, against them, and other illegal patents formerly granted."

I did presume in my humble address to the House of Peers to assure their lordships, that I never received one penny over and above the just perquisites of my office, according to the precedent and practice of the best times, which I conceived to be those of my lord Coventry and my lord Elmesmore, and which I had made my rule in all that I had received, except only what I had from the immediate bounty of the king. And as I did always all that was in my power to prevent and stop all illegal patents; so I believe there are more found in this office stopped by me than by any of my predecessors in so long time: but since the Canary patent hath made so much discourse to my reproach, I shall enlarge upon it, and set down very punctually all the proceedings I know in that affair: by which both the reasonableness and justice of that grant will appear, and my innocence and unconcernment in it.

About the first Christmas after the king's return into England, the Lord Treasurer, the Lord Privy-seal, myself, and the two chief-justices, (being the persons appointed by the statute for that service) met together to set the several prices upon the several wines; and were attended, according to custom, by the company of Vintners, and the chief merchants in the city who traded in that merchandize; and being first to limit the merchants to a reasonable rate, before we could set any price to the Vintner, upon the retale, we found, by the best enquiry we could make, that the first prices beyond the seas which the merchants paid for their wine were so excessive, that the retale could not be brought within any compass; and that since the beginning of the troubles the price of wine in general was exceedingly increased, and particularly that of the Canaries was almost double to what it had been in the year 1640. I knew very well, by the correspondence I had held in the Canaries, (during the time I had served his majesty as his ambassador in Spain) that the whole trade of Canary wines was driven solely by the English, and the commodity entirely vented in the king's dominions, all Christendom beside not spending five pipes of Canary wine; and therefore I asked the merchants, what would be the way to remedy that mischief, and whether what I had reported was not true? They confessed it to be very true, and that it was a reproach to our nation to be so much imposed upon in a trade that we might govern ourselves; and that the unreasonable prices of the wine was not the greatest prejudice that was befallen that trade: that before the troubles they had been so far from employing any stock of money, that they sent their ships fully laden with all commodities thither, which yielded very good markets, being sent from thence to the West-Indies in their plate fleets; that the very pipe-staves they carried did very near discharge the value of the wine, so that they brought home the proceed of their other commodities, either in pieces of eight; or such other merchandize as had been brought thither from the Indies, and upon which they received great profit: that, on the contrary, the trade is now wholly driven by ready money; that the commodities they send thither will not be taken off, except at their own prices; so that they have for the late years sent their vessels empty thither, except only with some few pipe-staves, which, by the destruction in Ireland, they cannot send in any great proportion from hence; and their ships return from thence with no other lading but those wines, which they pay for in ready money, either with pieces of eight sent in their ships from thence, or by bills of exchange charged upon some known merchants in Spain; that over and above this, they had of late set new duties upon the wine, and laid other impositions upon the merchants, than the English nation hath been ever accustomed to; they said, that all this proceeded from the immoderate appetite we have for that sort of wine, and therefore we take from them as much as they can make; and from our own disorder and irregularity in buying them, in contending who shall get the most; and so raising the prices one upon another, and making the Spaniards themselves judges what we shall pay. My Lords, upon consultation amongst themselves, found the matter too hard for them, and that the reformation of so much evil must be done by degrees; and upon a representation of all the difficulties to his majesty and his privy-council, whose wisdom could only provide a remedy proportionable to the mischief; for the present, as they were resolved not to raise the present prices at which the wine was bought and sold (which they believed, how reasonable soever, would be very unpopular), so they thought it very unjust to draw down or abate those prices, since it appeared to them that the wines cost more in proportion upon the places of their growth: they declared, therefore, to the merchants and the vintners, that though for the present they would permit the same prices to continue for the next year, which they had been sold for the present year, and which indeed were confirmed by the act of parliament, they should hereafter take care what markets they made; for that they were resolved the next year to make the prices much lower, both to the merchant and the vintner: and upon the report made of the whole matter to the king in council, a Proclamation was published accordingly.

The next year both the merchants and vintners were very earnest suitors, that greater prices might be allowed; or, at least, that the same might be continued; making it very evident that their wines cost them more than they had done the year before. Upon the debate the Canary merchants were much divided; some of them insisting very importunately to have the prices raised, because it was notorious that they had paid much more, by reason, as they said, that the vintage had not yielded near the proportion that it used to do; others, though confessing the increase of price, yet pretending a more public spirit, and the necessity of a reformation, pressed earnestly that the prices might not be raised, but that they might be permitted to take what they had done already for this year. It was quickly perceived whence this moderation proceeded, and that the last proposers had a quantity of wine upon their hands, which had been provided the year before, and so might well be sold at those prices; but that the former had no old left upon their hands, but were supplied with a full provision of new, which had cost them so much dearer. Both the one and the other desired us, that whatever resolution we took for the present, a clause might be inserted in the proclamation, that the next year after Canary wine should not be sold for above twenty-four pounds the pipe, and that every year after it should be drawn lower, as it might well be, it having been sold in the year 1640 for twenty pounds; though his majesty found it at his return permitted to be sold at six-and-thirty: such a clause, they said, would give notice to the Islanders, and oblige them to sell their wine at more reasonable rates, and render the merchants unexcusable, if they should give greater. My lords, notwithstanding all the allegations, thought fit to bring the prices of all wines lower, which they did, as the most effectual warning for the future; but by his majesty's approbation, that clause was inserted in the proclamation as they desired.

The year following, when the Lords met again according to custom (which is, as hath been said, about Christmas,) they found not the least reformation; on the contrary, that the Canary merchants had paid dearer than ever, which made them all more solicitous to have the price raised, and the vintners as importunate for their retail. And indeed the vintners were in much worse condition than the merchants, they making it appear that they paid the merchants much dearer, without which they could get no wine, and so must give over their house-keeping; that the penalty upon the merchant was very small, being not above forty shillings a pipe, and the crime not easy to be discovered, as was manifest by there being not one merchant questioned in many years for that transgression; whereas, on the contrary, the penalty upon the vintners was very severe, and so easily discovered by any man who went to a tavern, and would be an informer, that most of the vintners in London were then sued in the Exchequer upon those penalties, which, if exacted, must produce their present ruin. The merchants excuse themselves for their present pretence, and for their having given more than was lawful for them to have done, by their own desire, that they had done their best, and that the greatest traders amongst them had consented not to suffer the prices to be raised upon them, but that they found it ineffectual: and that though they should give over their trades, it would produce no reformation; that the trade was open to all adventurers, and that there had been many ships sent from England that very year by Jews and other tradesmen, who had never before traded to the Canaries; inso-much as when they who had been long bred up to the trade, and had been long factors in those Islands, sent their ships thither, they found other English ships there, and the wines bought at a greater price than they had allowed their factors to give; so that they must either have their ships return empty and unladen, or take the wines at the prices other men gave; that they had chosen the latter, as well to continue the trade, as to draw home some part of the stock they had in that country; that they could imagine but two ways to reform that excess; the one, by putting the trade in such a method, and under such laws, as might restrain that licence, and not leave it in the power of persons who never had been in the trade to give law to it: and by this means the Islanders would find it necessary to set reasonable prices upon their commodities, and to yield such other advantages and privileges to the merchants as they had heretofore enjoyed; the other, that the king would, by his proclamation, prohibit the importation of any Canary wines into his dominions; and hereby he would quickly receive such propositions from Spain, as would put it into his own power to make the reformation; otherwise the Islanders were persuaded that England could not live without their wines. The Lords were resolved, notwithstanding all that had been said, that they would execute the former proclamation, and reduce the prices of wines to what had been then determined; and after they had given a full account of the whole business unto the king in council, the Resolution was approved, and a proclamation issued out accordingly. The merchants and vintners applied themselves to his majesty, and to many of my Lords of the council, and thought they had encouragement enough from thence to hope for relief, in an appeal by petition to the king and council; and that they had thereupon a day given them to be heard; many of my Lords thought it very hard, if not unjust, to compel men to sell cheaper than they bought, which was the truth of the case, and which must oblige both merchants and vintners to sophisticate and corrupt their wines to preserve their estates, which might probably turn to the great damage of the whole kingdom, in producing sickness and diseases; and this generous and charitable consideration prevailed with the major part of the Lords to be well contented, and to wish that some indulgence might be exercised towards them. On the contrary, when the king had well weighed the whole proceedings, and with trouble and indignation considered the obstinate vice of the nation, which would make us ridiculous to all the world, he expressed a positive resolution to vindicate himself and his government from this reproach. He thought the adhering firmly to the prices which had been resolved upon would be the best preface to this reformation, though it might bring particular damage to particular persons, who had yet less cause to complain, because their own advice had been followed; and thereupon declared, that he would make no alteration: But withal told them, that if they could make any proposition to him for the better regulation of the trade, (for they had themselves mentioned a charter) he would graciously receive any propositions they would make, and gratify them in what was just; and so, notwithstanding all attempts which were often repeated, the price set by the Lords was ratified for the year following.

Shortly after many of the merchants, who had always traded to the Canaries, petitioned the king that they might be incorporated, and that none might be permitted to trade thither but such as would be of that corporation, and observe the constitutions which should be made by them: Which petition was presented to the king at the council-board; and being read, his majesty, according to his custom in matters of difficulty and public concernment, directed it to be laid aside, and read again on that day month; in which time his majesty presumed that all who would oppose it, would present their reasons and objections against it, which he was very desirous to hear. At the day appointed, though there were no petitions against it, yet it was observed that there were many of the most eminent merchants of that trade whose names were not to the petition, nor appeared desirous to have a charter granted; which his majesty considering, put off the debate for another week; and directed, that the other merchants by name should be desired to be present, and to give their advice freely upon the point: And there was at that day a very full appearance; when his majesty directed, that a relation should be made to them of the whole progress that had been made in the business, and the damage and dishonour the nation underwent in carrying on of that trade; that many merchants had presented a petition to him, containing an expedient to bring it into better order, but finding them not to appear in it, and being informed that they were most engaged in that trade, he had sent for them to know their opinion, Whether they thought what was proposed to be reasonable, and fit to be granted? And if so, why they did not concern themselves in it? They answered, That the reason why they had not appeared in it was, because they should be losers by it, and therefore were not solicitous to obtain a grant from his majesty to their own damage; and so enlarged upon the nature of the trade, their long experience in it, and the greatness of their stock, which they should not be allowed to continue under any regulation: But as they did not think themselves obliged to be solicitous for a change, so they could not deny, being required by his majesty to speak the truth, but that the proposition that was made was for the public good and benefit of the kingdom, and that they could conceive no other way to redeem that trade, and the nation, from the insolence which the Spaniard exercised upon us; implying, that if his majesty would command them, they would likewise concur, and join in carrying on the service. To which his majesty giving them gracious encouragement, they all departed of one mind, his majesty remaining confirmed in the former opinion he had of it. But there remained yet an objection which was principally insisted upon by the ministers of the revenue, who alledged very reasonably, that this new modelling of the trade must produce some alteration, and would meet some opposition from the Spaniard, which for the time would lessen the customs, and entitle the farmers to a defalcation. The petition was therefore referred to the farmers of the customs, who were to attend the next council day: And being then called in, they acknowledged, that the design proposed would prove very profitable to the kingdom in many respects, upon which they enlarged; and that in the end it would not be attended with any diminution of the customs; but for the present, they said, they could not but expect that the obstinacy and contradiction of the Spaniard would give such a stop to trade, at least for one year, that if his majesty did not reimburse them for what should fall short in the customs, they must look to be very great losers; the merchants, on the other hand, offering to be bound, that if they did not the first year bring in as much as had been usually entered, they would make good what should be wanting to the farmers upon a medium; and his majesty himself declared, that he would not, for a small damage to himself, hinder the kingdom from enjoying so great a benefit; and thereupon he commanded the Solicitor-General, who then attended the board, to prepare such a charter, as might provide for all those good ends which were desired in the petition, and which had been so largely debated. And, I believe, there was never a greater concurrence of the board in any direction.

Many months passed before the charter was drawn; in which time I never heard of the least new objection made against it, or that any man was unsatisfied with it. After it was engrossed, and passed the king's hand, it was brought to the great seal; and then the Lord Mayor of London and the court of aldermen had entered a caveat, and I appointed a day to hear parties. The city alledged an order made a year or two before by the king in council, upon a complaint then exhibited by the court of aldermen against the Turkey company, and other corporations, in which they said there were very many merchants of the best trades and greatest estates in the city, who would never take out their freedom of the city, and so refused to bear any charge or office in it, to the very great prejudice and dishonour of the city, and of the government thereof; they being by this means compelled to call inferior citizens to be aldermen, before they had estates to bear the charge of it, whilst the gravest and richest could not be compelled to take it, because they were not freemen: Besides the rules which the king gave upon the difference then in question, he was pleased to declare, and appointed it to be entered as an order in the Council-Book, that provision should be made, that in all charters which he should hereafter renew or grant to any companies or corporations within the city of London, that they should first make themselves freemen of the city, if they were not so before; and therefore that this charter should not pass the seals, before several members, who were named in it, had made themselves freemen of the city, by which they might be made liable to the charges of it. The merchants could not deny, that many of them were not yet freemen, nor resolved to be: They said, they had never heard of this order: And I declared to them, that I could not seal the charter before they had given satisfaction in it; and they seemed as positive that they would rather be without their charter, than submit to the other inconvenience, and so they departed then; but shortly after they agreed to the obligation, and a clause to that purpose was entered in the charter in the king's presence, and so returned to me to have the seal fixed to it.

There were, by this time, several other new Covenants entered against it; all which I heard, and settled every one of them to their joint satisfaction. I heard then that there would be some motions for the stopping it in the House of Commons; and some parliament-men who served for the Western Boroughs came to me, and desired me that I would not fix the seal to it till they should be heard, since it would undo their Western Trade; and told me they resolved to move the House of Commons to put a stop to it. I informed them of the whole progress it had had, and told them I believed that they would hardly be able to offer any good reasons against it: However, since it was known that the parliament would be prorogued within 10 or 12 days, I would suspend the sealing the charter whilst the Houses sat, to the end that they might make any objections against it if they thought fit: But the parliament rose shortly after, without further taking notice of it; nor did those parliament-men, or any others, further solicit me against the passing of it; and so I affixed the Great Seal to it according to my duty. Thereupon the company chose a governor and other officers, according to their charter, and made such orders and by-laws as they thought fit, for the carrying on the advancement of their trade; which they might alter when they found it convenient; and for the present they resolved upon a joint-stock, assigning so many shares to particular men. In this composition and distribution there happened some difference between themselves, which could not be taken notice of abroad; and even some of them, who first petitioned, and were most solicitous to procure the charter, did what they could to hinder the effect of it; sent privately to their factors at the Canaries to oppose any orders which should be sent from the governor and the company; and that they should do all they could to incense the Spaniards against the charter, promising that their wine should be taken off in spite of the corporation: Whereupon, great disorders did arise in the Canaries between the English themselves; and by the conjunction of the Spaniards with those few English who opposed the charter, they proceeded so far as to send the principal factors for the company out of the island to Spain, and to make a public act by the governor and council there, that no ship belonging to the company should be suffered to come into the harbour, or to take in any lading from the island: All which were transacted there many months before it was known in England, and probably would have been prevented, or easily reformed, if the breaking out of the plague at London, and the war, had not restrained all English shipping from going to the Canaries for the space almost of a full year: which intermission likewise gave some advantage here to the merchants who opposed the charter, by the not return of their several stocks within the time promised by the company.

When the king was at Oxford, and heard what had passed at the Canaries, some merchants appeared there to petition against the charter, whereof there were some who were the first petitioners for it: His majesty appointed a day for the solemn hearing of it, in the presence of his privy-council, the governor being likewise summoned to be there. Upon opening all their grievances, the petitioners themselves confessed, that they could not complain of the charter; that it was a just and necessary charter, and for the great benefit of the kingdom, though some private men might for the present be losers by it; that their complaint was only against their constitutions and by-laws, and their severe prosecution of them contrary to the intention of the charter itself; instancing, among other things, the very short day limited by the charter, after which they could not continue their trade without being members of the corporation; and that day was so soon after the sealing of the charter, that it was not possible for them to draw their stock from thence in so short a time. When they had finished all their objections, the king observed to them, that they complained only of what themselves had done, and not at all of the charter, which gave them only authority to chuse a governor, and make constitutions and by-laws; but directed not what those constitutions and by-laws should be, which were the result of their own consultations, in which the major part must concur; and of that kind their joint-stock was one, which, with the rest, they might alter again at their next court, if the major part were grieved with it: But because they had complained of some particulars, in which they seemed to have reason on their side, his majesty expressed a willingness to mediate and make an agreement between them, and thereupon bid the governor answer such and such particulars, which seemed to have most of justice; which he did very much at large, making it clearly appear that they had, in truth, little cause of complaint; as to the short day which was assigned to them for drawing away their stocks, w had the greatest semblance of reason, he said they had no reason to complain of want of warning, for that the day was well enough known to them long before the sealing of the charter, and might very well have been complied with; but that they knew likewise, that afterwards the time was enlarged to a day desired by themselves, that there might be no cause of discontent; and thereupon read the order of the court to that purpose, which they could not deny in conclusion; since it appeared that their stock still remained there, which in justice belonged to them, whether by their fault or misfortune it had not been drawn over. The king persuaded the governor, and his assistants, to give them such satisfaction in that particular and others, that before they retired from his majesty's presence, they were unanimously agreed upon all their pretences; and though some of the Lords, upon some insinuations and discourses they had heard, had believed the company to be in the wrong, they were now fully convinced of the contrary, and believed the charter to be founded upon great reason of state, and that the execution of it had been very justifiable, with great moderation; and it is to be observed, that the parliament being then assembled at Oxford, there was not the least complaint against that charter, or corporation.

This was the whole progress of that affair, and all that I know of the proceeding in it; in which I must confess, though I had no hand in the contrivance, I was fully satisfied in the justice and integrity of it, and even in the necessity in reason of state; and therefore, upon all the addresses made to the king or council in the whole transaction, I did, it may be, appear more solicitous and warm for the dispatch than other men; and yet I never remember a fuller concurrence in the whole board than in this advice; nor did my inclination towards it proceed from any other motive than that of the public good, without the least temptation to, or imagination of any profit or advantage to myself, to which I have never been thought to be ever inclined; and the delays I used in the passing this charter, after it came to be sealed, and my giving time for the weighing all objections, and so much opposing the company, with reference to their being made freemen of the city, that they departed from me with a resolution to prosecute the charter no farther, are no signs that I had such a mind to please them as a man would have who was corrupted by them, or who was to have a share in the profit of the patent. For the granting any injunctions in Chancery to stop proceedings at the law, against that or any other charter, I cannot comprehend the meaning of that charge; and do presume that I have never granted any injunctions in that court, but what was agreeable to the course and justice of it, and I am sure was always done in public and upon debate in the court.

The Fourth Article is, "That I have advised and procured divers of his majesty's subjects "to be imprisoned against law, in remote islands, garrisons, and other places, thereby to prevent them from the benefit of the law; and to introduce precedents for imprisoning of other of his majesty's subjects in like manner."

I know not what to answer to this article, it being so general, and no particular person being named; but it is generally known, that I have never taken upon me to commit any man to prison, but such who, by the course of the Chancery for matters of contempt, are justly committed. It is probable that I have been present at the council-board when many persons have been ordered to be committed, and whose commitment hath, by the wisdom of that board, been thought just and necessary; and therefore I am not to answer apart for any thing done by them; only I may say, that I was frequently of opinion that the commitments were very just, and very necessary; and it is notoriously known, that by such commitments a rebellion hath been sometimes prevented, and that other persons who have been afterwards attainted and executed for High-Treason, have, upon their examination, and at their death, confessed that their purpose had been to rise in arms at such and such times, if their friends, upon whom they had principally relied, had not been then committed to prison; and I well remember, that it was thought fit that most of the persons who stand attainted for the murder of the late king, his majesty's royal father, should be removed out of the Tower, and dispersed into several Islands and garrisons; and if any other persons have been likewise sent thither, I presume it was upon such reason, as, upon a due examination thereof, will make it be thought very just.

The Fifth Article is, "That I have corruptly sold several offices contrary to law."

This charge I utterly deny.

The Sixth Article is, "That I have procured his majesty's customs to be farmed at under rates, knowing the same; and great pretended debts to be paid by his majesty, to the payment whereof his majesty was not in strictness bound; and have received great sums of money for procuring the same."

I have never had any thing to do in disposing of his majesty's customs, or any other part of his revenue; only for some short time after his majesty's first arrival in England, I, amongst others of my Lords of the council, was a commissioner of the Treasury; during which time, if I am not very much mistaken, there was no farm lett of any of the revenue, and the customs were put into the hands of commissioners, to the end that a computation might be made as near as was possible of the true value of them, before that it should be put into a farm, which every man conceived would be fit to be done as soon as might be. The White Staff was shortly after given to the earl of Southampton, and the chancellorship of the exchequer to the lord Ashley, I having then resigned it, and having been before possessed of it at the time when the king returned into England; and from the time that these two officers of the revenue were made, which determined the former commission, I never inter-meddled in the customs, or any other branch of the revenue; except when the king commanded me to be present in some consultations which he had with my Lord Treasurer, when there were other of my Lords likewise present; that excellent person always resorting to the king, for his direction in all matters of the least difficulty which occurred to him in the administration of his office; and except the Lord Treasurer himself (with whom I had the honour to have held a long and a fast friendship) did desire to confer with me, as he very often did upon many particulars of his office, believing that I was not altogether ignorant in that administration, with which I had been formerly so well acquainted; and that I presume might be the reason why he did oftentimes procure me to be joined with him in references from the king, upon matters wholly relating to his own office. But I never suffered particular applications to be made to me in those cases, nor had ever any secret conference with any persons who were concerned in such pretensions. What is meant by my having procured his majesty's customs to be farmed at under rates, knowing the same, and great pretended debts to be paid by his majesty, to the payment whereof his majesty was not in strictness bound, I cannot imagine, except it relates to the payment of a debt due from his late majesty to some of the farmers; in which, though I had no more to do than in giving information, and my particular advice to his majesty, in the presence of my Lord-Treasurer, the Chancellor of the Exchequer and other of my Lords, and so am not myself responsible for what his majesty did thereupon, and he did nothing but with the approbation and consent of all the rest; yet I think myself obliged upon this particular, which so much concerns the honour and justice of the late king, and of his present majesty, to enlarge and relate all I know of what their majesties did, and what induced his present majesty to do his part of it. It is notoriously known, that before the late troubles, and in the very first entrance into them, his majesty was necessitated to borrow very great sums of money from his then farmers of his customs, and to oblige them to stand personally bound for many other great sums of money which other men lent to his majesty upon their security. That thereupon, and for the repayment of those sums of money which the farmers had advanced, and for securing them from any damage for those monies which others had lent upon their obligations, his majesty, with the advice of the then Lord Treasurer and Chancellor of the Exchequer, had granted a farther lease of his customs to those farmers for three or four years to come, after the expiration of their former lease; with a covenant on his majesty's part, to pay the just interest of eight per cent. for all such monies as were advanced by them, or for which they stood bound; and likewise that they should, out of their growing rent, deduct all such sums of money by the year, as they had lent, or were bound for. It is as well known, that after the beginning of the parliament in 1640, and before the commencement of the second lease, the House of Commons not only forced the said farmers to pay a very great sum of money for their presumption in receiving customs and impositions upon merchandize in the former years, when as they pretended such payments were not due; but took also from them their new lease granted to them by the king, and so left them without any capacities of reimbursing themselves of the money they had lent, and likewise in the mercy of their creditors to whom they stood bound; many of whom quickly began to exercise that severity towards them, that many of the poor gentlemen had their estates quickly extended upon judgments and recognizances, and their persons taken in execution and committed to prison; where some of them who had been known to have great estates, as sir Paul Pinder, and others, were forced to end their days. There were very few circumstances in the late king's misfortune, which gave him so much trouble, or so much afflicted him, as the sense he had of of the hard and unjust sufferings those poor gentlemen underwent for him, and their affection to his service; which he often mentioned, and as often declared, that he held himself obliged to make them full reparation, as soon as God should enable him. And after he had vouchsafed to make me his chancellor of the Exchequer, he frequently spoke to me of it; of the very good opinion he had of the men, of the great services they had done for him; and commanded me expressly, that whenever it should fall within my power, I would do them all the right I could. And of this I did often inform his majesty during the time he was abroad, and after his return, without any other motive than his father's command, and his own honour, having myself never had any degree of friendship with any of the persons concerned, and a very ordinary acquaintance with some of them. Upon his majesty's happy return, those gentlemen who were alive of the old farmers (which, as I remember, were sir John Jacob, sir Job Harby, sir Nicholas Crispe, and sir John Harrison) applied themselves to the king, having lain several years, and then remaining in execution in some prison, and having had their estates sold, upon the prosecution of those creditors to whom they were bound for monies lent to his majesty. As soon as care was taken for collecting the revenue, those four gentlemen named before, and two others who had served his majesty very well, were appointed his commissioners for the collecting the customs and duties upon trade; in which collection they continued for above a year, or thereabouts; during which time many of their creditors, who had generously forbore to prosecute them whilst they were in prison and undone, began now to commence their actions against them, presuming they were then, or would shortly be able to satisfy them: Whereupon his majesty commanded my lord treasurer, and me, with some other lords, as I remember, to send for those creditors, and to declare to them, that his majesty would, in a short time, enable his farmers to pay their just debts, which he well knew were contracted for his service; and that he would take it very well from them, if they would for the present give no obstruction to his service, by the prosecution of those persons at law, whose time was solely taken up in the necessary service of his majesty: Whereupon they willingly desisted from that prosecution; and many of them finding now, that by his majesty's favour they were like to receive their debts, which before they thought desperate, they frankly remitted the whole, or part of the interest, that in strictness of law was still due to them. His majesty, shortly after, judging it best for his profit to determine the collection by commission, and to lett the whole to farm, gave direction to the lord treasurer to confer and treat with any fit persons who desired the same. Many overtures were made by several persons, and some applied themselves directly to his majesty: upon which and after a competent time in considering all that was proposed, the king appointed a day when he would be attended by my lord treasurer, and other of my lords, and when all the pretenders should likewise be present, and he would then and there declare his own judgment: having first declared to the commissioners, whereof four were old farmers to whom so much money was due, that whosoever should take the farm, they should be obliged to pay them their just debt at such times, and by such proportions as his service could bear; but as to the letting the farm itself, he should neither consider the debt he owed them, nor the sufferings they had undergone, but only the rent they should offer; which, if as much as any body else would give, he would prefer their persons before others; but if any other fit men would offer more than they thought fit to give, they should be his farmers: and therefore wished them well to consider what they would propose to him. After two days spent by his majesty in conference with several pretenders apart, and finding that the propositions made to him by the old farmers, with whom the other two were to be joined who had served with them as commissioners, were at least as much, if not more for his profit than any which had been made by the rest, he declared that the farm should be lett to those who had been his commissioners: Which was at that time understood to be so far from a good bargain, that the two commissioners who were not concerned in the great debt, utterly refused to meddle with the farm at so great a rent; the other four publicly declaring at the same time, that they would not give the rent but in contemplation of their debt, which they thought they should sooner and better receive, when it should be assigned upon their own collections than when it should be charged upon new farmers; but were suitors to his majesty, that he would oblige the other two (sir John Wolstenholme and sir John Shaw) to be joint farmers with them; which his majesty did, by making them a gracious promise, that if they should be losers he would repair them; and thereupon directions were given to Mr. Attorney-General to prepare a grant accordingly; and I do not know there was one dissenting voice from what his majesty inclined to do upon the whole debate of that matter, the same appearing to every man to be most just and reasonable.

The farm being thus settled, the old farmers were directed to bring their account to my lord treasurer; by which it should manifestly appear how much the late king was justly and truly indebted to them, and how those debts were incurred; that so, upon a just computation such a satisfaction might be made to them, as was consistent with the present state of his majesty's occasions. Many months, if not a whole year, were spent in the examination of those accounts before the auditors; who, besides the exceptions they took for want of some formalities, in the proof of some monies paid, which after twenty years of licence, in which all their books and papers had been taken, their houses plundered, their persons imprisoned, and in which so many persons employed by the king to receive, and by them to pay money, were dead, could hardly be made with the usual exactness, made likewise several certificates of particular cases, which required further direction; and the Lord-Treasurer would never take upon himself to give those directions, only declaring to them, which he had frequently done, that, in regard his majesty was not strictly bound in justice to pay that debt due from his father, but that his present majesty's generous and royal disposition had prevailed with him to pay that just debt, whereby they might be preserved from ruin, in which he said he fully concurred with his majesty; but that he would never advise him, on the contrary, he would always dissuade his majesty from paying or allowing any interest, though paid by them, which would swell the debt to such a proportion, that his majesty could never undertake the payment of it: which determination, how great soever their loss appeared to be, seemed to be so just, at least so necessary for the king, that they wholly referred it to his majesty; and hoping that it might prevail with many of their creditors, not to exact it from them, though the sale of their whole estates had made satisfaction to others for the whole interest as well as for the principal. When the auditors certificate was ready, and all the doubts and questions, which did arise thereupon, were clearly stated, his majesty vouchsafed again to be present, with the other Lords, who had from the beginning assisted in the examination of that business; and then the Lord-Treasurer declared to his majesty, what he had before said to the persons concerned, that though he willingly approved his majesty's goodness in taking upon himself that great debt, yet that he would by no means give his advice or consent that he should pay or allow any interest for it. Upon the whole matter, and upon all the doubts stated to his majesty, and after the rejection of several considerable sums of money demanded by them, and for the payment whereof such direct proof was not made, as is required by the course of the Exchequer; though I think most persons who were present were, in their private consciences, well satisfied that those sums had been, in truth, paid, as was alledged; there appeared to his majesty to be justly due to them the sum of 200,000*l.* principal money for almost 20 years, and for which they had paid so much interest; and his majesty thought it very just and, with many gracious expressions to them of his purpose and resolution further to repair them as he should be able, gave order to the Lord-Treasurer that the said debt of 200,000*l.* should be paid to them in five years; that is, by 40,000*l.* for every year out of the rent of the farm; and that all instruments necessary for their satisfaction and security should be presently given to them, whereby they might be able to comply with their creditors, and avoid their importunity. I do confess myself to have been present at these agitations, and to have contributed my humble advice and opinion to his majesty that he should pay this debt; which I thought myself obliged to do, as well as a faithful counsellor to his present majesty, as in discharge of my duty and obligation to his father; and I have very good reason to believe that if that 200,000*l.* be paid according to his majesty's direction, of which I know nothing, and of which the heirs and executors of those farmers who are dead, as well as the four present farmers have their equal proportions, that the said persons have not at this day half the estates which they had in the year 1610, when they entered into those engagements for his majesty: nor was there any one person present at the agitation of this affair, who seemed in the least degree to differ in opinion, or to dissuade his majesty to give that satisfaction for that debt which he vouchsafed to do.

I do likewise very willingly confess, that I have in the manner aforesaid, and being called to advise, given my opinion for the payment of many other considerable debts incurred by his late majesty; and for which many persons of honour, who adhered to him during the war, were personally bound for him, and whose estates had been extended, and their persons imprisoned for the same; many of whom were then in execution, and in prison when his majesty returned, and others then sued in Westminster-Hall, in his majesty's own court. His late majesty having granted under his great seal of England, to several persons intrusted for the rest, many of his Forests, Parks, and other lands, for their security and indemnity, who were or should stand bound for him, for monies which were then borrowed for, and applied to the necessary support of himself and his army, and to no other purpose: and in that grant I was particularly entrusted, as well by the desire of the persons concerned, as by his majesty's command, to be solicitous for their satisfaction: and I cannot deny that I have never been more delighted, than when I have been able to procure any satisfaction for those persons who were so bound and so secured; nor ever more troubled, than that I could do no more, and that there remained so many still unsatisfied, and almost undone for those debts so contracted, of which number I believe there are still too many. But having made these clear confessions of what is truth, and what I did do in these transactions, I must as positively deny, that ever I procured or advised the letting his majesty's customs, or any other part of his revenue; on the contrary, that I used all the ways I could to advance the rents without respect of persons; and I presume I was never present at the letting of any farm, that any man would have given more for, than they did to whom it was lett, what offers soever were made afterwards, when his majesty had contracted himself, and a grant was issued accordingly, under the great seal of England: and I do as positively deny, that ever I received or expected the least sum of money, or money-worth, for any lease made by his majesty of his customs, or any other part of his revenue; or for the payment of any one debt made by his majesty, to which he was or was not bound; I having never had any other motive for the performance of those offices, but the pure and entire consideration of his majesty's honour, justice and profit, and my own inclination to gratify worthy persons, who in justice ought to be, or might with justice be, gratified and obliged, and who have commonly been such persons to whom I have had no kind of obligation.

The Seventh Article is, "That I have received great sums of money from the company of Vintners, or some of them, or their agents, for enhancing the prices of wines, and for freeing them from the payment of legal penalties which they had incurred."

If I had been in the least degree guilty of this charge, it would very easily have been proved, and the Vintners would very gladly have helped them in it, being persons who never thought themselves beholden to me, and so not obliged to conceal any of my corruptions. They well knew that I could never be prevailed with to consent to the enhancing the prices of their wine, and that I never had the least sum of money from them in my life. I remember, at a time when his majesty had refused to grant all their other petitions, the company of Vintners did complain that there were so many informations against them prosecuted by informers in the Exchequer, that they must give over their trades, and be likewise undone, if they were severely prosecuted for what was past; and therefore besought his majesty in council, that he would pardon what was past, and that for the future they would trespass no more. Whereupon his majesty thought it worthy of his mercy to shelter them for the present from that prosecution; and thereupon commanded his Attorney-General to call the informers before him, and to appoint the Vintners to pay them such reasonable rewards for their pains as he thought fit, and thereupon he should enter a Noli Prosequi; but his majesty charged them for the future not to run into the same danger: And as this grace from his majesty was not upon my promotion, but purely from his own bounty and goodness, from which no person there dissuaded him, as I remember, so I never received the least profit from the same.

The Eighth Article is, "That I have in a short time gained to myself a far greater estate than can be imagined to be lawfully gained in so short a time; and, contrary to my oath, have procured several grants under the Great Seal from his majesty, to myself and relations, of several of his majesty's lands, hereditaments, and leases, to the disprofit of his majesty."

I wish with all my heart that the truth of this article (which I presume hath drawn on all the rest) were clearly known to all the world; that they who in truth believe that I have so great an estate, were very well informed what it is, and they would then clearly discern that I need not be ashamed of having gotten such an estate, nor needed to have any recourse to any ill arts or means for the obtaining thereof; they would know that I have been so far from procuring several grants under the Great Seal of England from his majesty, to myself and relations, of several of his majesty's lands, hereditaments, and leases, to the disprofit of his majesty, that I never moved his majesty in my life, for any one grant to myself, or any of my relations. If his majesty's royal bounty did dispose him to confer somewhat of benefit and advantage upon an old servant, who had waited upon his father and himself near 30 years in some trust and employment; I hope it shall not be imputed as a crime in me to receive his favours. I am far from believing or imagining that the poor services I ever did, or can do, were in any degree proportionable to his majesty's bounty; yet since his goodness thought me fit for it, I hope many others will think so too; at least as fit as some men, who have received greater marks and proportions of it than I have done, and who, though they might serve much better, had not served so long. I forbear to enlarge upon this particular charge, because I conceive that it is now evident to many who were wrought upon by those who did not believe it themselves, to think my estate to be very great, that the information they received was without ground: And whoever considers, that the first year after the king's coming in yielded justly more profit to the Great Seal than I ever received in all the years following, and some particular acts of bounty in his majesty conferred on me, without the least suit of my own, and unthought of by me, will believe that my fault is greater, in having no better an estate, than that what I have hath been gotten by corruption. I have none of his majesty's lands but what I bought, for as much as any body would pay for it, or those who had the same granted to them out of his majesty's bounty, and that grant confirmed by act of parliament: and, I presume, it cannot have fallen from his majesty's memory; and I am sure is well known to some persons of honour yet alive, that when his majesty was graciously pleased, at his first coming over, to offer me some land which had never yielded the crown any thing, I absolutely refused to receive it, because it was generally thought to be of great value, as I believe it is; and therefore I would not expose myself to the envy which naturally attends such donations, having in truth never had an immoderate appetite to make haste to be rich; and as much apprehended the being accused of Witchcraft or Burglary, as of Bribery and Corruption. In a word, I do declare, that my debts being discharged for which I pay interest, all my estate is not worth, being sold, the money I have received from his majesty's own royal bounty, and far from being suitable to the quality I yet hold; and which was never obtained by my own ambition, as many persons of honour yet alive can testify.

The Ninth Article is, "That I introduced an arbitrary government in his majesty's foreign plantations, and have caused such as complained thereof before his majesty and council, to be long imprisoned for so doing."

Though I cannot possibly comprehend the full meaning of this article, yet because I have heard of many discourses made of the authority I assumed over the plantations, and the great advantage and profit I have drawn to myself from thence, I am very willing to take this occasion to relate all that I know, and all that I have done with reference to any of his majesty's plantations; declaring in the first place, that at his majesty's return, and before, I did use all the endeavours I could to prepare and dispose the king to a great esteem of his plantations, and to encourage the improvement of them by all the ways which could reasonably be proposed to him; and I was confirmed in this opinion and desire, as soon as I had a view of the entries in the Custom-House, by which I found what a great revenue accrued to the king from those plantations, inasmuch as the receipts from thence had upon the matter repaired the decrease and diminution of the customs which the late troubles had brought upon other parts of trade, from what it had formerly yielded. The first consideration that offered itself before the king, that related to the plantations, was concerning the Barbadoes, which having been most discoursed of since, and, as I hear, with some reflections upon me of partiality and injustice, I shall, in the first place, set down all I know in that affair, and how I came to speak in it.

Before the beginning of the late troubles, the king had granted the island of the Barbadoes to the earl of Carlisle and his heirs for ever, upon a supposition that it had been first discovered, possessed, and planted at his charge; and the said earl sent a governor and people thither, and enjoyed it to his death, and by his will settled it for the payment of his debts, which were very great: the troubles falling out in a short time after, little or no profit had been drawn from thence towards the satisfaction of those debts, and the executors and trustees totally neglected the taking care of it, or prosecuting the plantation; but in and after the war, many citizens, merchants, and gentlemen, who were willing or forced to withdraw themselves from England, transported themselves thither, and there planted, without asking any body's leave, or without being opposed or contradicted by any body. About the year 1647, or thereabouts, the late earl of Carlisle, son and heir of the former earl, to whom the inheritance of that Island belonged, treated with the late lord Willoughby of Parham, how that island might be so ordered, that the plantation might be advanced, and profit made by it, which would at last redound to himself when the debt should be paid. The late king was then in the hands of the army; and with his approbation and consent, it was agreed between the said Earl and the said Lord, that a lease should be made by the earl of Carlisle to the lord Willoughby, of all the profits which should arise out of that plantation for the term of twenty-one years, as I remember; a moiety of the whole profits to be received by the lord Willoughby himself, for his own use, and recompence of his charge and pains; and he was likewise to receive a commission from the said earl, to be governor of that and the rest of the Caribbee islands (all which were comprehended in the Charter granted by the king to the earl of Carlisle), and that a commission should likewise be procured from the king, or the prince of Wales, by which the said lord Willoughby was to be constituted governor of the said islands. About that time the fleet, then in the Downs, returned to their obedience to the king, withdrawing themselves to the court of Holland, to offer their service to the prince of Wales, his majesty that now is; the lord Willoughby coming likewise over then to him; to serve him in any condition he pleased to employ him. I need not speak of the disappointments of that summer, and the ill success of that fleet; but all these hopes being vanished, and there being no present employment for the lord Willoughby, he then informed the prince of what had passed between the earl of Carlisle and him, with his father's consent; which his highness had likewise received from the king himself, with much recommendation of the lord Willoughby. I was then attending upon the prince in Holland, as one of the king's counsel assigned by him for that service. Upon the understanding of this whole case, the prince, upon the unanimous advice of the council, thought fit to grant such a commission of governor of the Barbadoes and other islands, as he desired; and he had the more reason to desire it, (notwithstanding the earl of Carlisle's grant and commission), because the principal planters upon the Barbadoes had been officers in the king's army, or of manifest affection to him, or always looked upon as of his party. With this commission the lord Willoughby had, at his great charge and expence, transported himself to the Barbadoes, and was there received as governor; and made a contract with the planters, that so much should be paid upon the hundred to the earl of Carlisle, to whom the propriety of the whole belonged. But before this agreement could be well executed, or any profit drawn from thence, the island was reduced to the service of the parliament, and of Cromwell, and a governor appointed by them; the lord Willoughby being sent into England, where he remained till the king's return, and had given unquestionable evidence of his affection to the king's service, for which he had often been committed to prison before and after Cromwell's death.

As soon as the king returned, the lord Willoughby (who had then eight or nine years to come of his lease formerly granted to him by the earl of Carlisle, who was then likewise living, and ready to do any other act to the lord Willoughby's advantage) resolved to return himself to the Barbadoes, and desired the king to renew his commission to him for the government; which his majesty was very willing to do, as to a person he esteemed very much, and who had spent very much of his own fortune, as is notoriously known, in that service: but the Barbadoes and all those other islands were now become of another consideration and value than they had been of before the troubles; the Barbadoes itself was (by that confluence and resort thither as was mentioned before), so fully planted, that there was no room for new comers, and they had sent very many of their people to the other islands to plant; many citizens of London had raised very great estates there, and every year had a great revenue thence; and the king's customs from that one island came to a very great sum of money yearly. All these men, who had entered upon that plantation as a waste place, and with very great charge, brought it to that perfection, and with great trouble, began now to apprehend that they must depend upon the good will of the earl of Carlisle and lord Willoughby for the enjoyment of their estates there, which they looked upon as their own ; all these men joined together in an appeal to the king, and humbly prayed his protection : and that they might not be oppressed by those two Lords, they said, they were the king's subjects ; that they had repaired thither as to a desolate place, and had by their industry obtained a livelihood there, when they could not with a good conscience stay in England ; that if they were now left to those Lords to ransom themselves, and compound their estates, they must leave the country, and the plantation would be destroyed, which yielded his majesty so great a revenue ; that they could defend themselves by law against the earl of Carlisle's title, if his majesty did not countenance it by a new grant of the government to the lord Willoughby ; and therefore were suitors to his majesty not to destroy them by that countenance. At the same time, the creditors of the late earl of Carlisle (whose debts were to be satisfied by the profits of that plantation, by the will and settlement of the said earl) petitioned the king that they might be first provided for ; their principal money due to them at the death of the earl amounted to no less than 50,000*l.* of which they had never yet received one penny ; and therefore that the profits which should arise ought in the first place to be applied to them, there having been many families utterly ruined for want of their money so due to them. The king appointed to hear all the several pretences at the council-board, where they all attended with their counsel ; and after his majesty had spent three or four days himself in hearing the several allegations, and finding new pretences and difficulties every day to arise (which shall be mentioned anon), his majesty appointed several of my lords of the council to consider of the whole matter, and to confer with the several parties, and if it were possible to make an end between them by their own consent ; otherwise to report the several titles to his majesty, with such expedients as in their judgments they thought most likely to produce a general satisfaction, without endangering the plantation, the preservation whereof his majesty took to heart. I had the honour to be one of that committee, and took very much pains in reading the charters, grants, and leases, and many other papers and dispatches which concerned that affair, and conferred with several of the persons interested, to the end that I might the better discern what could be done, having never understood or heard any thing of the matter, or that concerned that plantation, otherwise than what I have before set down upon the dispatch of the lord Willoughby in Holland ; nor had I the least inclination or bias to any party. Upon the hearing all the allegations before my lords, the several pretences and titles appeared to us to be these ; which we afterwards reported to the king.

The lord Willoughby demanded nothing from the king but his commission to be governor for the remainder of the years which had been granted to him by the earl of Carlisle, to the end that he might receive one moiety of those profits which should arise to the earl, and which had been assigned to him with the consent and approbation of the late king, and his majesty that now is, upon which he had undertaken that voyage, and spent so much of his estate.

The earl of Carlisle, while this contention was depending, died, and by his will devised his interest in the Barbadoes to the earl of Kinnoul, who likewise petitioned the king for the preserving his right ; but neither he, nor the person under whom he claimed, had any pretence till all the debts were satisfied, nor did the earl of Kinnoul demand any thing till then ; but believed the profit would arise yearly to so much, that the debts would quickly be satisfied, and then the whole would come to him.

There was another title that preceded the earl of Carlisle's, which was that of the earl of Marlborough, who alledged and proved it to be true, that the Barbadoes and those adjacent islands were first granted by the king to his grandfather the earl of Marlborough, then lord High-Treasurer of England, before the earl of Carlisle had any pretence thereunto ; and that the Lord Treasurer had afterwards consented that the same should be granted to the earl of Carlisle, upon a full contract, that he should first receive for ever the sum of 300*l.* by the year out of the first profits of the plantations ; which sum of 300*l.* had never yet been paid ; and therefore the earl of Marlborough desired, as heir to his grandfather, to have satisfaction for the arrears, and that the growing rent might be secured to him.

The Creditors were of two kinds : The first, and who had first petitioned the king, as was said before, had an assignment made to them by the executors and trustees of the earl of Carlisle upon his will, and who, at his death, owed them the full sum of 50,000*l.*, or thereabouts : The other creditors consisted of several tradesmen and artificers, to whom the said Earl was indebted for wares and goods which had been delivered for his use, and of several servants for their arrears of wages ; and all these had, during the late troubles, exhibited their bill in Chancery against the executors and overseers of the late Earl, and had obtained a decree in that court for their satisfaction, out of the profits of those plantations ; which decree stood confirmed by the acts of judicial proceedings ; and as I remember their debts amounted to 30,000*l.*, or thereabouts : None of the creditors in general, of one or the other sort, had ever received one shilling from the time that the Earl had first assigned it.

The Planters insisted positively, that the charter granted to the earl of Carlisle from the king was void in point of law ; for which their counsel alledged many reasons : And having spent much time upon that argumentation, they concluded with two humble propositions to the king ; first, That his majesty would give them leave to prosecute in his name in the Exchequer, and at their own charge, to repeal that grant to the earl of Carlisle; by which they should be freed from the arbitrary power and oppression which would be exercised upon them under the colour of that charter, and his majesty might receive a great benefit to himself, by taking the sovereignty to himself, to whom it justly belonged: And in that case they offered in their own names, and for the rest of the planters who were in the island, to consent to an imposition of so much upon the hundred, which they confidently avowed would amount to at least 10,000*l.* a year; out of which his majesty's governor might be well supported, and his majesty dispose of the overplus as he thought fit. Secondly, If his majesty would not suffer the charter to be repealed, that he would leave those who claimed under the earl of Carlisle's patent to their remedy at law, and leave the planters to their own defence; which they hoped in justice could not be denied to them, since they alone had been at the charge to settle the plantation, which brought so great a revenue every year to his majesty, when the Earl had not been at the least expence thereupon; and if his majesty should not assist their pretences with his royal authority, they must all quit the plantation, which would be to his majesty's great damage.

These being the several pretences of the several persons, and nothing being to be done by any agreement between themselves, their interests being so distinct and inconsistent with each others, his majesty thought fit, in the first place, to refer the consideration of the legality and validity of the patent to his counsel at law; who, upon full deliberation, after the hearing of all parties, returned their opinion, That their patent was void, and that his majesty might take the same into his own power. This report was no sooner made to his majesty, but that he very graciously declared, he would not from hence receive any benefit and advantage to himself, until all their pretences had received satisfaction; and that he would make no other use of avoiding the said Charter, than to dispose the profits of the plantation to those who in justice had any pretence in law or equity to receive the same; and therefore, that the lord Willoughby should proceed in his voyage to the Barbadoes, and should receive according to his bargain a moiety of the profits, and that the other should be disposed of for the satisfaction of the debts and other incumbrances; in order to which, his majesty appointed the same Committee of the Lords to meet again, and to adjust the several proportions.

When they met, they had all the persons concerned present with them, or ready to be called in upon any occasion; and they all appeared very glad that the king had taken the care and protection of the plantation upon himself, which was all the security the Planters had or could desire; and the Lords' first care was to make some computation of what might be depended upon as the yearly revenue that would arise upon the imposition within the island: But the Planters could not be drawn to any particular agreement in that point, not so much as to consent to what should be imposed upon every hundred; but, on the contrary, declared, that too much had been undertaken in that kind by one of their own number (Mr. Kendale) in his discourse before the king in the council, and declared that the plantation could not bear the imposition he had mentioned; that whatsoever was to be done of this nature was to be transacted by an assembly in the island, and that all that they could promise for themselves was, that they would use their utmost endeavours with their friends in the island, that when the lord Willoughby should arrive there, and call an assembly, they should consent to as great an imposition as the plantation would bear; by which a good revenue would arise to the king for the purposes aforesaid.

The Creditors had great reason to be glad of the resolution his majesty had taken; for though it would be a long time before they could be fully satisfied out of a moiety of the profits, though it should arise to the highest computation; yet in time they should receive all, and should every year receive some: Which would lessen their debt, and relieve those who were in the highest necessities, of which there was a great number; whereas they had hitherto, in so many years, received not one penny; and it was evident, that without his majesty's authority they never should, since the planters were resolved never to consent to any imposition, or submit to any authority that should be exercised under the earl of Carlisle's patent without a due course of law, the way to obtain which would be very difficult to find out; and they understood well enough, that without his majesty's grace and bounty to them, the repeal, or avoiding the earl of Carlisle's patent, would put a quick end to all their pretences.

The greatest difficulty that did arise was from the earl of Kinnoul, to whom the last earl of Carlisle had devised these islands by his will; and he had a great mind to go thither himself, and take possession of his right; and his counsel had persuaded him, that the king's charter granted to the first earl of Carlisle was good and valid in law, and that they believed they could maintain and defend it in any court of justice. Then his own estate in Scotland was so totally lost by the iniquity of the times, and by his father's having so frankly declared himself for the king, when very few of that nation lost any thing by their loyalty, that he had very little left to support himself; and therefore was willing to retire into any place abroad, where he might find but a bare subsistence: But when he considered again, that he could have no pretence to any thing in the Barbadoes, till after all the creditors were fully satisfied, and how long it was like to be before they could be satisfied, there remaining still due to the creditors of both kinds no less than fourscore thousand pounds sterling principal money, he did not believe that his insisting upon the patent would be worth the charge and hazard he must inevitably be put to; and therefore, upon further deliberation with his friends, he willingly referred himself and all his interest to the king's gracious determination, as all the rest of the pretenders and interested persons had done.

The case being thus fully stated to the Lords, and every man's interest or pretence clearly appearing to them, they considered seriously amongst themselves what they might reasonably propose to the several persons, in order to their agreement amongst themselves; and that proving ineffectual, what advice they might reasonably give his majesty. They were unanimously of opinion, not to advise his majesty to cause the patent to be called in question: for though they doubted not, upon the opinion of his learned counsel, that the same would be adjudged void and illegal, yet they did not think it a seasonable time, when the nation is so active and industrious in foreign plantations, that they should see a Charter or patent questioned, and avoided, after it had been so many years allowed and countenanced, and under which it had so long flourished, and was almost grown to perfection; and that since his majesty had declared, that notwithstanding any right of his own, all possible care should be taken for the satisfaction of the creditors, as well as for the preservation and support of the plantation, it would be equally equitable and honourable in his majesty, not to leave the earl of Kinnoul the only person unconsidered, and bereaved of all his pretence; but that they would humbly move his majesty, that he would graciously vouchsafe to assign some present maintenance to the said earl, which his unhappy condition required, out of the revenue which should be there settled, and until the debts should be paid: and that after that time such an augmentation might be made to him as his majesty in his royal bounty should think fit; in consideration whereof the earl should procure the patent to be brought in and surrendered: which he promised should be done accordingly, as soon as the settlement should be made of that proportion which should be assigned to him.

That the lord Willoughby should enjoy the benefit of his former contract with the earl of Carlisle, and approved by his majesty, during the remainder of those years which are not yet expired; that he should make what haste he could thither, and call an Assembly, to the end that such an imposition might be agreed upon to be paid to his majesty as should be reasonable, in consideration of the great benefit they had already and should still enjoy, in being continued and secured in their several plantations, of which as yet they were, as it were, but tenants at will, having no other pretence of right but the possession; and therefore, that those merchants and planters who had petitioned the king, should, according to their obligation and promise made by them to his majesty, use all their credit with those in the Island, that the imposition might arise to such a proportion that the revenue might answer the ends proposed, and that one moiety of that revenue should be enjoyed by the lord Willoughby for his term.

That the annuity of 300*l.* a year should be paid to the earl of Marlborough, according to the original contract mentioned before; and that the assignment that his majesty would likewise be pleased to make to the earl of Kinnoul, should be likewise first paid; and then that the remainder of that moiety should be received to the use of the creditors; and that when the lord Willoughby's term should be expired, his majesty should be desired, after the reservation of so much as he should think fit for the support of his governor, that all the remainder might be continued towards the creditors, whilst their just debts should be paid.

These particulars appearing reasonable to the Lords, all persons concerned were called, and the same communicated to them, who appeared all well contented; and thereupon the Lords resolved to present the same to his majesty, which they did accordingly at the board, and his majesty, with a full approbation and advice of the whole council, ratified the same; whereupon that Order was made by his majesty in council, which comprehends all the particulars mentioned before, which was delivered to the lord Willoughby, with his majesty's express command, that he should see it punctually and precisely executed: and the like Order was delivered by the clerk of the council to every other person mentioned who desired the same: To which Order I do for the more certainty refer myself, being in no degree confident (having at this time no other help than my memory) that it is set down with that exactness as it ought to be. As I have throughout this affair taken very great pains to reduce it to this particular agreement, which at that time seemed to be satisfactory to all the persons concerned, so I had not the least temptation of particular benefit to myself; and I do still believe it to be very just and reasonable, and agreeable to his majesty's justice and goodness, all circumstances being considered; and though it may be, in strictness of law, and by the avoiding the grant made to the earl of Carlisle, his majesty might have possessed himself of the whole island, without any tender consideration of the planters or of the creditors, I am not ashamed that I never gave his majesty that or the like counsel, in this or any other matter of the like nature; and if I had, I am confident his majesty would have abhorred it, and not have thought the better of me for giving it.

The other part of this Article, That I have caused such as complained of the arbitrary government in the plantations before the king and council, to be long imprisoned for so doing, doth refer, I suppose, to the commitment of one Farmer; who being sent over a prisoner by the lord Willoughby, in a ship that came from thence, made his appearance at Oxford, his majesty being then there in the sickness-time, which was the first time I ever heard of the man, or of the matter; and at the same time one of the Secretaries of State received a letter from the lord Willoughby, which was sent by the same ship, in which his lordship had sent a direct, full charge of Mutiny, Sedition, and Treason against him; and by his letter informed the Secretary of all the behaviour and carriage of the said Farmer, with all the circumstances thereof; and that he had, by his seditious practices, prevailed so far upon a disaffected party in that island, that the lord Willoughby was obliged in the instant to send him aboard the ship, without which he did apprehend a general revolt in the island from his majesty's obedience: and the lord Willoughby likewise desired that Farmer might not be suffered to return thither before the island should be reduced to a better temper. The man was called in before the king and council, and the charge which the lord Willoughby had sent read to him: the greatest part whereof he could not deny; and in his discourse upon it behaved himself so pre-emptorily and insolently before the king, that his majesty thought it very necessary to commit him, nor did any one counsellor then present appear to think otherwise: and I do confess, that the discharging him from his imprisonment was some time afterwards moved, and that I was always against his discharge; being of opinion that it was impossible for the lord Willoughby, or any other governor in any of the plantations, to preserve his majesty's right, and support the government, if he should be so far discountenanced, that a man sent over by him as a prisoner, under such a particular and so heinous a charge, should be upon his appearance here set at liberty; but my opinion was, that he should be sent back a prisoner thither, that he might be tried by the law and justice of the island, and receive condign punishment for his offence. And I cannot deny, but that I am still of the same opinion; and if it be an error, it proceeds from the weakness of my understanding, which is not in my power to reform.

What I have here set down, is all that occurs to my memory with reference to the island of the Barbadoes; which being not particularly mentioned in the Article, but comprehended under the general expression of his majesty's foreign plantations, I take myself obliged to give some answer even to that general: and I hope it will not be imputed as a crime to me, if I have taken more pains than other men in that important service of his majesty concerning his foreign plantations, which I did not think was enough taken to heart; and if my desire or readiness to take any pains, or give any assistance to the advancement of that service, did induce many persons to apply themselves to me on those occasions, I hope it shall not be charged upon me as over activity, or ambition to ingross more business into my hands than I was intitled to; for which I have this excuse to make for myself, that I found the pains I took to be acceptable to his majesty: and I was so far from having any particular design or advantage to myself, that I do profess and declare, that from all or any of his majesty's foreign plantations I never had the least reward, or the least present made to me, except that the now lord Willoughby once, told me, that his brother had sent over some pieces of the speckled wood which grows in Surinam, with direction, that if I liked it, I might have what I would of it; whereupon I had some pieces, which I thought might have been applied to the making of cabinets, or the adorning of wainscot; but as they were very small, so the middle of every piece was wind-shaken and rotten, that they could not be applied to any considerable use; and except some blocks of walnut tree which the governor of Virginia sent to me, and of which I made some table boards and frames for chairs, the workmanship whereof cost me much more than the wood was worth: and these two particulars contain all the rewards and presents, or profit, that ever I received from all his majesty's foreign plantations, or any body to my use.

The Tenth Article is, "That I did reject and frustrate a proposal and undertaking approved by his majesty, for the preservation of Nevis and St. Christophers, and reducing the French plantations to his majesty's obedience, after the commissions were drawn for that purpose; which was the occasion of so great loss and damage in those parts."

I never did reject or frustrate any such proposal or undertaking, never taking upon me in the least degree, to make a judgment of things of that nature, nor was ever any such proposal made to me; but I do very well remember, that his majesty himself did once deliver to the council a paper, which he said one of his servants, Mr. Marsh, had delivered to him, containing some propositions for ships and men to be sent by his majesty for the recovery of St. Christophers, which had been newly taken by the French*. Upon the

* The following purports to be the French king's account of the conquest of St. Christopher's, See the Oeuvres de Louis xiv, vol. 2, p. 180, Paris ed. of 1806.

"Peu de temps après que la guerre entre étoit déclarée aux Anglais, ne doutant point que dans les îles, où mes sujets étoient mêlés avec eux, on n'en vînt aux derniers actes d'hostilité, j'avois fait promptement embarquer huit cents hommes, lesquels même j'avois tirés des places les plus voisines de la mer, afin qu'ils arrivassent plutôt au secours de leurs compatriotes; mais j'appris peu de temps après que, quelque diligence qu'ils eussent pu faire, mes vœux et ma fortune étoient arrivés plutôt qu'eux à la défense de ces colonies. Il s'étoit rencontré, par je ne sais quelle aventure, que dans l'île de Saint Christophe, les Français et les Anglais en même temps avoient appris la déclaration de guerre; mais comme l'état de leurs affaires étoit fort différent ils avoient pris aussi des résolutions très-différentes. Les Français qui reading of which paper and propositions, the same were referred to the consideration of the lord-general, one of the secretaries of state, and to the vice-chamberlain, as I remember, who were to confer with Mr. Marsh, and such others as joined with him; and they were at the same time appointed to consider of another proposition delivered in writing by the now lord Willoughby and some merchants of London, who were planters in the Barbadoes, for the supplying and better securing that island, and the rest of those Caribbee islands; and for the reducing and recovering any of them which were or should be taken by the enemy; upon the latter of which somewhat was afterwards done: And if the other concerning Nevis and St. Christophers was rejected, of which I know nothing, I presume it was, because it either appeared unpracticable, or not consistent with his majesty's other affairs.

The Eleventh Article is, "That I advised and effected the sale of Dunkirk to the French king, being part of his majesty's dominions, together with the ammunition, artillery, and all sorts of stores there, and for no greater value than the said ammunition, artillery, and stores were worth."

ne se pouvoient compter plus de seize cents dans toute l'île, avoient jugé qu'il leur seroit plus avantageux d'entretenir la paix que d'en venir aux mains et en avoient même fait faire quelque ouverture qui fut méprisée par les Anglais; car ceux-ci qui étoient pour le moins six mille, ne doutant pas qu'ils ne dussent être les plus forts, s'étoient incontinent résolus à passer au fil de l'épée tous les Français qu'ils rencontreroient dans le pays, et cela même leur avoit été commandé par leur vice-roi, comme on le reconnut après la mêlée (l'ordre s'en étant trouvé en original dans la poche de l'un des morts). Mais cette résolution si facile à prendre, ne se trouva pas si facile à exécuter; car les Français, encouragés par la grandeur du péril, se comportèrent en cette occasion avec tant de valeur et de diligence, qu'ayant en un même jour rendu quatre combats différens contre diverses troupes des ennemis, ils les défirent en toutes rencontres, et après en avoir tué mille des plus vaillans, se trouvant enfin sans force et sans poudre, ils témoignèrent néanmoins tant de résolution qu'ils contraignirent ce qui restoit d'ennemis à des conditions honteuses pour des gens qui étoient encore trois fois plus forts que nous. Les principales furent, qu'ils rendroient à l'instant tous les forts qu'ils tenoient, et qu'ils sortiroient de l'île entière, ou me prêteroiient serment de fidélité. Mais dans ce choix qui leur étoit laissé, la plupart aimant mieux sortir, et vendant aux Français leurs biens à vil prix, se retira paisiblement dans les autres îles voisines. Après lequel succès, les huit cents hommes dont je vous ai déjà parlé, arrivant encore pour renfort aux colonies Françaises, je ne devois plus douter que cette île ne demeurât incommutablement en leur possession."

It is very well known to his majesty, and to several persons yet alive, that the parting with Dunkirk was resolved upon before ever I heard of it; and that the purpose was therefore concealed from me, because it was believed that I was not of that opinion, and that I would not concur in the advice. When it was afterwards proposed and debated, when I was present, there likewise attending upon his majesty and his royal highness the late lord treasurer, two secretaries of state, and some other of the lords of the council; the reasons that were given for the parting with it, were, 1st, That the profit which did or could accrue to the kingdom by keeping it, was very inconsiderable, whether in war or peace; that by sea it was very little useful, it being no harbour, nor having place for our ships to ride safe in; and that if it were in the hand of the enemy, it could do us little prejudice, because three or four ships might block it up, and keep it from infesting their neighbours; and that though heretofore it had been a place of licence at sea, and had much obstructed trade by their men of war, yet that proceeded only from the unskillfulness of that time, in applying proper remedies to it; which was manifest by Cromwell's blocking them up, and restraining them when he made war upon them, insomuch as all men of war left that place, and betook themselves to other harbours; that it was so weak to the land (notwithstanding the great charge his majesty had been at in the fortifications, which were not yet finished,) by the situation and the soil, that it required as many men within yet to defend it, as the army should consist of that besieged it; otherwise, that it could never hold out and endure a siege of two months, as appeared clearly by its having been taken and retaken so many times within the late years; in all which times it never held out so long, though there was always an army at no great distance to relieve it. Secondly, That the charge of keeping and maintaining it, without any accidents from the attempt of an enemy, did amount unto above 120,000*l.* a year; which was a sum the revenue of the crown could not support, without leaving many other particulars of much more importance unprovided for; and this was not lightly urged, but the state of the revenue, and the constant and indispensable issues were at the same time presented. Thirdly, It could not reasonably be believed, but that if Dunkirk were kept, his majesty would be shortly involved in a war with one of the two crowns: The Spanish ambassador had already demanded the restitution of it in point of justice, it having been taken from his master by the late usurper, in a time when there was not only a peace between his majesty and the king of Spain, but when his majesty resided and was entertained by the catholic king in Flanders; and at the same time, both France and Spain inhibited their subjects from paying those small contributions to the garrison at Dunkirk, and endeavoured to restrain the governor himself from enjoying some privileges which had been always enjoyed by him, from the time that it was put into Cromwell's hands; and it was then conceived, that as it would be very hard for the king to preserve a neutrality towards both crowns, even during the time of the war between them (which temper was thought very necessary for his majesty's affairs), so it would be much more difficult long to avoid a war with one of them upon the keeping of Dunkirk, if the peace that was newly made should remain firm and unshaken. Upon these reasons, (the major part whereof were out of my sphere, and I could only govern myself by the opinion of those who understood matters of that nature, nor could I answer any of the arguments which have been offered) his majesty resolved to ease himself of the burthen of maintaining Dunkirk, and to part with it in such a manner as might be most for his advantage and benefit. There remained then no other question, than into what hand to put it? And the measure of that was only who would give most money for it, there being then no inclination to prefer one before another. It was enough understood, that both crowns would be very glad to have it, and would probably both make large offers for it; but it was then as evident, that whatsoever France should contract for, the king might be sure to receive, and the business would be soon dispatched; whereas, on the other hand, it was as notorious, and as evident to his majesty, and to all who had any knowledge of the court of Spain, and of the scarcity of money there and in Flanders, that how large offers soever the Spaniard might make, they could not be able in any time to pay any considerable sum of money; and that there would be so much time spent in consults between Madrid and Brussels before it could be dispatched, that the keeping it so long in his majesty's hands would be an intolerable burthen to him; besides that, it seemed then probable that the Spaniard would shortly declare himself an enemy, for besides that he demanded Dunkirk as of right, so he likewise required the restitution of Tangier and Jamaica upon the same reason, and declared, that without it there could be no lasting peace between England and Spain, and refused so much as to enter upon a Treaty of Alliance with the king, before he would promise to make such a restitution. There wanted not in this conference and debate the consideration of the States of the United Provinces, as persons like enough to desire the possession of Dunkirk, from whence they had formerly received so much damage, and were like enough to receive more whenever they should be engaged in any war; and if in truth they had any such desire, more money might reasonably be required of them, and probably be obtained, than could be expected from either of the kings. But upon the discussion of that point, it did appear to every man's reason very manifest, that though they had rather that Dunkirk should be put into the hand of the Spaniard than delivered to France, or than it should be detained by the English, yet they durst not receive it into their own possession; which neither of the kings would have approved of; and so it would have exposed them to the displeasure, if not to the hostility of both crowns. Upon this full deliberation, his majesty inclined rather to give it up to France than to Spain; but deferred any positive resolution till he had imparted the matter to the council-board, where the debate was again resumed, principally concerning the keeping or the parting with it; in which debate the memory and mention of what had been done in the House of Commons heretofore upon that subject was not omitted, nor the bill that they had sent up to the House of Peers for annexing it inseparably to the crown; but after a long debate of the whole matter, there was not, as I remember, above one Lord of the Council who offered his advice to his majesty against parting with it; and the ground of that Lord's dissenting was enough understood to have nothing of public in it. In conclusion, his majesty resolved, for the reasons aforesaid, to put it into the hands of France, if that king would satisfy his majesty's expectation in the money he would require for it.

M. D'Estrades came privately over to treat upon it without any character; but pretending to make it his way for Holland, whither he was designed for ambassador. After he had waited upon the king, his majesty appointed four or five of the Lords of his Privy-Council (whereof I was required to be one) to treat with Monsieur D'Estrades upon the sale of Dunkirk; and at that our first conference together, after we had in vain endeavoured to persuade him to make some offer, we did demand the sum of 700,000*l.* sterling to be paid by the king of France for the delivery of Dunkirk and Mardyke (which is always understood to be included when Dunkirk is mentioned) into his possession. Which sum appeared to him so stupendous, that he seemed to think the treaty at an end, and resolved not to make any offer at all on the part of the king of France; and so the conference broke up. At the next meeting he offered three millions of livres, which, according to the common account, amounted to 300,000 pistoles; which we as much undervalued: So that any further conference was discontinued till he had sent an express or two into France, and till their return: and afterwards, upon our insisting upon what he thought too much, and his offer of what we esteemed too little, the treaty seemed to be at an end, and he preparing for his return. In conclusion his majesty being fully as desirous to part with it as the king of France could be to have it, it was agreed and concluded, that upon the payment of 500,000 pistoles in specie at Calais to such persons as the king should appoint to receive it, his majesty's garrison of Dunkirk should be withdrawn, and that place put into the hands of the king of France: All which was executed accordingly; and I believe was greater sum of money than was ever paid at one payment by any prince in Christendom, upon what occasion soever. And that all this should not amount to a greater value than the ammunition, artillery, and stores were worth, which were delivered with it, is very strange, and cannot be supposed by any reasonable computation. I do very well remember, that in the treaty we did with much earnestness and resolution insist upon the detaining and transporting into England the cannon and other artillery and ammunition: but Monsieur D'Estrades would not consent to it, it being, as he said, necessary for the defence of the place, which probably might be attacked by the Spaniard within few days after it should be delivered into the hands of the French; and upon our inserting that exception of the cannon and ammunition in our demand, he was at last induced to consent to the payment of 500,000 pistoles, which he had never before yielded unto; and when his majesty plainly discerned that the king of France would in truth give no more, and had caused some estimate to be made of the cannon and ammunition, the value whereof, as I remember, was not thought to arise to more than 20,000*l.* sterling, or thereabouts, his majesty resolved to accept what was offered, for which I have not heard that he hath ever since been sorry; and his majesty did at the same time resolve, and positively declare, that all the money which should be received for Dunkirk, should be brought to, and deposited in the Tower of London, and no part of it applied to any ordinary occasions, but to be preserved for some pressing accident, as an insurrection, or the like, which was reasonably enough apprehended; and I presume it was all issued out in such a manner, and at such seasons, as his majesty found necessary for his most important affairs; of the particulars whereof I can say nothing. This is all I can say concerning the sale of Dunkirk, and of my part in that transaction: To which I shall only add, that I acted that part in it which I was obliged by my duty to do, in obedience to the king's commands; and that before, or in, or after the transaction, I never received the value of one shilling for reward, or present, or any other consideration relating to that affair; and I believe the treatment I have received since my coming into France is an unquestionable evidence that that king did never take himself to be beholden to me for that, or any other service, as in truth he never was.*

Dunkerke vendu à la France.

“L'acquisition de Dunkerke n'étoit pas de si grande étendue, [He had just before given the history of the acquisition of Lorraine.] mais

The Twelfth Article is, “That I did unduly “cause his majesty's letters patents under the “great seal of England (to one Dr. Crowther) “to be altered, and the inrollment thereof to “be unduly razed.”

When I first heard of this charge, I could not comprehend what the meaning of it was, elle étoit d'une importance non moindre et d'une utilité plus certaine. Peu de personnes ont su par quelle suite d'affaires cette place si considérable étoit passée entre les mains des Anglais, durant le ministère du cardinal Mazarin. Il faut pour cela remonter jusqu'à la minorité et aux factions qui obligèrent deux fois ce ministre à sortir du royaume.

“Cromwel, à qui le génie, les occasions et le malheur de son pays avoient inspiré des pensées fort au-dessus de sa naissance, au commencement simple officier dans les troupes rebelles du parlement, puis général, puis protecteur de la république, et desirant en secret la qualité de roi, qu'il refusoit en public, enflé par le bon succès de la plupart de ses entreprises, ne voyoit rien de si grand, ni au-dedans, ni au-dehors de son île, à quoi il ne pensât pouvoir prétendre; et bien qu'il ne manquât pas d'affaires chez lui, il regarda les troubles de mon état comme un moyen de mettre le pié en France par quelque grand établissement; ce qui lui étoit également avantageux, soit que la puissance royale se confirmât en sa personne et en sa famille, soit que le caprice des peuples et la même fortune qui l'avoient élevé si haut, entreprissent de le renverser. Il savoit de quelle sorte, presque tous les gouverneurs des places et des provinces traitoient alors avec le Cardinal Mazarin, et qu'à peine y avoit-il de fidélité parmi mes sujets, qu'achetée à prix d'argent ou par des récompenses d'honneur, telles que chacun s'avisait de les souhaiter. Il dépêche le colonel de ses gardes au comte d'Estrades, gouverneur de Dunkerke, il l'exhorte à considérer l'état des choses pour en tirer ses avantages particuliers, lui offre jusqu'à deux millions payables à Amsterdam ou à Venise, s'il veut lui livrer la place, et de ne faire jamais de paix avec la France, sans obtenir pour lui les dignités et les établissemens où il peut aspirer. Il ajoute, que les affaires du cardinal son bienfaiteur, et qui l'avoit mis dans ce poste, sont désespérées, n'y ayant pas d'apparence que ce ministre, dont on avoit mis la tête à prix, puisse par ses propres forces revenir ni dans le ministère, ni dans l'état; qu'il ne le soutiendra pas seul avec Dunkerke, mais périra avec lui. Si toute fois il veut porter son affection et la reconnaissance pour lui jusqu'au bout, qu'il prenne cette occasion de le servir utilement par la seule voie peut-être que sa bonne fortune lui ait laissée de reste; qu'il peut offrir au cardinal, avec la même condition de remettre Dunkerke aux Anglais, nonseulement les deux millions, mais aussi tels secours de troupes qui lui seront nécessaires pour rentrer en France; qu'il se fera par-là, auprès de lui, being most assured that I had never caused any alteration to be made in any of his majesty's letters patents under the great seal, or the inrollment thereof to be razed; but upon un mérite, après lequel, si ce ministre est rétabli, il n'y a rien qu'il n'en doive espérer.

“ D'Estrades, par une conduite très-louable, après avoir obligé cet envoyé à lui faire ces propositions dans un conseil de guerre, et ensuite à les signer, le renvoie à Cromwel avec sa réponse: il se plaint qu'on l'ait cru capable d'une infidélité, ni de rendre cette place par d'autres ordres que les miens; que tout ce qu'il peut, est de me proposer à moi-même la condition des deux millions, et en même temps celle d'une étroite alliance avec moi, par laquelle le Protecteur s'engagea à rompre sur mer et sur terre avec les Espagnols; à me fournir dix mille hommes de pié et deux mille chevaux, pour leur faire la guerre en Flandre; à entretenir cinquante navires de guerre sur les côtes, durant les six mois de l'été, et une escadre de quinze durant l'hiver pour croiser la mer, agissant de concert suivant les desseins qu'on pourroit former ensemble.

“ Cromwel accepta ces propositions qui me furent aussi-tôt envoyées par d'Estrades à Poitiers, où j'étois, et n'arrivèrent que deux jours après le retour du Cardinal Mazarin. Ce Ministre les trouva très-avantageuses, ayant pour maxime de pourvoir, à quelque prix que ce fût, aux affaires présentes, et persuadé que les maux à venir trouvoient leur remède dans l'avenir même.

“ Mais le garde des sceaux Châteauneuf, qu'on avoit été obligé de rappeler durant ces troubles, l'emporta contre lui dans le conseil et auprès de la reine ma mère, et les fit absolument rejeter. Cromwel ayant reçu cette réponse, signa le même jour un traité avec les Espagnols, leur fournit dix mille hommes et vingt-cinq vaisseaux pour le siège de Gravelines et de Dunkerke, qui par ce moyen furent prises sur moi en la même année, l'une à la fin de Mai, l'autre au 22 Septembre* mais au profit des Espagnols seulement.

“ Cependant mon autorité s'étant affermie dans le royaume, et les factions qu'ils y fomentoient étant absolument dissipées, ils furent réduits quelque temps après à ne pouvoir soutenir que difficilement l'effort de mes armes en Flandre. Cromwel, qui ne s'étoit lié avec eux que pour cette entreprise particulière, et qui avoit toujours augmenté depuis en pouvoir et en considération dans toute l'Europe, se voyoit également recherché de leur côté et du mien; ils le regardèrent comme l'unique ressource à leurs affaires de Flandre, et moi comme l'unique obstacle à leurs progrès en un temps où je voyois la conquête entière de ces provinces presque certaine, si on ne m'accordoit tout ce que je pouvois souhaiter pour la paix. Lui, qui n'avoit pas oublié son premier dessein de s'acquérir un enquiry I was informed, that Dr. Crowther, who was chaplain to his royal highness the duke of York, and had attended upon his person during the whole time that his highness poste considérable au-deçà de la mer, ne voulant se déterminer qu'à cette condition, proposoit en même temps aux Espagnols de se joindre à eux dans cette guerre, d'assiéger Calais qui lui demeureroit, ce qu'ils étoient prêts d'accepter avec joie, et à moi d'assiéger Dunkerke et de le lui remettre.

“ Le Cardinal Mazarin, à qui cette ouverture n'étoit pas nouvelle, et qui l'avoit approuvée autrefois, lors même que Dunkerke étoit au pouvoir des Français, s'en trouva sans doute moins éloigné. Et bien que j'y eusse beaucoup de répugnance, je m'y rendis enfin, non-seulement par le cas que je faisois de ses conseils, mais aussi par les avantages essentiels que j'y trouvois pour la guerre de Flandre, et par la nécessité de choisir de deux maux le moindre; ne voyant pas de comparaison, puisqu'il falloit nécessairement voir les Anglais en France, entre les y voir mes ennemis ou mes amis, ni entre à m'exposer à perdre Calais que j'avois, ou leur promettre Dunkerke que je n'avois pas encore.

“ Ce fut donc par cet accommodement, qu'après avoir repris Dunkerke, je le leur remis entre les mains, et il ne faut point douter que leur union avec moi, ne fût comme le dernier coup qui mit l'Espagne hors d'état de se défendre, et qui produisit une paix si glorieuse et si avantageuse pour moi.

“ J'avoue pourtant que cette place au pouvoir des Anglais, m'inquiétoit beaucoup. Il me sembloit que la religion catholique y étoit intéressée. Je me souvenois qu'ils étoient les anciens et irrconciliables ennemis de la France, dont elle ne s'étoit sauvée autrefois que par un miracle; que leur premier établissement en Normandie nous avoit coûté cent ans de guerre, et le second en Guienne trois cents ans, durant lesquels la guerre se faisoit toujours au milieu du royaume à nos dépeus; de sorte qu'on s'estimoit heureux, quand on pouvoit faire la paix, et renvoyer les Anglais chez eux avec de grosses sommes d'argent pour les frais qu'ils avoient faits; ce qu'ils regardoient comme un revenu ou un tribut ordinaire. Je n'ignorois pas que les temps étoient fort changés, mais parce qu'ils pouvoient encore changer d'une autre sorte, j'étois blessé de cette seule pensée, que mes successeurs les plus éloignés me pussent reprocher quelque jour, d'avoir donné lieu à de si grands maux, s'ils pouvoient jamais y retomber; et sans passer même à ces extrémités sans aller si loin dans le passé ou dans l'avenir, je savois combien la seule ville de Calais qui leur étoit demeurée la dernière, avoit coûté de sommes immenses aux Français, par les ravages ordinaires de la garnison, ou par les descentes qu'elle avoit facilitées; ce poste ni pas un autre dans mon royaume, ne pouvant d'ailleurs être à eux sans être en même temps un asyle ouvert aux mutins, et sans fournir à cette nation des intelligences dans tout le royaume, was beyond the seas, upon his majesty's return into England, had obtained from the king his royal presentation to the parsonage of Tredington in the county of Worcester; which sur-tout parmi ceux qu'un intérêt commun de religion lioit naturellement avec elle.

"Peut-être qu'en donnant Dunkerke, j'en avois point trop acheté la paix des Pyrénées et les avantages qu'elle m'apportoit, mais après cela il est certain que je ne pouvois trop donner pour racheter Dunkerke; ce que j'avois bien résolu dès-lors, mais qui à la vérité étoit difficile à espérer.

"Cependant, comme pour venir à bout des choses le premier pas est de les croire possibles; dès l'année 1661, renvoyant d'Estrades en Angleterre, je le chargeai tres-expressément d'étudier avec soin tout ce qui pourroit servir à ce dessein, et d'en faire son application principale.

"Le roi d'Angleterre, nouvellement rétabli, avoit un extrême besoin d'argent pour se maintenir. Je savois que par l'état de son revenu et de sa dépense, il demeurait toujours en arrière de deux ou trois millions par an, et c'est le défaut essentiel de cette monarchie, que le prince n'y sauroit faire de levées extraordinaires sans le parlement, ni tenir le parlement assemblé, sans diminuer d'autant de son autorité qui en demeure quelquefois accablée, comme l'exemple du roi précédent l'avoit assez fait voir.

"Le Chancelier Hyde avoit toujours été assez favorable à la France; il sentoit alors diminuer son crédit dans l'esprit du roi, quoiqu'on ne s'en aperçût point encore, et voyoit dans l'état une puissante cabale qui lui étoit opposée; ce qui l'obligoit d'autant plus à se faire des amis et protecteurs au dehors: toutes ces raisons ensemble le dispoisoient à me faire plaisir, quand mes intérêts pourroient s'accorder avec ceux du Roi son maître.

"D'Estrades exécutant mes ordres, et se servant adroitement de l'accès libre et familier qu'il avoit depuis long-temps auprès de ce prince, n'eut pas de peine dans les conversations ordinaires à le faire tomber sur Dunkerke. Le Roi qui disoit alors qu'il en vouloit faire sa place d'armes, l'entretenoit volontiers de ce dessein, comme un homme qui pourroit lui donner des lumières utiles, en ayant été long-temps gouverneur. Pour lui, approuvant tout, il faisoit seulement remarquer quelques inconvénients dans la situation des lieux, et sur-tout la grande dépense dont cette place avoit besoin nécessairement pour l'entretenir et la garder, jusque-là que le cardinal Mazarin qui la connoissoit par l'expérience du passé, avoit douté plusieurs fois, s'il eût été avantageux à la France de la conserver quand elle l'auroit pu. Le Roi répondoit, qu'il lui seroit fort aisé quand il voudroit se délivrer de cette dépense, les Espagnols lui offrant alors même de grandes sommes, s'il vouloit leur vendre Dunkerke. D'Estrades lui conseilloit toujours d'accepter leurs offres, jusqu'à ce que le Roi, plus pressé que nous ne pensions, vint de lui même à dire que s'il avoit presentation, according to course, passed under the great seal of England; that when he brought his action upon the presentation against the intruder, who refused to give him à en traiter, il aimeroit mieux que ce fût avec moi qu'avec eux.

"Ainsi commença cette négociation dont j'eus une extrême joie, et bien que sa demande fût de cinq millions, somme sans doute très-considérable, qu'il falloit même payer fort promptement, je ne trouvais pas à propos de le laisser refroidir là-dessus; le bon état où commençoient d'être mes finances, me permettant pour une chose aussi importante que celle-là, non seulement ces efforts, mais de plus grands. La conclusion du traité se fit toutefois à quatre millions payables en trois ans, tant pour la place que pour toutes les munitions de guerre, canons, pierres, briques et bois. Je gagnai même sur ce marché cinq cent mille livres, sans que les Anglais s'en aperçussent. Car ne pouvant s'imaginer, qu'en l'état où on avoit vu mes affaires peu de temps auparavant, j'eusse moyen de leur fournir promptement cette grande somme comme ils le desiroient, ils acceptèrent avec joie l'offre que leur fit un banquier, de la payer en argent comptant, moyennant cette remise de cinq cent mille livres; mais le banquier étoit un homme interposé par moi, qui faisant le paiement de mes propres deniers, ne profitoit point de la remise.

"La conséquence de cette acquisition me donna une inquiétude continuelle, jusqu'à ce que tout fût achevé, et ce n'étoit pas sans raison; car l'affaire au commencement très-secrète, ayant été éventée peu à peu, la ville de Londres qui en fut informée, députa ses principaux magistrats, le maire et les aldermans, pour offrir au Roi toutes les sommes qu'il voudroit, à condition de ne point aliéner Dunkerke. De deux courriers que d'Estrade m'avoit dépêchés par deux divers chemins, avec deux copies du traité pour le ratifier, l'un fut arrêté sur le chemin de Calais par les ordres du roi d'Angleterre, l'autre étant déjà passé en France par Dieppe; et ce Roi à qui d'Estrades représentoit en même temps, qu'il ne s'agissoit plus de Dunkerke, mais de rompre pour jamais avec moi, si on ne me tenoit parole, quelque complaisance qu'il fût obligé d'avoir pour eux, leur fit approuver enfin comme une chose déjà faite et sans remède, ce qu'ils avoient résolu d'empêcher."—Oeuvres de Louis xiv, vol. 1, p. 167.

Then follow some reflections which the king makes for the benefit of his son the Dauphin upon the acquisition of Lorraine and the recovery of Dunkirk.

Respecting the Sale of Dunkirk, lord Clarendon thus expresses himself in the Continuation of his Life, p. 201.

"At or about this time there was a transaction of great importance, which at the time was not popular nor indeed understood, and afterwards was objected against the Chancellor in his misfortunes, as a principal argument of his infidelity and corruption; which was the sale possession, and the record was carried down to the assizes in the country, when the doctor's counsel was to open his title, and thereupon was to produce the king's presentation, they found, upon perusal thereof, that either of Dunkirk: The whole proceeding whereof shall be plainly and exactly related from the beginning to the end thereof.

"The charge and expence the crown was at; the pay of the land forces and garrisons; the great fleets set out to sea for the reduction of the Turkish pirates of Algiers and Tunis, and for guarding the narrow seas, and security of the merchants; the constant yearly charge of the garrison of Duakirk, of that at Tangier, and the vast expence of building a mole there, for which there was an establishment, together with the garrisons at Bombay and in Jamaica, (none of which had been known to the crown in former times); and the Lord Treasurer's frequent representation of all this to the king, as so prodigious an expence as could never be supported; had put his majesty to frequent consultations how he might lessen and save any part of it. But no expedient could be resolved upon. The lord treasurer, who was most troubled when money was wanted, had many secret conferences with the general and with the best seamen, of the benefit that accrued to the crown by keeping of Dunkirk; the constant charge and expence whereof amounted to above 120,000*l.* yearly: and he found by them that it was a place of little importance. It is true that he had conferred of it with the chancellor, with whom he held a fast friendship; but found him so averse from it, that he resolved to speak with him no more, till the king had taken some resolution. And to that purpose he persuaded the general to go with him to the king and to the duke of York, telling them both, 'that the chancellor must know nothing of it:' and after several debates the king thought it so counsellable a thing, that he resolved to have it debated before that committee which he trusted in his most secret affairs; and the chancellor being then lame of the gout, he commanded that all those lords should attend him at his house. Beside his majesty himself and the duke of York, there appeared the lord treasurer, the general, the earl of Sandwich, the vice-chamberlain sir George Carteret, who had been a great commander at sea, and the two secretaries of state. When the king entered the room with the lord treasurer, he desired his majesty, smiling, 'That he would take the chancellor's staff from him, otherwise he would break his head.' When they were all sat, the king told him, 'They were all come to debate an affair that he knew he was against, which was the parting with Dunkirk; but he did believe, when he had heard all that was said for it and against it, he would change his mind, as he himself had done.' And so the debate was entered into in this method, after enough was said of the straits the crown was in, and what the yearly expence was.

by misinformation, or negligence of the clerk, instead of the county of Worcester, where the rectory was, the county of Warwick was inserted; upon which mistake, the doctor was necessitated to be nonsuited: and thereupon

"(1.) 'That the profit which did or could accrue to the kingdom by the keeping of Dunkirk was very inconsiderable, whether in war or peace. That by sea it was very little useful, it being no harbour, nor having place for the king's ships to ride in with safety; and that if it were in the hand of an enemy, it could do us little prejudice, because three or four ships might block it up, and keep it from infesting its neighbours: And that though heretofore it had been a place of license at sea, and had much obstructed trade by their men of war, yet that proceeded only from the unskilfulness of that time in applying proper remedies to it; which was manifest by Cromwell's blocking them up, and restraining them when he made war upon them, inasmuch as all the men of war left that place, and betook themselves to other harbours. That it was so weak to the land (notwithstanding the great charge his majesty had been at in the fortifications, which were not yet finished) by the situation and the soil, that it required as many men within to defend it, as the army should consist of that besieged it; otherwise that it could never hold out and endure a siege of two months: as it appeared clearly by its having been taken and retaken so many times within the late years, in all which times it never held out so long, though there was always an army at no great distance to relieve it.'

"(2.) 'That the charge of keeping and maintaining it, without any accidents from the attempt of an enemy, did amount unto above 120,000*l.* by the year, which was a sum the revenue of the crown could not supply, without leaving many other particulars of much more importance unprovided for.' And this was not lightly or cursorily urged; but the state of the revenue, and the constant and indispensable issues, were at the same time presented and carefully examined.

"(3.) 'It could not reasonably be believed, but that if Dunkirk was kept, his majesty would be shortly involved in a war with one of the two crowns. The Spanish ambassador had already demanded restitution of it in point of justice, it having been taken from his master by the late usurper, in a time when there was not only a peace between his majesty and the king of Spain, but when his majesty resided, and was entertained by the Catholic king, in Flanders: And at this time both France and Spain inhibited their subjects from paying those small contributions to the garrison at Dunkirk, and endeavoured to restrain the governor himself from enjoying some privileges, which had been always enjoyed by him from the time that it had been put into Cromwell's hands.' And it was upon this and many other reasons then conceived, 'that he forthwith made a journey to London, to advise with his counsel, and the most experienced clerks, how to recover the misfortune that had befallen him, and that his majesty's right might

'as it would be very hard for the king to preserve a neutrality towards both crowns, even during the time of the war between them' (which temper was thought very necessary for his majesty's affairs); 'so it would be much more difficult long to avoid a war with one of them upon the keeping Dunkirk, if the peace that was newly made should remain firm and unshaken.'

"Upon these reasons, urged and agreed upon by those who could not but be thought very competent judges, in respect of their several professions and great experience, the king resolved to ease himself of the insupportable burden of maintaining Dunkirk, and to part with it in such a manner as might be most for his advantage and benefit. There remained then no other question, than into what hand to put it: and the measure of that was only who would give most money for it, there being no inclination to prefer one before another. It was enough understood, that both crowns would be very glad to have it, and would probably both make large offers for it. But it was then as evident, that whatsoever France should contract for, the king would be sure to receive, and the business would be soon dispatched: whereas on the other hand it was as notorious and evident to his majesty, and to all who had any knowledge of the court of Spain, and of the scarcity of money there and in Flanders; that how large offers soever the Spaniard might make, they could not be able in any time to pay any considerable sum of money; and that there would be so much time spent in consult between Madrid and Brussels before it could be dispatched, that the keeping it so long in his majesty's hands would in the expense disappoint him of a good part of the end in parting with it. Besides that it seemed at that time probable, that the Spaniard would shortly declare himself an enemy; for besides that he demanded Dunkirk as of right, so he likewise required the restitution of Tangier and Jamaica upon the same reason, and declared "that without it there could be no lasting peace between England and Spain," and refused so much as to enter upon a Treaty of Alliance with the king, before he should promise to make such a restitution.

"There wanted not in this conference and debate the consideration of the States of the United Provinces, as persons like enough to desire the possession of Dunkirk, from whence they had formerly received so much damage, and were like enough to receive more whenever they should be engaged in any war: and if in truth they should have any such desire, more money might be reasonably required and probably be obtained from them, than could be expected from either of the kings. But upon the discussion of that point, it did appear to not be destroyed by such an oversight in the clerk; and it seems he was by them advised, as the usual way in cases of that nature, to petition the king, that in his majesty's pre-every man's reason very manifest, that though they had rather that Dunkirk should be put into the hands of the Spaniard than delivered to France, or than it should be detained by the English; yet they durst not receive it into their own possession, which neither of the two crowns would have approved of, and so it would have exposed them to the displeasure if not to the hostility of both the kings.

"Upon this full deliberation, his majesty inclined rather to give it up to France than to Spain; but deferred any positive resolution till he had imparted the whole matter to the council-board, where the debate was again resumed, principally, 'whether it were more counsellable to keep it at so vast a charge, or to part with it for a good sum of money.' And in that debate the mention of what had been heretofore done in the House of Commons upon that subject was not omitted, nor the bill that they had sent up to the House of Peers for annexing it inseparably to the crown; but that was not thought of moment; for as it had been suddenly entertained in the House of Commons, upon the Spanish Ambassador's first proposition for the restitution, so it was looked upon in the House of Peers as unfit in itself, and so laid aside after once being read (which had been in the first convention soon after the king's return), and so expired as soon as it was born. After a long debate of the whole matter at the council-board, where all was averred concerning the uselessness and weakness of the place, by those who had said it at the committee; there was but one Lord of the council who offered his advice to the king against parting with it: and the ground of that Lord's dissenting, who was the earl of St. Albans, was enough understood to having nothing of public in it, but to draw the negotiation for it into his own hands. In conclusion, his majesty resolved to put it into the hands of France, if that king would comply with his majesty's expectation in the payment of so much money as he would require for it: and a way was found out, that that king might privately be advertised of that his majesty's resolution, if he should have any desire to deal for it.

"The advertisement was very welcome to the French king, who was then resolved to visit Flanders as soon as he should know of the death of the king of Spain, which was expected every day. Nor had he deferred it till then, upon the late affront his Ambassador had received at London from the Spanish Ambassador (who by a contrived and laboured stratagem had got the precedence for his coach before the other; which the king of France received with that indignation, that he sent presently to demand justice at Madrid, commanded his Ambassador to retire from thence, and would not suffer the Spanish Ambassador to sence, the presentation might be mended, and Worcester inserted instead of Warwick, and that thereupon the great seal might be again affixed to it; all which was done accordingly, as in such cases is usual. And this is all I know of that affair.

The Thirteenth Article is, "That I have, in an arbitrary way, examined and drawn into question divers of his majesty's subjects concerning their lands, tenements, goods and chattels, and properties; determined thereof at the council table, and stopped proceedings at law, and threatened some that pleaded the statute of 17 Car. 1."

I must here again lament my own misfortune, that I am exposed to public reproach remain in Paris till he should have satisfaction, and was resolved to have begun a war upon it), if the king of Spain had not acknowledged the fault of his Ambassador, and under his hand declared the precedence to belong to France; which declaration was sent to the courts of all princes: and so for the present that spark of fire was extinguished or rather raked up.

"The king sent M. D' Estrades privately to London to treat about Dunkirk, without any character, but pretending to make it his way to Holland, whither he was designed ambassador. After he waited upon the king, his majesty appointed four or five of the Lords of his council, whereof the chancellor and treasurer and general were three, to treat with M. D' Estrades for the sale of Dunkirk; when the first conference was spent in endeavouring to persuade him to make the first offer for the price, which he could not be drawn to: so that the king's commissioners were obliged to make their demand. And they asked the sum of 700,000*l.* sterling, to be paid upon the delivery of Dunkirk and Mardike into the possession of the king of France; which sum appeared to him to be so stupendous, that he seemed to think the Treaty at an end, and resolved to make no offer at all on the part of his master. And so the conference brake up.

"At the next meeting he offered three millions of livres, which according to the common account amounted to 300,000 pistoles, which the king's commissioners as much undervalued; so that any farther conference was discontinued till he had sent an express or two into France, and till their return: for as the expectation of a great sum of ready money was the king's motive to part with it, besides the saving the monthly charge; so they concluded that his necessities would oblige him to part with it at a moderate price. And after the return of the expresses, the king's commissioners insisting still upon what D' Estrades thought too much, and he offering what they thought too little, the Treaty seemed to be at an end, and he prepared for his return. In conclusion, his majesty being fully as desirous to part with it as the king of France could be to have it, it was agreed and concluded, 'that upon the payment of under a general odious charge, without asserting any one particular, to which I might make my defence: I have therefore no more to say; but that I am very innocent as to any crime laid to my charge in this article; and I have been so far from examining and drawing into question any of his majesty's subjects concerning their lands, tenements, goods and chattels, and properties, and determining the same at the council table, and stopping proceedings at law, that I do not know or believe that any one case of that nature hath been ever determined there, at least when I have been present; I having always discountenanced all such addresses, and procured all petitions of that kind to be rejected as often as they have been tendered; and I take myself ob-

'500,000 pistoles in specie at Calais to such persons as the king should appoint to receive it, his majesty's garrison of Dunkirk and Mardike should be withdrawn, and those places put into the hands of the king of France:' all which was executed accordingly. And without doubt it was a greater sum of money than was ever paid at one payment by any prince in Christendom, upon what occasion soever; and every body seemed very glad to see so vast a sum of money delivered into the Tower of London, as it was all together; the king at the same time declaring, 'that no part of it should be applied to any ordinary occasion, but be preserved for some pressing accident, as an insurrection or the like,' which was reasonably enough apprehended.

"Nor was there the least murmur at this bargain in all the sessions of the parliament which sat after until it fell out to some mens purposes to reproach the chancellor: And then they charged him "with advising the sale of Dunkirk, and that the very artillery, ammunition and stores amounted to a greater value than the king received for the whole;" when upon an estimate that had been taken of all those, they were not esteemed to be more worth than 20,000*l.* sterling; and the consideration of those, when the king's commissioners insisted upon their being all shipped for England, and the necessity of keeping them upon the place where they were, had prevailed with M. D' Estrades to consent to that sum of 500,000 pistoles. But whether the bargain was ill or well made, there could be no fault imputed to the chancellor, who had no more to do in the transaction than is before set down, the whole matter having been so long deliberated and so fully debated. Nor did he ever before, or in, or after the transaction receive the value of half a crown for reward or present, or any other consideration relating to that affair: And the treatment he received after his coming into France was evidence enough that that king never thought himself beholden to him."

Yet so lately as May 19, 1662, he had told the parliament: "Whosoever unskilfully murmurs at the expence of Dunkirk, and the other new acquisitions, which ought to be looked upon liged to say, for the vindication of his majesty's honour and justice, that there have not been so many years passed since the erection of the council table, with so little disturbance or disquiet to the subjects concerning their lands, tenements, goods and chattels, and properties, as hath been since his majesty's happy as jewels of an immense magnitude in the royal diadem, do not enough remember what we have lost by Dunkirk, and should always do if it were in an enemy's hands; nor duly consider the vast advantages those other dominions are like by God's blessing in a short time to bring to the trade, navigation, wealth, and honour of the king and kingdom. His majesty hath enough expressed his desire to live in a perfect peace and amity with all his neighbours; nor is it an ill ingredient towards the firmness and stability of that peace and amity, which his royal ancestors have held and maintained with them, that he hath some advantages in case of a war, which they were without." In his own account of this speech (Contin. of Life 165) he does not exhibit Dunkirk as an object of such paramount value as to be alone worthy of being named, but still he gives it precedence of the others. The following is the passage: He told them, "that the new acquisitions of Dunkirk, Mardike, Tangier, Jamaica, and Bombayne, ought to be looked upon as jewels of an immense magnitude in the royal diadem; and though they were of present expense, they were like in a short time, with God's blessing, to bring vast advantages to the trade, navigation, wealth and honour of the king and kingdom. His majesty had enough expressed his desire to live in a perfect peace and amity with all his neighbours; nor was it an ill ingredient towards the firmness and stability of that peace and amity which his royal ancestors had held with them, that he hath some advantages in case of a war, which they were without."

In the 7th volume of Thurloe's State Papers are several documents relating to Dunkirk. Among others there is at p. 714, a circumstantial account of the public revenues, and of other particulars of the place. It is in the form of a Report, which it seems probable was made to the Council of State, shortly after the deposition of Richard Cromwell, somewhat more than 13 months after it had been delivered up to his father, in June 1658.

The gross amount of the Public Revenue is stated thus:

	Guilders.	£.
The State's Revenue - -	168,991	12,999
Governor's Do. - - -	31,462	2,419
Town Do. - - - -	80,894	6,222
Town Major's Do. } besides perquisites. }	1,006	77

Burnet writes thus about Dunkirk: "But what he [count Schomberg] pressed most on the king, as the business then in agitation, was concerning the sale of Dunkirk. The Spa-return, nor hath the ordinary course of proceeding at law been less obstructed.

The Fourteenth Article is, "That I did cause Quo Warranto's to be issued out against most of the corporations of England by act of parliament, to the intent I might receive great sums of money from them for renewing their charters; which when they complied withal, I caused the said Quo Warranto's to be discharged, and prosecution thereon to cease."

I never caused any Quo Warranto to issue out against any one corporation in England, but by his majesty's express command, or by order of the board; which was always upon some miscarriage or misbehaviour in the corporation: and I do not remember that I ever niards pretended it ought to be restored to them, since it was taken from them by Cromwell, when they had the king and his brothers in their armies: But that was not much regarded. The French pretended, that, by their agreement with Cromwell, he was only to hold it, till they had repayed the charge of the war: Therefore they, offering to lay that down, ought to have the place delivered to them. The king was in no sort bound by this. So the matter under debate was, whether it ought to be kept or sold? The military men, who were believed to be corrupted by France, said, the place was not tenable; that in time of peace it would put the king to a great charge, and in time of war it would not quit the cost of keeping it. The earl of Clarendon said, he understood not those matters; but appealed to Monk's judgment, who did positively advise the letting it go for the sum that France offered. To make the business go the easier, the king promised, that he would lay up all the money in the Tower; and that it should not be touched, but upon extraordinary occasions. Schomberg advised, in opposition to all this, that the king should keep it; for, considering the naval power of England, it could not be taken. He knew, that, though France spoke big, as if they would break with England unless that was delivered up, yet they were far from the thoughts of it. He had considered the place well; and he was sure it could never be taken, as long as England was master of the sea. The holding it would keep both France and Spain in a dependence upon the king. But he was singular in that opinion. So it was sold: And all the money, that was paid for it, was immediately squandered away among the mistresses creatures:

By this the king lost his reputation abroad. The court was believed venal. And because the earl of Clarendon was in greatest credit, the blame was cast chiefly on him; though his son assured me, he kept himself out of that affair entirely. The cost bestowed on that place since that time, and the great prejudice we have suffered by it, has made that sale to be often reflected on very severely."

moved the king against any particular corporation, but that of Woodstock; and which my duty to his majesty obliged me to do, being intrusted by his majesty with the command of his house and parks there, and being his majesty's steward of his honour and manor of Woodstock, upon which the borough had always depended. His majesty having conferred that charge upon me, I was no sooner possessed of it by the death of the late earl of Lindsey, who enjoyed that place before, than I received a petition from several inhabitants and burgesses of the borough of Woodstock, who complained that the mayor and justices had lately procured their charter to be renewed, without the privity or consent of the borough; and that under pretence of renewing it, they had procured many new clauses to be inserted, and thereby reduced much of the government, which before depended upon the whole corporation, into their own hands; and had thereby likewise procured a piece of ground, the benefit whereof did formerly belong to all the burgesses, and was usually applied to the relief of such of them who were decayed in their estates, to be now granted to the mayor, and a select number of the justices, and the profits thereof to be at their disposal, to the great prejudice of the borough and the inhabitants thereof. I referred this petition to Mr. Justice Morton, who lived within four or five miles of Woodstock, and desired him to examine the truth of these allegations, and to certify me whether the complaints were just and reasonable; whereupon he took the pains to go over to the town, and confer with the mayor and justices, and heard the allegations of the petitioners; and upon the whole matter certified me, that he found several important alterations in the new charter from what had been in the old, and some new concessions; and at the same time, sir William Fleetwood, who is ranger of the parks, certified me, that since the renewing of their charter, the mayor and justices were not so good neighbours to his majesty's game, as they had formerly been, and had withdrawn many of those services which they had used to perform; and that when any trespasses were committed by those of the borough upon his majesty's woods or game, which happened very frequently, and complaint was thereof made to the mayor and justices, who had the sole jurisdiction within the borough, there was so slight and perfunctory examination thereof, that the prosecutors were wearied out, and no justice could be obtained. It was my duty to inform his majesty of these proceedings, who was much offended thereat, and thereupon gave directions to his attorney general to bring a Quo Warranto, and to repeal that charter which had been so unduly procured, and in which his majesty had been so grossly deceived and abused; and I believe there was the less vigour used in the prosecution of that Quo Warranto, because the mayor and justices, for some time, pretended that they would surrender the said charter, and receive a new one in such manner as his majesty thought fit, though they afterwards changed their mind. And this is the only charter which I gave direction for the prosecution of, to the best of my memory; nor did I ever give direction, upon the receipt of any money, to discharge any Quo Warranto's, or cause the prosecution thereupon to cease; nor did I ever receive the least sum of money for the granting or renewing any charter, other than the usual fees received for the same by the clerk of the hanaper, and accounted to the great seal; which fee, as I remember, amounts to 13s. 4d. or thereabouts.

The Fifteenth Article is, "That I procured the Bills of Settlement for Ireland, and received great sums of money for the same, in a most corrupt and unlawful manner."

I do confess, if I have received the least sum of money for or upon the passing any bills for the settlement of Ireland, I have done the same in a most corrupt and unlawful manner; nor indeed have I been more solicitous in procuring any of the said bills to pass, or been more concerned in or for the passing them (except for his majesty's service, and the public peace), than any other counsellor present at those debates hath been; but because this aspersion upon my honour and my honesty hath been by so much industry contrived by some men, who very well know my innocence in that particular, and may yet have gained credit with many upon the confidence of bold reporters; I do not know a better way for my own entire vindication, than to set down an entire relation of all that hath passed by my hand, or with my privity, with reference to Ireland, since the time of his majesty's happy return into England. When his majesty found at his coming to Whitehall several persons of honour and quality deputed from Ireland, to tender the humble duty, obedience, and submission of that kingdom to his majesty's government and subjection; the present government of Ireland, at that time, being executed in a military way by those who had the command of that part of the army, which, upon the revolution in England, had declared their purpose and resolution to return to his majesty's obedience; and there could not be too much expedition used in settling it under those laws, and that form of government it had been formerly accustomed to. Every body remembers the multiplicity of business the king was incumbent to at that time, being to reduce his three kingdoms to that old order and form of government which they might in justice require and which for so many years had, by the confusion of the late civil war, been discontinued, and therefore it will not be much wondered at, that the settlement of Ireland did not proceed with that expedition as the distracted interests of that kingdom did require.

Within few days after the king's arrival at Whitehall, the commissioners or deputies from Ireland (for I know not under what other name or title to mention them) taking notice of the trust the king then reposed in me, (a greater trust, God and the king well know, than I was in any degree ambitious of) addressed themselves to me, desiring that I would receive from them an information of the present state and condition of that kingdom; which his majesty had likewise commanded them to impart to me; and that I would assist them in procuring his majesty's favour, that as little time might be lost as was possible, in endeavouring to settle and compose the distracted condition of that kingdom: and upon conference with them, I quickly found that it was in a distracted condition indeed; so hopelessly distracted, that I could not comprehend any practicable way to compose it. There had been an act of parliament made in the beginning of the rebellion for the encouragement of adventurers; that was, to encourage all persons to bring in money for the carrying on the war, upon the assurance of having a recompence for their money out of the forfeited lands of those who were or should be in rebellion, according to an estimate of the values by the said act of parliament; in which, for their better security, there was likewise a clause, that his majesty should not grant a pardon to any of those rebels; and upon this invitation many honourable persons, and others had brought in great sums of money for the carrying on that war, upon the security aforesaid. But the rebellion shortly breaking out in England, the persons in power in both Houses quickly violated that whole act, by taking the monies raised, and lent for the service of Ireland, without, and contrary to the consent of who lent it, and applying it for the support of the rebellion in England; and employed those regiments of horse and foot, who were levied for Ireland, to serve against the king, under the command of my lord of Essex, and who did serve under his command, at the battle of Edge-hill; where some of them, out of the detestation of being so betrayed into rebellion, quitted my lord Essex his army, and went over to the king. The service of Ireland being thus neglected, and to such a degree that the rebels there increased in number and in strength, many persons of honour in that nation, who had contained themselves within their obedience, and were in no degree privy to the first insurrection and breaking out into rebellion, found it now necessary for their own preservation, to secure themselves in those towns and places which were possessed by the rebels, and so joined with them in their counsels; yet making all the professions of duty to the king, and of an impatient desire to return to their subjection; which many of them made good afterwards upon the first opportunity. By this means the rebels in Ireland advanced every day in power, and had several armies in the several provinces of the kingdom; much superior in power to the English forces, whilst they were every day diminished by their want of vicuals, want of cloaths and want of pay, which the parliament neglected to supply them with, and the king could not. His late majesty, after above a year's time that the rebellion in England had been prosecuted against him, notwithstanding all overtures of accommodation, found it necessary to make a cessation in Ireland; which was after some years transacted into a peace, which though it was quickly afterwards most wickedly and perfidiously broken by the Irish to their own destruction, yet many principal persons of honour and good fortune adhered afterwards constantly to the king, without ever swerving from their allegiance; and such men believed the full benefit of that peace, in being restored to their states which did in justice belong to them, and expected the same accordingly.

After the murder of his late majesty, the king that now is receiving an address from his Roman Catholic subjects in Ireland, with great acknowledgements of their past crimes and errors, and of ample professions of their duty and obedience for the time to come, during the time of his being in France, I sent the lord marquis of Ormond into Ireland as his lieutenant of that kingdom, and with authority to make such concessions to his Roman Catholic subjects as might unite them to his obedience: and that thereby such an Union might likewise be made between his English and Irish subjects (the Lord Inchiquin having reduced the whole province of Munster, and the army, and garrisons thereof to make profession of fidelity to their king), that Dublin might quickly be recovered, which was the only considerable place that then continued in rebellion, and in which there were very many of known affections to the king, who would quickly have rendered that city to the lord lieutenant, if a great supply from the parliament, immediately after the murder of the late king, had not unhappily arrived the very day or two before the marquis of Ormond marched with his army to recover Dublin; and within very few weeks after, Cromwell himself landed there with a great army of horse and foot, and all provisions necessary for the support and maintenance of it.

It is not necessary in this place, and upon this occasion, to mention what befel that unhappy kingdom after Cromwell's arrival there: the quick and speedy reduction of towns and garrisons, the dissolving and dismissing of the troops and army under the command of the lord lieutenant, and he being forced to withdraw himself out of the kingdom, and to return into France; which, although it proceeded from the miserable and foolish jealousies of the Irish and then from their treachery and perfidiousness, yet those crimes did not cover the whole nation; yet there remained still very many persons of honour and quality, who never after were faulty to his majesty, and therefore expected the benefit of the last peace, likewise confirmed by his majesty that now is, as of justice belonging to them; and many of this condition (some whereof had never been in arms against the crown, but had faithfully served in his majesty's army in England during the whole rebellion) transported themselves to his majesty beyond the seas, and many others were taken and put to death in Ireland.

After all opposition to the parliament was totally suppressed in Ireland, and the kingdom entirely at their devotion, they began then to think of executing the act of parliament of the seventeenth year of the late king, for satisfaction of the adventurers: But as they had from the beginning violated that act, by the missapplying the men and the money, as aforesaid; so they now preferred the gratifying and rewarding, and paying the arrears due to the officers and soldiers, by assigning them liberal proportions of the lands which they called forfeited, before they did any thing for satisfaction of the adventurers, except such only who for some other merit or interest had a title to their favour; and amongst the forfeited lands they reckoned all that which belonged to the church, to the marquis of Ormond, the lord Inchiquin, and all those who had adhered to the king, and constantly opposed the rebels there, as part, and distributed the same accordingly. So that at this time, when the commissioners for that kingdom attended his majesty, the officers and soldiers of the army, and some adventurers, were and had been in quiet possession for many years of all the church-lands, of all the marquis of Ormond's lands, and the lands of all other his majesty's faithful friends and servants; and yet there remained a general complaint amongst the adventurers, that they were in no degree satisfied what was due to them upon their adventures by the act of parliament, and desired the king that they might receive what was their due.

Cromwell had not exercised such a severity as to eradicate the whole Irish nation; but had transplanted them with so great rigour out of the other provinces into the province of Connaught, that there was scarce left one Irish family out of Connaught, where the usurper had assigned them severally such proportions as he thought recompence enough for the small possessions he had formerly allowed them out of their own estates, in those places where their fortunes had lain: And to this transplantation they had been forced to give their consent, having had nothing in their election but either to accept these assignments, or to have nothing to live upon in any other place. But now, upon his majesty's return, as well those men who had been transplanted thither out of other provinces, as those upon whose lands the other were transplanted as forfeited to the state, were now suitors to the king, that every one might be restored to his own; and that their past crimes might be expiated by the extreme sufferings they had sustained for many years; and that those men who had been as deep in rebellion as themselves, and continued much longer, and prospered better in it, might not be gratified and rewarded with their estates and fortunes.

Many persons of honour and reputation, as is said before, had repaired to the king whilst he was beyond seas, and followed and attended him there; many regiments had been raised and transported with the consent and approbation of Cromwell, for the service of the two crowns of France and Spain; and many of those officers had served his majesty from the beginning, and had never been in rebellion, and upon his majesty's command, when he was in Flanders, brought their regiments over thither to serve as he should direct: and as the king had kept intelligence always with many of his well-affected subjects in England and in Scotland, so he had likewise done with some in Ireland, to the end that they might be ready to make use of the first opportunity that should be offered by any divisions in the army, or other conjunctures, to join with those who were most forward to advance the king's restitution; which many considerable men there had promised to do and in such seasons could have rendered themselves very useful; and all these men had some pretence to the king's favour, and an expectation to be restored, at least, to some part of their estates.

This was the perplexed estate of that kingdom when the king returned into England, and when these commissioners attended upon his majesty, and conferred with me; when I protested to them that there were so many intricacies in the business, and the whole kingdom involved in so many contradictory titles and interests, that I knew not what counsel to give, or what to propose; but that I would in public council give the best advice and assistance I could for the settling that kingdom, when they should make any such propositions to his majesty as were practicable. That which was first to be done, and which could only make all other expedients to be practicable, was the settling the government in such a form, and by such rules, as the kingdom had been accustomed to before the troubles; and that the course and courts of justice might be opened. Then the commissioners themselves proposed, as the first work incumbent upon his majesty, in piety honour and justice, that all such to whom the lands of the church, the lands of the marquis of Ormond, and of all his majesty's friends who had been faithful to him, should be forthwith removed, that the right owners might immediately be put in possession of what in right belonged to them; which was the more easily to be done because much of those lands remained undisposed of, and reserved for Cromwell himself, and much of the rest had been assigned to those officers who had been the king's murderers; and so those lands were free from all other title or pretence, but what the king himself could make to them. But then there was some caution and order to be observed; first to assign other recompence to such who were possessed (how erroneously soever) of any lands, either as adventurers upon the statute, or as soldiers, for the just arrears of their pay; and his majesty had declared before his coming into England there should be satisfaction given to all such persons; and the truth is, the whole kingdom of Ireland was at that time so much possessed by the adventurers and soldiers, that it was thought very necessary in point of prudence, to remove none out of possession of what had been formerly assigned to them, and according to the rules of that time, until some other lands were assigned to them, which was not difficult to be done. Then the commissioners, discerning how much his majesty was concerned for many of those who had served him beyond the seas, and for others who claimed the benefit of the first and second treaty, undertook that his majesty should not be pressed in any of those particulars, but that all such persons should be preserved, and their estates secured; and thereupon a preamble was prepared, containing those provisions which were approved by the commissioners, who undertook to have such a bill transmitted as might be the foundation for a good settlement, and in which his majesty might make such alterations as he did think fit.

There were more difficulties appeared in settling the government than were at first apprehended; and nothing was so necessary as sending over the king's commission, which might determine all other authorities of committees and officers, in which men had been invested by a common consent, or rather by the prevalence of a party, which already grew into factions and contestations. The general, who had contributed so much to the king's Restoration, and appeared very zealous for the advancement of his service, had been by the parliament and council of state, as they called them, declared and created general of all the forces in the three kingdoms; and so his orders had been obeyed, as well in Scotland and Ireland, as in England, before his majesty's return; and the king did not think fit in any degree to lessen his trust and authority, nor had the general any inclination to part with his power in Ireland, where he had procured a great estate, and could best secure it under his own authority; and yet he resolved not to go thither, and indeed his presence then, about the king, was thought very necessary. Hereupon the king declared, that he would make the lord Roberts deputy of Ireland; who was willing to receive that charge, knowing, at the same time, that the duke of Albemarle was to continue lieutenant of that kingdom. But there quickly arose such differences between the general and the lord Roberts, about the drawing their commissions, the latter being so scrupulous and nice in having the least dependence upon the general, though Lord Lieutenant; and his pride and morosity was such towards the commissioners of Ireland, that they withdrew themselves from giving him further attendance and information; so that his majesty quickly discerned, that though he was a man of great parts and knowledge, yet his nature and temper was not fit for that employment, and therefore resolved for the present to put the government into the hands of three lords justices, the Lord Chancellor of that kingdom, the earl of Montroth, and the earl of Orrery, who might begin to reduce the government into some order, until his majesty could take a further resolution for the establishment of it.

As soon as a bill was transmitted, according to the usual course, to his majesty, for the settlement of Ireland, with such a preamble as is before mentioned, though the body of the bill did not in truth correspond with it; his majesty gave direction, that it should be shewed and exposed to those of the several interests, even to the Irish themselves, who were the most like to receive prejudice from it: And after a sufficient time allowed for every man's consideration, his majesty appointed a time to have it read at the board, and to hear what objections could be made against it. The great debate then was upon the pretences of the Irish, who appeared with marvellous confidence, and complained, that by that act then prepared, and under consideration, the whole Irish nation would be extirpated, all their estates being thereby taken from them. As the present government in Ireland, which had declared for the king, had sent over commissioners or deputies to attend his majesty, and know his pleasure, as is mentioned before; so the body of adventurers had likewise chosen some persons to present their grievances and desires: and the Irish, under the names of the Roman Catholics of Ireland, had likewise chosen others to appear on their behalf, whereof some were lawyers and men of good parts, who well knew all the transactions in Ireland, from the beginning of the Rebellion, throughout all the changes of government. The chiefest arguments they urged for themselves were, 1st, Their long and great suffering; the loss of their estates for five or six and twenty years; the wasting and spending of the whole nation in battles, and in transportation of men into the parts beyond the seas; whither, as I remember, they reckoned above 20,000 men to be transported out of that kingdom in 4 or 5 years; the great numbers which had been executed and massacred after his majesty's government had been forced from thence; the great numbers which had perished by famine and the plague; these two great judgments having raged over the kingdom for two or three years; and at last the transplanting the small remainder of the nation into one corner of the province of Conaught, where yet much of the land was taken from them, which had been assigned to them with all those formalities of law which were practised under that government. 2. They demanded the benefit of the two treaties of peace; the one in the late king's time, and the other confirmed by his majesty that now is; by both which they stand indemnified for all acts done by them in the Rebellion; and insisted upon their innocence since that time, and that they had pursued all ways that lay in their power to manifest their affection to his majesty, and so entire an obedience to his commands whilst he was beyond the seas, that they betook themselves to, and withdrew themselves from, the service of France or Spain, in such manner as his majesty signified was his pleasure they should do. 3. They urged, and forced, with a little more liberty and indiscretion than became them in that conjuncture, the unworthiness and incapacity of those who for so many years had possessed themselves of their estates, and sought now a confirmation of their rebellious title from his majesty : That their Rebellion had been more infamous, and of a greater magnitude than that of the Irish ; who had risen in arms to free themselves from the rigour and severity that was exercised upon them by some of the king's ministers, and for the liberty of their conscience and practice of their religion, without having the least intention or thought of withdrawing themselves from his majesty's obedience, or declining his majesty's government : Whereas, the others had carried on an odious rebellion against his majesty's sacred person, whom they had horridly murdered in the sight of the Sun, with all imaginable circumstances of contempt and defiance, and as much as in them lay, had rooted out monarchy itself, and overturned and destroyed the whole government of Church and State ; and therefore that whatever punishment the poor Irish had deserved for their former transgressions, which they have so long since repented of, and departed from the Rebellion when they had armies and strong towns in their hands, and put themselves again under his majesty's protection ; this part of the English, who were possessed of their estates, had broken all their obligations to God and the king, and so could not merit to be gratified with their ruin and total destruction : That it was too evident and notorious to the world, that his majesty's three kingdoms had been very faulty to him, and withdrawn themselves from his government, by which he had been compelled to live in exile so many years ; and yet, that upon their return to their duty and obedience, his majesty had been graciously pleased to grant a free and general pardon, and act of indemnity, in which many were comprehended who had in truth been the contrivers and fomenters of all the misery and desolation which had involved the three nations for so many years ; and therefore they hoped, that when all his majesty's other subjects (as criminal at least as the others) were, by his majesty's clemency, restored to their own estates which they had forfeited, were in full peace, and mirth and joy, the poor Irish alone should not be totally exempt from all his majesty's grace, and left in tears and mourning, and lamentation, and be sacrificed without redemption to the avarice and cruelty of those, who had not only spoiled and oppressed them, but had done all that was in their power, and with all the insolency imaginable, to destroy his majesty himself, and his posterity, and who now return to their obedience, and submitted to his government, when they were no longer able to oppose it ; nor did they yet return to it with that joy and alacrity, and resignation as the Irish did, and desired to do : And so concluded with those pathetical applications and appeals to his majesty, as men well versed in discourses of that nature are accustomed to do.

This discourse carried on, and urged with more passion, vehemence and indiscretion, than was suitable to the condition they were in ; and in which, and the excesses of their rhetoric, they had let fall many expressions very indecent and unwarrantable, and in some of them confidently excused, if not justified their first entrance into rebellion, (the most barbarous, certainly, and unexcusable, that any Christians have been engaged in, in any age,) they irreconciled themselves to many who had compassion enough for them, and gave their immediate adversaries, who stood upon the advantage ground, both provocation and opportunity to say many things to their reproach, which probably would else have been forbore. They enlarged upon all the odious circumstances of the first year's rebellion, the murdering of above a hundred thousand persons in cold blood, and with all the barbarity imaginable ; which murders and barbarities had been always excepted from pardon : and they told them, that if there were not some amongst themselves that then appeared, they were sure there would be many found amongst those for whom they appeared, who would be found guilty of those odious crimes, which were excluded from any benefit by those treaties. And so that first agitation before his majesty vented itself in so much bitterness and animosity on both sides, that his majesty thought it best to conclude it with such reprehensions and animadversions, as might dispose them to a better temper when they should be next admitted to his majesty's presence.

At their next attendance upon his majesty, which was within few days after, the commissioners for the Protestants, taking notice of what the other party had alledged for their defence, the pretence they had to the two acts of pacification, and their extolling their own innocence from that time, and their great affection for his majesty's service, declared, that whatever legal title the adventurers had to the lands they were in possession of, many of whom had always faithfully served the king ; yet they would be content, that all those who had in truth preserved their integrity towards his majesty from the time of either or both the pacifications, and not swerved afterwards from their allegiance, should partake of his majesty's grace and royal bounty, in such a manner, and to such a degree, as his majesty thought fit to exercise towards them : but they were confident they should make it appear, that their pretences to that grace and favour were not founded upon any reasonable title ; that they had never consented to any one act of pacification, to which the indemnity had been annexed, which they had not violated and broken within ten days after, and then returned to all their acts of disloyalty and rebellion ; that after the first act of pacification, ratified by the last king, in very few days after they treated the herald, his majesty's officer, who came to proclaim that peace, with all manner of indignity, tearing his coat of arms, the king's arms, from off his back, and beat and wounded him so, that he was hardly rescued from the loss of his life; that about the same time they endeavoured to surprise and murder the lord lieutenant, and pursued him to Dublin, which they forthwith besieged with their army, under the command of that general who had signed the peace; they imprisoned their commissioners who were authorized by them, for consenting to those articles which themselves had confirmed, and so prosecuted the war with as much asperity as ever; and refused to give that aid and assistance they were obliged to, for the recovery and restoration of his late majesty, who was then in prison at the Isle of Wight; the promise and expectation of which supply and assistance was the sole ground and consideration of that treaty, and of the concessions therein made to them; that they thereupon renounced their obedience to his majesty, and put themselves under the protection and disposal of Rinuccini, the pope's nuncio, whom they made their generalissimo of all their armies, their admiral at sea, and to preside in all their councils. After their divisions amongst themselves, and the burthen of the tyranny they suffered under had disposed them to petition this king, who was then in France, to receive them into his protection, and to send the marquis of Ormond over again into Ireland to command them; and his majesty was so far prevailed with, as to send the marquis of Ormond into Munster, with such a supply of arms and ammunitions as he could procure; where the lord Inchiquin, lord president of that province, with the Protestant army, received and joined with him; and shortly after, the confederate Irish made that second treaty of pacification, of which they now likewise demanded the benefit: but that it is notoriously known, that they no sooner made that treaty than they broke it, in not bringing in those supplies of men and money which they were obliged to do, and the want whereof exposed the lord lieutenant to many difficulties: and he had no sooner undergone the first misfortune before Dublin, than they withdrew from taking any further care of the kingdom, raised scandals upon, and jealousies of the whole body of the English; who being so provoked, would no longer venture themselves in any action or conjunction with the Irish. They caused an assembly or convention of the clergy to meet without the lord lieutenant's authority, and put the government of all things into their hands; who, in a short time, improved the jealousy in the minds of the people towards the few Protestants who yet remained in the army, and who had served the king with all imaginable courage and fidelity, from the very first hour of the rebellion in the three kingdoms, to that degree, that the marquis was even compelled to discharge his own troop of guards of horse, consisting of such officers and gentlemen as are mentioned before; and to trust himself, and all the remaining towns and garrisons, to the fidelity of the Irish; protesting, that upon such a confidence the whole nation would be united, as one man, to his majesty's service, under the command of the said marquis: but they had no sooner received satisfaction in that particular, (which was not in the marquis's power to refuse to give them) but that they raised several calumnies against the marquis himself, and declaimed against his religion, and inhibited the people upon pain of excommunication, not to submit to this or that order enjoined by the marquis; and, upon the matter, inhibited any obedience they paid to him: instead of raising new forces, those that were raised run from their colours and dispersed themselves; they who were trusted with the keeping of towns and forts, either gave them up by treachery to Cromwell, or lost them through cowardice to him upon very feeble attacks: their great general Owen O'Neill had made a formal contract and stipulation with the parliament; and in the end, when they had divested the marquis of all power to oppose the enemy, and gave him great cause to believe his person to be in great danger to be betrayed, and delivered up to the enemy, they vouchsafed to petition him to depart out of the kingdom, which they could easily compel him to do; and that he would leave his majesty's authority in the hands of one of his majesty's Roman Catholic subjects, to whom they promised to submit with the most punctual obedience. Whereupon the marquis, finding that he could not unite them in any one action worthy of the duty of good subjects, or of prudent men towards their own preservation; and, so, that his residence amongst them longer could in no degree contribute to his majesty's service or honour; and that they would make it be believed that if he would have committed the command into the hands of a Roman Catholic, they would have been able to have preserved those towns which still remained in their possession, which were Limerick and Galloway, and some other places of less importance; and likewise by degrees recover from the enemy what had been lost; which was very possible for them to have done, having great bodies of men to perform any enterprize, and some good officers to lead them, if they would have been obedient to any command: whereupon the marquis had resolved to gratify them, in placing the command in such a person's hand, whose zeal for the Catholic religion was unquestionable, and whose fidelity to the king, and entire affection, was unblemished; and so made choice of the marquis of Clanrickard, a name, though of an English extraction, had for so many hundred years resided in that kingdom, and had the greatest fortune amongst them, that he had the reputation of being of the best family of the Irish, and whose family had, in all former rebellions, as well as in this, preserved their loyalty unspotted to the crown.

The Roman Catholics of all kinds pretended at least a wonderful joy at this election, acknowledged it a great obligation to the lord lieutenant for making it, and applied themselves to the other with all protestations of duty and submission, to induce him to accept the charge, who indeed knew them too well to be willing to trust them; yet upon the marquis of Ormond's earnest and solemn intreaty, and out of his great zeal for his majesty's service, and to support his government there, until his majesty could procure other supplies, or give better orders for the doing it, he was contented to receive such commissions from the lord lieutenant, as were necessary for the execution of that command, and preservation of the government. Upon which the marquis of Ormond embarked himself, with some few friends and servants, upon a little pink that was bound for France, where he arrived safely about the time that his majesty transported himself thither, after his miraculous escape from Worcester.

The lord lieutenant was no sooner gone, but that the marquis of Clanrickard, the new lord deputy, found himself no better treated than the lord of Ormond had been: that part of the clergy which had continually opposed the lord lieutenant for being a Protestant, were now as little satisfied with the deputy's religion, and as violently opposed all his desires, and violated their own promises, and quickly made it evident, that his affection and loyalty to the king was that which they disliked, and a crime that could not be weighed down by the undoubted singularity of his religion. They entered into secret correspondence with the enemy, and conspiracies between themselves; and though there were some persons of honour and quality with the deputy, who were very faithful to him and to the king, yet there were so many about him of another alloy, that all his councils, resolutions, and designs, were soon enough discovered to the enemy to be prevented; and though some of the letters were intercepted, and the persons discovered who gave the intelligence, he had not power enough to bring them to justice; but being commonly friars and clergymen, the privilege of the Church was presently insisted upon, and so they were rescued from the secular prosecution till their escape was contrived. That perfidious and treacherous party had so great an interest in all the towns, forts, and garrisons, which yet pretended to be subject to the deputy, that all his orders were still contradicted or neglected; and the enemy no sooner appeared before any place, but some faction in the town caused it to be delivered up and rendered. Nor could this fatal sptishness be reformed even by the severity and rigour which the English exercised upon them; who, by the wonderful judgment of God Almighty, always executed those men who put themselves and the towns into their hands, finding them to have had some barbarous part in the foul murders which had been committed in the beginning of the rebellion, and who had been, by all the acts of grace granted by the several powers, still reserved for justice: and of this kind there were so many instances in and about Limerick and Galloway, that they deserved to be collected and mentioned in a discourse by itself, to observe and magnify the wonderful Providence of God Almighty, in bringing heinous crimes to light and punishment in this world, by means unapprehended by the guilty; insomuch, as there was scarce a person of the clergy or laity, who had had a single hand in the contriving and fomenting the first rebellion, and in the perpetration of those horrible murders, who had obstructed all overtures towards peace, and caused peace to be broken as soon as made; who had adhered to the Nuncio, and endeavoured most maliciously to exclude the king and his royal posterity from the dominions of Ireland; I say, there was scarce a man very notorious, and eminent in transgressions of this kind, who did not by some act of treachery first endeavour to merit from the English, and by that, or by some other means, fell into their hands, and were by them publicly and reproachfully executed and put to death.

This being the sad condition the lord Deputy was in, and the Irish party having, without his leave, and against his express command, taken upon them to send messengers into Flanders to desire the duke of Lorraine to take them into his protection, offering to deliver several important places and sea-towns into his possession, and to become his subjects; upon which invitation the duke sent over an ambassador and a good sum of money for their present relief; the Deputy was in a short time reduced to those straits, that he durst not remain in any town, nor even in his own house for three days together, but was forced for his security to shift from place to place, and sometimes to lodge in the woods and fields in cold and wet nights, by which he contracted those infirmities and diseases which shortly after brought him to his grave; and, in the end, he was compelled to accept a pass from the English, who had a reverence to his person and unspotted reputation, to transport himself into England, where his wife and family were, and where he died before he could procure means to carry himself to the king, which he always intended to do.

When the English commissioners had enlarged themselves with some commotion in this narration and discourse, they again provoked the Irish commissioners to nominate one person amongst themselves, or those for whom they appeared, who they believed could in justice demand his majesty's favour; and if they could not make it evidently appear, that he had forfeited all his title to pardon after the treaties, and that he had again been as faulty to the king as before, they would be very willing he should be made the object of the king's grace and bounty, and be restored to his estate. And then applying themselves to his majesty, with great duty and submission, they con-eluded, that if any persons had, by their subsequent or secret services, or by their attendance upon his majesty, rendered themselves grateful to him, and worthy of his royal favour, they were very willing that his majesty should restore all, or any of them to their honours and estates, in such manner as his majesty in his wisdom should think fit, and against all impediments whatsoever. And hereupon several acts of parliament were passed, for the indemnity and the restoring several persons of honour and interest to their estates; who either in justice could require the same, as having been always faithful to the crown, and suffered with it, and for it; or who had so manifested their affection and duty for his majesty, that he thought fit in that consideration to wipe out the memory of whatsoever had been formerly done amiss: and by this means many were in a short time put into a full possession of their estates, to which they could make a good pretence at the time when the rebellion begun.

The consideration and debate about the settlement of Ireland, upon the bill proposed, took up very many days, his majesty being always present, and in which there arose every day new difficulties. It appeared plainly enough, that the guilt was so general, that if the letter of the act of parliament of the seventeenth year of the late king were strictly pursued, almost an extirpation of the whole nation would follow, and which at best would be very miserable. Then the transplantation, into Conaught, had been acted, and finished so many years before (which was very prudently done in point of government, in respect of the unsteady humour of that people, and their natural inclination to rebel, if the same had been executed by any rules of justice), and the soldiers and adventurers had been likewise so many years in the possession of their lots, and had laid out so much money in building and planting, that if his majesty had reviewed all that had been done, and taken those advantages upon former miscarriages and misapplications as in law he might have done, the whole foundations upon which all the hopes rested of preserving that kingdom within their obedience to the Crown of England must have been shaken, and even dissolved. And then the memory of the beginning of the rebellion in Ireland (how many other rebellions soever had followed it, as bad or worse in respect of the consequences that attended them) was as fresh and as odious to the whole people of England, as it had been the first year; and the whole nation upon the matter (though there were many persons of it of great honour and virtue) was fallen into that contempt, that they seemed indeed in the eyes of Christendom worthy of the miserable fate they were reduced to: and no doubt it was a consideration that reasonably made them thought less worthy of extraordinary favour and compassion, that when both the other nations had made many noble attempts for redeeming their liberty, and for the restoration of his majesty (for Scotland itself had done much towards it), and his present restoration was, by God's blessing, and only with his blessing, the sole effect of the courage and affection of his own subjects; so that England and Scotland had in a great degree redeemed, and even undone what had before been done amiss: and his majesty had approved and secured those affections to them, by those promises and concessions which he was in justice obliged to perform: but the miserable Irish alone had no part in the benefit his majesty had received, nor had God suffered them to be the least instruments in bringing his good pleasure to pass, or to give any testimony of their repentance for the wickedness they had wrought, or of their resolutions to be better subjects for the future; so that they seemed as a people left out and exempted from any benefit from that blessed conjuncture in his majesty's restitution: and this disadvantage was improved towards them by their frequent manifestation of an inveterate animosity against the English nation and English government; which again was recompensed to them by an irreconcilable jealousy of all the English towards them; declaring plainly, that they could be no longer secure of any thing they had, or should have in Ireland, than it should evidently appear that it was not in the power of the Irish to take it from them; and to this conclusion their present confidence and impudence contributed very much: and it appeared plainly enough, that they expected the same concessions (which the necessity of that time had made fit to be granted to them) in respect of their religion, and liberty of conscience, as they called it, should be now likewise confirmed, without which all other graces would not be sufficient to contain them within the limits of subjection. This state and condition of affairs, and the temper of the people, made it very necessary to the king to be very wary in dispensing his ordinary favours (which his natural, merciful inclination prompted him to) to the Irish, and in the alterations which justice obliged him to make in that kingdom, that the manner of it should make it appear, that it was the particular justice in a particular case, which could not be attended with a consequence prejudicial to any general interest.

There appeared in this debate an intention in the soldiers and adventurers, which was to have great countenance and approbation in the bill now under examination, to destroy all intails and settlements at law upon consideration of marriage, or any other contracts which had been made before the rebellion; nor had there been in the whole former proceedings, in the time of the usurpation, any consideration taken of mortgages or debts due by statute or recognizance, or upon any other security; so that all such debts must be either lost to the proprietors, or remain still with the interest upon the land, whosoever had enjoyed the benefit or the profit thereof: All which seemed very unreasonable and unjust; and that such estates should remain forfeited by the treason of the father, who had been only tenant for life, against all descents and legal titles of innocent children, and of which in all legal attainders the crown never had or could receive any benefit. Yet, how unreasonable soever these pretences appeared to be, the rules and directions for the remedy thereof were not very easy; the English declaring, that if such titles were preserved and allowed to be good, there would not in that universal guilt which upon the matter comprehended and covered the whole Irish nation, there would not be one estate forfeited for Treason, but entails and other useful conveyances would be forged to defend and secure the same; nor would there be witnesses wanting to justify and prove whatsoever their evidence could be applied to: And if those trials were to be by the known rules and customs of the law in cases of the like nature, there was too much reason to suspect and fear that there would be little justice done, since a jury of Irish would be sure to find against the English; and there was as much reason to apprehend that the English would bring in their verdict against the Irish, let the evidence on either side be what it would. However, the king was in no degree inclined, upon any suggestions, to countenance such a barefaced violation of the law by any declaration in the act; and after many alterations and amendments, and there remaining still so many difficulties and intricacies, he foresaw that all matters were not yet so clearly stated, that the settlement could be made by this bill; but that such preparations might be made towards it, and such examinations taken, and some particulars settled and adjusted, and what remained stated with more clearness for his majesty's determination, he passed the first act of parliament, and committed the execution thereof to too many commissioners, nominated to his majesty by those who were most conversant in the affairs of Ireland; none, or very few of which were known to his majesty, or to any of those who had been so many years from their country, in their constant attendance upon his majesty's person beyond the seas. And upon this conclusion, and this dispatch, the commissioners from Ireland of all kinds returned thither, the earl of Orrery being one of the three justices who were entrusted with the government.

After a year spent in the execution of this commission, there was very little done towards the settling the kingdom; but, on the contrary, the breaches were made wider, and so much passion and injustice shewed, that complaints were brought to his majesty from all parts of the kingdom, and from all persons in authority. The number of the commissioners were so great, and their interest so different, that they made no dispatch; very many of them were in possession of those lands which others sued for, and bought the broken titles and pretences of others for inconsiderable sums of money, which they supported and made good by their own authority; and those men, who had their own particular concernment chiefly to maintain, attended the service very diligently: The few who were more indifferent, by having no interest of their own at stake, were weary of their attendance and expence (there being no allowance for their pains,) and offended at the partiality and injustice they saw practised, withdrew themselves, and would be no longer present at those transactions, which they could not regulate or reform: All interests were equally offended and incensed; and the soldiers and adventurers complained no less of the corruption and injustice than the Irish did; so that the lords justices and council found it necessary to transmit another bill to his majesty, which, as I remember, they called an explanatory bill of the former; by which they had provided, That no person who lived in Ireland, or had any pretence to an estate there, should be employed as a commissioner: but that his majesty should be desired to send over a competent number of well-qualified persons out of England to attend that service; upon whom a fit salary should be settled by the bill, and such rules set down as might direct and govern the manner of their proceedings; an oath being likewise included in the bill which the commissioners were to take for the impartial administration of justice. And for the prosecution of this new transmitted act, several persons were sent over to attend, and inform his majesty and the council upon any difficulties or scruples that might arise upon the several claims and pretences which were made.

The second act took as much time as the former; all that had been said in the former debates being again repeated, and almost with the same passion and impertinence; the Irish making large observations upon the proceedings of the late commissioners, to justify those fears and apprehensions they had formerly urged. And there is too much reason to believe, that their greatest design now was rather to keep off any settlement, than that they hoped to procure such a one as they desired; relying more to find their account from a general dissatisfaction, and the distraction and confusion which was like to attend it, than from any determination that was like to be given in their favour: Which yet they did not despair of, as well by some promises their friends at court had made to them, upon great promises made first by them, as well as for the prejudice they found was generally conceived against some of the soldiers, and many of the adventurers, who were like to gain most upon the division. And though the Irish were in general dread and detestation for the reasons aforesaid; yet there were many particular men, both of the soldiers and adventurers, who, in respect of many notorious and opprobrious actions against the crown throughout their whole employment, were as little satisfied with this revolution as any men could be, and were so universally odious both in England and Ireland, that if the king's justice could have been observed, and their particular cases severed from the rest, without violation of the rule which secured the rest, any thing that could have been done to their detriment would have been grateful enough. However, after a very tedious debate his majesty being assured by those who were thought to understand Ireland very exactly, and, upon the surveys which had been taken of Ireland with great punctuality, undertook that there was land enough to satisfy all the soldiers and adventurers, and that there would be enough left for the accommodation of the Irish in a liberal proportion; and having given some rules likewise and limitations to the immoderate pretences and demands of the soldiers and adventurers upon the Dublin ordinance, and imperfect admeasurements and some other irregularities which in the execution of the former commission they had indulged to themselves, his majesty likewise dispatched the second bill.

Whilst this second bill was under deliberation, there fell out some accidents which produced great altercations with reference to the affairs of that kingdom: the earl of Montroth who was one of the justices, was lately dead; and it had been very apparent that whilst he was alive, the difference between the three justices, and their different humours and affections, had little advanced the settling the government; so that they who took the most impartial survey of all that was done, did conclude that nothing could be so reasonably done towards a settlement, as the deputing one single person to exercise that government; and the duke of Albemarle himself, who had a very considerable estate in that kingdom, which made him long for a settlement, and who had both before the king's return, and ever since passionately insisted that the duke of Ormond should not be employed there; who likewise had as great an aversion from the thought of it; I say, the general now had so totally changed his mind, that he told the king, that there was no way to explicate the kingdom out of those intricacies in which it was involved but by sending over a lord lieutenant thither, that he thought it not fit for his majesty's service that himself, who had the commission of lord lieutenant, should be absent from his majesty's person; and therefore that he was very ready and desirous to give up his commission; and that in his judgment nobody would be able to settle and compose the several factions in that kingdom but the duke of Ormond, which he thought would be very grateful to all sorts of people; and therefore his positive advice was, that his majesty would as soon as was possible grant his commission of lieutenancy to him, and send him over into Ireland; and both the king and the general had spoken with the duke of Ormond, and prevailed with him to accept the charge, before ever I heard of it; all of them believing that the uncertainty of his being able to do the king service, in so general a disunion and jealousy of persons, and contradiction of interests, and the great affection and friendship I had for the duke of Ormond, would make me dissuade him from exposing himself to so hazardous an undertaking; which was very true: but his majesty believing that it was very necessary for his service, and the duke having always resigned himself to his majesty's disposal, he cheerfully undertook the employment; and his majesty named and appointed sir Richard Rainsford, serjeant at law, (since made one of the barons of his majesty's exchequer at Westminster) sir Edward Smith, one of the benchers of the Middle-Temple, (afterwards made Chief Justice of his majesty's court of Common Pleas in Ireland) Henry Coventry, one of his majesty's bed-chamber, sir Winstan Churchill, colonel Edward Cooke, sir Edward Deering, and sir Tho. Beverly, all persons of very good parts and very clear reputations, to be his commissioners for the execution of the bill of settlement of Ireland: and with these, and all other persons who attended that interest, the duke of Ormond entered upon his journey for that kingdom about July or August in the year 1664, full four years after the king's happy return into England. And when Mr. Coventry shortly after procured his majesty's leave to return to his attendance upon his person, sir Allen Broderic was appointed to serve in his place as a commissioner.

It was some months before the commissioners, after their arrival in Ireland, could settle those orders and rules for their proceeding which were necessary before they appointed the people to attend: and it was as necessary that they should, in the order of their proceedings, first proceed upon the Irish; both because there should be no settlement of soldiers or adventurers in possession of any lands, before the title of the Irish was determined; and because there was a clause in the last act of parliament, that all the Irish should put in their claims by such a day, and be determined before such a time, which time might be prolonged for once by the lord lieutenant and council. So that the delay for so many months before the commissioners sat, gave great argument of complaint to the Irish; though it could not possibly be avoided, in regard that the commissioners themselves had not been nominated by the king above twenty days before they began their journey for Ireland: so that they could never so much as read over the acts of parliament together before they came to Dublin, and then they found so many difficult clauses in both acts of parliament and so contrary to each other, that it was no easy matter to determine how to govern themselves in point of right, and to reduce themselves to any method in their proceedings: but after they had adjusted all things as well as they could, they published their orders in what method they meant to proceed, and appointed the Irish to put in their claims by such a time and to attend the prosecution of them accordingly. And they had no sooner entered upon their work but the English thought they had begun it soon enough; for they heard every day many of the Irish, who had been known to be the most forward in the first beginning of the rebellion, and the most malicious in carrying it on, declared innocent; and deeds of settlement and entails, which had been never heard of before and which would have been produced (as they reasonably believed) before, the former commissioners, if they had had them to produce, now declared good and valid; by which the Irish were immediately put into possession of a very great quantity of land taken from the English: So that in a short time the commissioners had rendered themselves as generally odious as the Irish, and were looked upon as persons corrupted for that interest, which had every day success almost in whatsoever they pretended; and their determinations happened to have the more of prejudice upon them, because the commissioners were always divided in their judgments; and it is no wonder that they who seemed most to adhere to the English interest were most esteemed by them.

The parliament in Ireland was then sitting, and the House of Commons (consisting of very many members who were either soldiers or adventurers, or had the like interest) was very much offended at the proceedings of the commissioners, made many votes against them, and threatened them with their authority and jurisdiction: but the commissioners, who well knew their own power, and that there was no appeal against their judgments, proceeded still in their own method, and continued to receive the claims of the Irish beyond the time that the act of parliament or the act of state limited to them as was generally understood; and during their last eight or ten days sittings upon those claims, they passed more judgments and determinations than in near a year before, indeed with wonderful expedition; when the English, who were dispossessed by those judgments, had not their witnesses ready, presuming that in point of time those causes could not have been heard. By these sentences and decrees, many hundred thousand of acres were adjudged to the Irish, which had been looked upon as unquestionably forfeited. This raised so great a clamour that the English refused to yield possession upon the decrees of the commissioners, who, by an omission in the act of parliament, were not qualified with power enough to provide for the execution of their own sentences: The courts of law established in that kingdom would not, nor indeed could, give any assistance to the commissioners; and the lord-lieutenant and council, who had, in the beginning, by their authority, put many of those into possession of those lands which the commissioners had decreed to them, were now more tender and reserved in that multitude of decrees which had lately passed: so that the Irish were using their utmost endeavours by force to recover the possession of those lands which the commissioners had decreed to them, whilst the English were likewise resolved by force to defend what they had been so long possessed of, notwithstanding the commissioners determination; and the commissioners themselves were so far troubled and dissatisfied with these proceedings, and with some intricate clauses in the act of parliament concerning the future prosecution of that affair, that though they had not yet made any entrance upon the decision of the claims of the English, or of the Irish Protestants, they declared that they would proceed no further upon the execution of their commission, until they could receive his majesty's pleasure; and for the better doing thereof, they desired his majesty's leave that they might attend his royal person; and there being at the same time several complaints made against them to his majesty, and appeals made to him from their decrees, his majesty gave the commissioners leave to return; and at the same time all the other interests sent their deputies to solicit their right: in the prosecution whereof, after much time spent, the king likewise thought fit to receive the advice and assistance of his lieutenant; and so the Duke of Ormond likewise attended his majesty, and the settlement of Ireland was the third time brought before his majesty and his council; there being then likewise transmitted a third bill, as additional and supplemental to the other two, and to reverse many of the decrees made by the commissioners, they bearing the reproach of all that had been done, or had succeeded amiss, and of all persons who were grieved of any kind soever.

The king was very tender of the reputation of his commissioners, who had been always esteemed men of great probity, and unquestionable reputation; and though he could not refuse to receive complaints, yet he gave those who complained no farther countenance, than to give the others opportunity to vindicate themselves; nor did there appear the least evidence to question the sincerity of their proceedings, or to make them liable to any reasonable suspicion of corruption; and the complaints were still prosecuted by those who had that taken from them which they desired to have kept for themselves. The truth is, there is reason enough to believe, that upon the first arrival of the commissioners in Ireland, and some conversation they had, and the observation they made of the great bitterness and animosity from the English, both soldiers and adventurers, towards the whole Irish nation, of what kind soever; the scandalous proceeding of the late commissioners upon the first act, where they had not been guided by any rules of justice, but rejecting all evidence which might operate to the taking any thing from them which they resolved to keep, the judges themselves being both parties and witnesses in all the causes brought before them; together with the very ill reputation very many of the soldiers and adventurers had for extraordinary malice to the crown, and to the royal family; and the notable barbarity they had exercised towards the Irish, who, without doubt, for many years had undergone the most cruel oppressions of all kinds that can be imagined, many thousands of them having been forced, without being covered under any house to perish in the open fields for hunger;

the infamous purchases which had been made by many persons, who had compelled the Irish to sell their remainders and lawful pretences, for very inconsiderable sums of money: I say these, and many other particulars of this kind, together with some attempts that had been made upon their first arrival, to corrupt them, against all pretences which should be made by the Irish, might probably dispose the commissioners themselves to such a prejudice against many of the English, and to such a compassion towards the Irish, that they might be too much inclined to favour their pretences and claims; and to believe that the peace of the kingdom and his majesty's government might be better provided for, by their being settled in the lands of which they had been formerly possessed, than by supporting the ill gotten titles of those who had manifested all imaginable infidelity and malice against his majesty, whilst they had any power to oppose him; and had not given any testimony of their conversion, or of their resolution to yield him for the future a perfect and entire obedience when they could oppose him no longer; as if they desired only to retain those lands they had gotten by rebellion, together with the principles upon which they had received them, until they should have an opportunity to justify both by some new power or concurrence amongst themselves. Whence-soever it proceeded, it was plain enough the Irish had received more favour than was expected or imagined; and in the very entrance into the work, to avoid the partiality which was too apparent in the English towards each other, and their animosity against the Irish, as evident, very strict rules had been set down by the Commissioners, what kind of evidence they would admit to be good, and receive accordingly; and it was provided, that the evidence of no soldier or adventurer should be received in any case, to which himself was never so much a stranger; as, if his own lot had fallen in Munster, and that he had no pretence to any thing out of that province, his evidence should not be received as to any thing that he had seen done in Lempster, or Connaught, or Ulster, wherein he was not at all concerned; which was thought to be a very unjust rule, after so many years expired, and so many persons dead, who had likewise been present at those actions: and by this means many persons were declared not to have been in rebellion, when there was full evidence that they had been present in such and such a battle, and in such and such a siege, if the witnesses might have been received, who were then present at those actions, and ready to give testimony of it, and of such circumstances as could not be feigned, if their evidence might have been received. That which raised the greatest unpopularity against the Commissioners was, that a great number of the most infamous persons of the Irish nation, who were looked upon by those of their own country with the greatest detestation, as men who had been the most violent fomenters and prosecutors of the rebellion, and the greatest opposers of all moderate counsels, and of all expedients which might have contributed towards a peace in the late king's time, whereby the nation might have been redeemed, and who had not had the confidence so much as to offer any claim before the late Commissioners, were now adjudged and declared innocents, and so restored to their estates; and that many others, who had in truth never been in rebellion, but notoriously served the king against the rebels, both in England and in Ireland, and had never been put out of the possession of their estates, were now upon some slight evidence, by the interception of letters, or confession of messengers that they had some correspondence with the rebels, though it was evident, that even that correspondence was perfunctory, and only to secure them that they might pursue his majesty's service, were condemned, and had their estates taken away from them. Many who had formerly made their claims, without insisting upon any deeds of settlements or other conveyances in law, now produced formal settlements, in consideration of marriage, or other like good considerations in law, made before the beginning of the Rebellion; which being now proved by witnesses enough, decrees were every day obtained for the restitution of great quantities of land upon those deeds and conveyances: though the forgeries of those deeds, and perjuries of the witnesses, were very notorious, and some instances were given of the manifestation and direct proof made of the forgery of deeds, upon which decrees had been made, to the satisfaction of the commissioners themselves, within a very short time after the pronouncing such decrees, and yet no reparation was given, but the said decrees proceeded and were executed, with all rigour. The Commissioners answered, That they had made no decrees but according to their consciences, and such as they were obliged to make by the course and rules of justice; that they did not doubt, but in truth did believe, that there had been evil practices used, both in forging of deeds and corrupting of witnesses, and that the same was equally practised by the English as well as the Irish; and therefore that they had been obliged to make that order which had been so much excepted against, not to admit the testimony of any English adventurer or soldier in the case of another adventurer or soldier: for that it was very notorious they looked upon the whole as one joint interest, and so gratified each other in their testimonies: and of this they gave many sad instances, by which it was too evident, that the perjuries were mutual, and too much entertained by the one and the other side: that they had used the best providence and vigilance they could, by the careful examination of the witnesses, which were produced apart, and never in the presence of each other, and by asking them all such material questions as occurred to their understandings, and which they could not expect to be asked, to discover the truth, and to prevent and manifest all perjury : That they had likewise used their utmost diligence and care to prevent their being imposed upon with false and forged deeds and conveyances by taking a precise and strict view themselves of all deeds produced ; and interrogated the witnesses with all the cunning they could, upon the matter and consideration upon which such deeds had been entered into, and upon the manner and circumstances in the execution thereof ; which was all the providence they could use ; and though they met with many reasons oftentimes to doubt the integrity of the proceedings, and in their own private consciences to apprehend there might be great corruption, yet that they were obliged judicially to determine according to the testimony of those witnesses, and the evidence of those deeds in law, against which no proofs were made : That they had constantly heard all that the adverse party thought fit to object, both against the credit of any witnesses, and the truth of any conveyances which were produced : upon which they had rejected many witnesses, and disallowed some conveyances : but when the objections were only founded upon presumptions and probabilities, as most usually they were, they could not weigh down the full and categorical evidence that was given : That if they had yielded to the importunities of the persons concerned, who oftentimes pressed to have further time given them to prove such a perjury, or to disprove such a conveyance, it must have made their work endless, and stopped all manner of proceedings, for which it appeared that they were streightened too much in time, and that in truth would have but opened the doors wider for perjury and other corruptions ; since it was very plain to them, that either side could bring as many witnesses as they pleased, to prove what they pleased, and that they would bring as many as they believed necessary for the work in hand : And therefore that the commissioners having before prescribed a method and rules to themselves for their proceeding, and that no man could have a cause in which he was concerned brought to hearing without his knowing when it was to be so heard, and so it was to be presumed that he was well provided to support his own title ; and therefore that they had thought fit, upon mature deliberation amongst themselves, to adhere to the order they had prescribed to themselves and others, and to conclude that they could not be able to prove that at another day, which they were not to prove then : For the discovery of any forgery after the decrees had been passed, and upon which they had given no reparation, they confessed some few such discoveries had been made to them, by which the forgery appeared very clearly ; but as they had not power by the act of parliament to punish either forgery or perjury, but must leave the examination and punishment thereof to the law, and to the judges of the law ; so that they had only authority to make decrees upon such grounds as satisfied them in their consciences, but had not any authority to reverse those decrees after they were once made and published, upon any evidence whatsoever. They concluded with their humble desire to the king, that the strictest examination might be made of their corruptions, in which they were sure to be found very innocent, against all the malice that was discovered against them : That they had proceeded in all things according to the integrity of their own hearts, and the best of their understandings ; and if they had, through the defect of that, erred in any part of their determinations, they hoped their want of wisdom should not be imputed to them as a crime.

Many who had a very good opinion of the persons and abilities of the commissioners, were not yet satisfied with their defence ; nor did they believe that they were so strictly bound to judge upon the deposition of suspected witnesses : But that they were therefore trusted with an arbitrary power, because it was foreseen that juries would not have been intire ; so that they were, upon weighing all circumstances, to declare what in their consciences they believed to be true and just : That if they had bound themselves up by too strict and unreasonable rules, that they should rather have in time reformed those rules, than thought to support what was done amiss, by the observation of what they had prescribed to themselves ; and it was believed that the entire exclusion of the English from the proving of what could not in nature be otherwise proved, was not just or reasonable : That their want of power to reverse or alter their own decrees, upon any emergent reasons which could afterwards occur, was a just ground for their serious deliberation in and before they passed any such decrees ; and their excuse for not granting longer time, when it was pressed for, upon reasons which were very visible, was not to be justified, it not being possible for any man to defend himself against the claims of the Irish, without knowing what deeds or witnesses they would produce for making good their suggestions ; and therefore it was as impossible for them to have all their evidence upon the place : besides that, it was very evident, that in their last ten days of their sitting (which were likewise thought to be when their power as to those particulars was determined, and in which they had made more decrees than in all the time before) they had made so many in a day (contrary to their former rule and method), that men were plainly surprized, and could not produce those proofs which in a very short time they might have been supplied with ; and the refusing to allow them that time, was upon the matter to determine their interest, and take away their estates, without being once heard, and upon the bare allegations of their adversaries ; and in those latter decrees many instances were given of that nature, wherein the evidence appeared to be very full, if time had been given to produce it.

There was one very notable case decreed by the Commissioners extremely complained of, and cried out upon by all parties, as well Irish as English; and for which the Commissioners themselves made no other excuse or defence but the receipt of a letter from the king; which was not thought a good excuse for sworn judges, as the Commissioners were: It was the case of the marquis of Antrim; which case having been so much upon the stage, and so much enlarged upon, to the reproach of the king, and even to the traducing of the memory of his blessed father; and some men, who most contributed to what was unwarily done in that affair, having done all they could to wound my reputation, and to get it to be believed, that I misled his majesty, by my advice, to oblige that marquis; I think it a debt due to truth, and to the honour of both their majesties, as well as for my own vindication, to set down a very particular narration of that whole affair; by which it will appear how far the king was from so much as wishing that any thing should be done for the benefit of the marquis, which should be contrary to the rules of justice. Whilst his majesty was in foreign parts, he received frequent advertisements from England and from Ireland, that the marquis of Antrim behaved himself very undutifully to him; that he had made himself very grateful to the rebels, by calumniating the late king; and that he had given it under his hand to Ireton, or some other principal person employed under Cromwell, that his late majesty had sent him into Ireland to join with the rebels, and that he was not offended with the Irish for entering into that rebellion. Which was a calumny so false and so odious, and reflected so much upon the honour of his majesty, that the king was long resolved, as soon as God should put it into his power, to cause the strictest examination to be taken concerning it: the report having gained much credit with his majesty, by the notoriety that the marquis had procured great recommendations from those who governed in Ireland to those who governed in England; and that upon the presumption of that he had come into England, and as far as St. Albans towards London; from whence he was forced suddenly to return into Ireland by the activity of his many creditors, who, upon the news of his coming, had provided for his reception, and would unavoidably have cast him into prison; and no recommendation could have inclined those who were in authority to do any thing extraordinary for the protection of a person, who from the beginning of the Irish rebellion lay under so ill a character with them, and had so ill a name throughout the kingdom.

The king had been very few days in London, after his arrival from the parts beyond the seas, when he was informed that the marquis of Antrim was upon his way from Ireland towards the court; and the Commissioners from Ireland, who have been mentioned before, were the first (if I remember well) who gave his majesty that information; and at the same time told him all that his majesty had heard before concerning the marquis, and of the bold calumnies with which he had traduced his royal father, with many other particulars; all which they affirmed would be proved by unquestionable evidence, and by letters and certificates under his own hand. Upon this full information (of the truth whereof his majesty entertained no doubt), as soon as the marquis came to town, he was, by the king's special order, committed to the Tower; nor could any petition from him, or intreaty of his friends (of which he had some very powerful) prevail with his majesty to admit him into his presence; but by the first opportunity he was sent prisoner to Dublin, where he was committed to the castle, his majesty having given direction that he should be proceeded against with all strictness according to law; and to that purpose the lords justices were required to give all orders and directions necessary. The marquis still professed his innocence, and used all the means he could to procure that he might be speedily brought to his trial, which the king likewise expected; but after a year's detention in prison, and nothing brought against him, he was set at liberty, and had a pass given him by the council there to come into England. He then applied himself to his majesty, demanding nothing of favour; but expected justice, and that after so many years being deprived of his estate, he might at last be restored to it, if nothing could be objected against him wherein he had diserved his majesty. He was a gentleman that from his youth had been bred up in the court of England; and having married the duchess of Buckingham, he had been very well received by both their majesties, and was frequently in their presence; he had spent a very vast estate in the court, without ever having received the least benefit or advantage from it; he had retired into Ireland, and lived upon his own estate in that country some years before the rebellion broke out; in the beginning whereof he underwent some suspicion, having had some correspondence with them, and possibly made some undertakings to them; but he went speedily to Dublin, and from thence transported himself to Oxford to his majesty, to whom he gave so good an account of all that had passed, that the king had no doubt of his affection to his service, though he had little confidence in his judgment and understanding, which were never very remarkable: Besides that, it was well known that he had a very unreasonable envy towards the marquis of Ormond, and would fain have it believed that his interest in Ireland was so great, that he could easily reclaim that whole nation to his majesty's obedience; but that vanity and presumption never gained the least credit with his majesty.

Upon the Scots entering into England with their army upon the obligation of their covenant, and all his majesty's endeavours to prevent it being disappointed, the marquis of Montross had proposed to his majesty to make a journey privately into Scotland, and to get into the Highlands; where, with his majesty's authority, he hoped he should be able to draw together such a body of men as might give his countrymen cause to call for their own army out of England to secure themselves; and with this overture, or upon the debate thereof, that earl of Antrim (for he was then no more) might he likewise sent into Ulster, where his interest lay, from whence he would be able to transport a body of men into the Highlands, where he had likewise the clan of the Macdonalds, who acknowledged him to be their chief, and would be consequently at his devotion; by which means the marquis of Montross would be enabled the more powerfully to proceed in his undertaking. The earl of Antrim entered upon his undertaking with great alacrity, and undertook to the king to perform great matters in Scotland, to which his own interest and animosity enough disposed him, having an old and sharp controversy and contestation with the earl of Argyll, who had dispossessed him of a large territory there. All things being adjusted for this undertaking, and his majesty being well pleased with the cheerfulness of the Earl's undertaking, he created him at that time a marquis, gave him letters to the marquis of Ormond, his lieutenant there, as well to satisfy him of the good opinion he had of the marquis of Antrim, and of the trust he had reposed in him, as to wish him to give him all the assistance he could with convenience for the carrying on that expedition for Scotland; and for the better preventing any inconvenience that might fall out by the rashness and inadvertency of the marquis towards the marquis of Ormond, his majesty sent Daniel O'Neil, one of his bed-chamber, into Ireland with him, who had great power over him, and very much credit with the marquis of Ormond, and was a man of that address and dexterity, that no man could so well prevent the inconveniences and prejudice which his natural indiscretion and levity might tempt the marquis to, or more dispose and incline the lord lieutenant to take little notice of those vanities and indiscretions; and the king did likewise, having no desire that the marquis should stay long in Dublin, and he promising at his going from Oxford, that he would in person go into Scotland with his forces, give him leave to hold that correspondence with the Irish rebels (who had the command of the most Northern parts, and without whose connivance at least he would very hardly be able to make his levies, and transport his men) as was necessary to that end: Within the limits of which it is probable enough that he did not contain himself, and might say many things which he had not the least authority to warrant him in.

Upon his coming to Dublin, the lord-lieutenant gave him all the countenance he could wish, and assisted him in all the ways he could to prosecute his design; but the men were to be raised in or near the rebels quarters: And it cannot be denied but that the levies he made, and sent over into Scotland, under the command of Kalketo, was the foundation of all those wonderful acts which were afterwards performed by the marquis of Montross; they were 1,500 very good men, with very good officers, all so hardy, that neither the ill fare, nor the ill lodging in the Highlands gave them any discouragement, and gave the first reputation to the marquis of Montross of being at the head of an army, under which he drew together such of the Highlanders, and others of his friends who were willing to repair to him; but upon any military action and defeat given by them to the enemy, which happened as often as they encountered the Scots, they went always home with their booty to their houses, and the Irish only staid together with their general. And from this beginning the marquis of Montross grew to that power, that after many battles won by him with notable slaughters of the enemy, in one of which he defeated the marquis of Argyle, with his army of above treble the number of what Montross had, and in which the marquis of Argyle was forced to make his escape, by putting himself almost single into a boat, and so putting himself off into the sea, having left, besides others, many of his own name and family dead upon the ground; after which the marquis of Montross marched victoriously with his army, till he made himself master of Edinburgh, and redeemed out of the prison there the earl of Crawford, lord Ogilby, and many others of his friends, who had been taken and sent thither, with the resolution that they should all lose their heads; and the marquis of Montross himself did always acknowledge, that the rise of his good success was due and to be imputed to that body of Irish, which had in the beginning been sent over by the marquis of Antrim; to whom the king had acknowledged the service by several letters all in his own hand, in which were very gracious expressions of the sense his majesty had of his great services, and his resolution to reward him. It is true, the marquis of Antrim himself had not gone over with his men, as he promised to do, but stayed behind in Ireland, under pretence of raising a greater body of men, with which he would venture his own person; but either out of jealousy or displeasure against the marquis of Montross, or having, in truth, no mind to that service, he never pursued the one nor the other, but remained not only in the enemies quarters, but in their councils, taking all occasions to cross whatsoever the lord-lieutenant most desired; by which he gave so great advantages against himself, and might, in strictness of law, have been as severely punished by the king as the worst of the rebels. At last, after he had been taken prisoner by the English or Scotch, and made his escape out of their hands, he transported himself into Flanders, and from thence came into the West into the harbour of Falmouth, when the prince (his majesty that now is) was in Cornwall; to whom he immediately made tender of his service with two good frigates which he had, and in which were likewise a quantity of arms, and some ammunition, which he had procured in Flanders, for the supply of Ireland. Most of the arms and ammunition were employed, with his consent, for supplying of the troops and garrisons in Cornwall; and his majesty made use of one of the frigates to transport his person to Scilly, and from thence to Jersey; without which convenience, the prince had been exposed to very great difficulties. And after all which, Dublin being given up to the parliament, and the king's authority withdrawn from that kingdom, he again transported himself into Ireland, and joined with the Irish, and was by them sent into France, to desire the queen-mother and the prince to send the marquis of Ormond to exercise his majesty's government in that kingdom; which was done accordingly, in the manner as is mentioned before.

The marquis of Antrim alleged all these particulars, and produced many original letters from the late king, the queen-mother and the prince, in all which his services had been acknowledged, and many promises made to him; and concluded with a full protestation, that he desired no pardon for any thing he had ever done against the king; but if that there was the least proof that he had failed in his fidelity to him, or had not, according to the best of his understanding, advanced his service, he looked for no favour: But if his being in the Irish quarters, and consulting with them, without which he could not have made his levies for Scotland, and his joining with them afterwards, when his majesty's authority was withdrawn from thence, do, by the strict letter of the law, expose him to ruin without his majesty's grace and favour, he did hope his majesty would redeem him from that misery, and that the forfeiture of his estate should not be taken, as if he were a traitor and a rebel to the king: And it appeared, that if he were restored to all he could pretend, his debts were so great, and his creditors had that legal incumbrance upon his fortune, that his condition, at best, would not be liable to much envy. Though the king had never been taken notice of to have any great inclination to the marquis, who was very little known to him; yet this representation, and clear view of what he had done, and what he had suffered, raised great compassion towards him in his majesty's royal breast; and he thought it would, in some degree, reflect upon his own honour and justice, and upon the memory of his blessed father, if, in a time when he passed by so many heinous transgressions, he should leave the marquis to the fury of his enemies, for no other crime upon the matter, than for not having that prudence and justice in his endeavours to serve the king, as he ought to have had; and the rigour he had exercised towards him upon his first arrival, in sending him to be tried in Ireland by those who enough wished his destruction, and that they had not been able to make the least proof against him, improved his majesty's good disposition towards him: Yet he refused positively to write a letter to the commissioners on his behalf, which the marquis most importunately desired, as the only thing that could do him good; but his majesty directed a letter to be prepared to the lord lieutenant, in which all his allegations and suggestions should be set down, and the truth thereof examined by the lord lieutenant; and that if he should be found to have committed no greater faults against his majesty than those which he confessed, that then the letter should be sent to the Commissioners, that they might see both their majesties testimonies in such particulars as were known to themselves. And this letter was very warily drawn, and being approved by his majesty, was sent accordingly to the lord lieutenant; and shortly after was, contrary to his majesty's resolution, and contrary to my advice, and without my knowledge and privity, likewise sent to the commissioners; who had thereupon made such a decree as is before mentioned, and declared that they had made it only upon that ground: Which gave his majesty some trouble, and obliged him to insert a clause in the next bill concerning that affair. And this was the whole proceeding that related to the marquis of Antrim, in which I had no temptation of any kind to incline me; and I do yet want understanding to comprehend how there was more favour shewed towards him by his majesty, than he might in truth very reasonably pretend to, what noise soever hath been raised, and what glosses soever have been made upon that whole transaction.

When his majesty entered upon the debate of this third bill, which was transmitted to him for a supplement and addition to the former two, he quickly found the settlement proposed, and which was the end of the three bills, was now grown more difficult than ever: All the measures which had formerly been taken, from the great proportion of land which would remain to be disposed of, were no more to be relied upon, but appeared to have been a wrong foundation from the beginning; which was now made more desperate, by the vast proportion which had been assigned to the Irish by the commissioners decrees; and somewhat had intervened by some acts of bounty from his majesty, which had not been carefully enough watched and represented to him. The king had, upon passing the former bills, and upon discerning how much the Irish were like to suffer, resolved to retain all that should by forfeiture, or otherwise, come to his majesty, in his own power, to the end, that when the settlement should be made, he might be able to gratify those of the Irish nation, who had had any thing of merit towards him, or been least faulty; but he had unawares swerved from that rule, and had made several grants, out of his royal bounty, to many of his servants, who had been encouraged by their friends in Ireland to make those suits, and had procured certificates from thence: which being produced to his majesty, had disposed him to those concessions, which otherwise he would not so easily have passed: There was besides, in all such grants, a new clause introduced, of a very new nature; for they being grounded always upon letters out of England, and passed under the Great Seal of Ireland, the letters were formed there, and transmitted hither only for his majesty's sign manual; so that neither his majesty's learned counsel at law, nor any other his ministers (the secretaries only excepted) had any notice of such grants. The clause was, That if any of those lands so granted by his majesty should be otherwise decreed, his majesty's grantee should be reprimed on our lands; so that many cases the greatest inducement to his majesty's bounty being the uncertainty of his own right, which the person to whom it was granted was obliged to vindicate at his own charge, his majesty was now bound to make it good if his grant was not valid; and so that which was but a contingent bounty, was turned into a real and substantial benefit, as a debt from his majesty: Which created another difficulty in the settlement; which was yet more hard, because there were many claims of the Irish themselves yet unheard, all the false admeasurements to be examined, and many other uncertainties to be determined by the commissioners, which left those who were in possession, as well as those who were not, in the highest insecurity and apprehension.

This intricacy, and even despair, which possessed all kind of people, of any settlement, made all of them willing to contribute to any that could be proposed. They found his majesty very unwilling to consent to the repeal of the decrees made by the Commissioners; which must have taken away the confidence and assurance of whatsoever should be done hereafter, by making men see that what was settled by one act of parliament might be unsettled by another; so that there was no hope by such an expedient to increase the number of acres, which being left might in any degree comply with the several pretences: The Irish found that they might only be able to obstruct any settlement, but should never be able to get such a one as would turn to their own satisfaction: The soldiers and adventurers agreed less among themselves; and the clamour was as great against those, who, by false admeasurements had got more than they should have, as from those, who had received less than their due; and they who least feared any new examination could not yet have any secure title, before all the rest were settled. In a word, all men found that any settlement would be better than none; and that more profit would arise from a smaller proportion of land, quietly possessed, and husbanded accordingly, than of a much greater proportion under a doubtful title, and an uncertainty which must dishearten any industry and improvement. Upon these considerations and motives they met amongst themselves, and debated together by what expedient they might draw light out of this darkness: There appeared only one way which administered any reasonable hope, which was, by increasing the stock for reprisals to such a degree, that all men's pretences might, in some measure, be provided for; and there was no other way to arrive to this, but by every man's parting with somewhat which he thought his own: And to this they had one encouragement, which was of the highest importance to them, which was, that this way an end would be put to the unlimited jurisdiction of the Commissioners, (which was very terrible to them) who from henceforth would have little other power than to execute what should be here agreed upon. In conclusion, they brought a proposition to the king, raised and digested between themselves, that all persons who were to receive any benefit by this act, should abate and give a fourth part of what he had towards the stock for reprisals; all which the Commissioners should distribute amongst those Irish who should appear most fit for his majesty's bounty; and this agreement was so unanimous, that though it met with some obstinate opposition after it was brought before his majesty, yet the number of the opposers was so small in respect of the others who agreed to it, that they grew weary and ashamed of farther contention; and thereupon that third Act of Settlement, as supplemental to the other two, was consented to by the king: who, to publish to the world that nothing stuck with him which seemed to reflect upon the Commissioners to their prejudice, resolved to make no change; and so, though Mr. Baron Rainsford, and sir Thomas Beverly, made their humble suit to his majesty, that they might not return again into Ireland, his majesty did not grant their request, and continued sir Edward Smith, who was now Chief Justice of the Common Pleas in that kingdom, sir Edward Deering, sir Allen Broderick, (who had succeeded Mr. Coventry in that office, when he returned to court) sir Winstan Churchill and col. Cooke his Commissioners, to execute what was done by this new act, and so to perfect the settlement. These were all the transactions with reference to Ireland, which I was privy to, and in which I assisted, as all the rest of my lords of the council who were present did; and did very little more in it than any of the rest did, except when any difficulties occurred in their private meetings and debates, they sometimes resorted to me for advice; which I was very ready to give them to the best of my understanding, being very ready and willing to take any pains which might make that very difficult work more easy to be compassed; but as I never deserved any reward for so doing, so I never received the benefit of one shilling in money, or moniesworth, for any thing that was done in that affair; and was so far from entertaining any overture made to that purpose, that it is notoriously known to some persons of honour, who, I presume, will be ready to testify the same, that when, upon his majesty's first return into England, some propositions were made to me, of receiving the grant of some forfeited lands, and for the buying of other lands there, upon the desire of the owners thereof, and at so low a price, that the very profit of the land would in a short time have paid for the purchase; and other overtures of immediate benefit in money, which others did, and lawfully might accept; I rejected all propositions of that kind, or relating to it, and declared publicly and privately, that I would neither have lands in Ireland, or the least benefit from thence, till all differences and pretences there were so fully agreed and settled, that there could be no more appeal to the king, or repairing to his majesty and council for justice; in which I told them, I should never be thought so competent an adviser, after I had any title of my own in that kingdom, to bias my inclinations; and I never took a firmer resolution in any particular in my life, than to adhere to that conclusion: Yet, because it is notorious enough, that I did receive afterwards some money out of Ireland, and have a very lawful title to receive more, it is necessary, for my own entire vindication, to set down particularly how that came to pass, and to mention all the circumstances which preceded, accompanied or attended that affair.

Amongst the bills which were first transmitted from Ireland after his majesty's happy return, there was an imposition of a certain sum of money upon some specified lands, in the several provinces, (the nature whereof I cannot charge my memory with) which were to be paid to his majesty within a limited time, and to be disposed of by his majesty to such persons who had served him faithfully, and suffered in so doing, or words to that effect; for I may with a very good conscience say, that I never to this minute read the act of parliament, and am almost confident that I never heard of it at the time when it passed, being often absent from the council, by reason of the gout, or other accidents, when such matters were transacted. But very near two years after his majesty's return, I received a letter from the earl of Orrery, that there would be in his hands, and the earl of Anglesey's and lord Mazzarin's, (who it seems were appointed treasurers to receive the money raised by that act of parliament) a good sum of money for me; which he gave me notice of, to the end that I might give direction for the disposal thereof, whether I would have it returned into England to me in money, or laid out in land in Ireland; and he wished that I would speedily send my direction, because he was confident that the money would be paid in at least by the time that my letter could arrive there. No man can be more surprised with any thing, than I was at the receipt of this letter; believing that there was some mistake in it, and that my name might have been used in trust by somebody who had given no notice of it; and without returning any answer to the earl of Orrery, I writ by that post to the lord lieutenant, (for it was after his first going into Ireland) to inform him what my lord of Orrery had writ to me, and to desire him to inform me, by his own inquiry, what the meaning of it might be. Before I had an answer from the lord lieutenant, or indeed before my letter could come to his hands, I received a second letter from the earl of Orrery; in which he informed me, that there was now paid in, to my use, the sum of 12,600*l.* or thereabouts, and that there would be the like sum again received at the end of six months; sending me likewise a particular direction to what person, and in what form I was to send my order for the payment of the money. I forbore likewise to answer this letter, till I had received an answer from the lord lieutenant; who then informed me at large, what title I had to this money, and how I came to have it: That shortly after the passing of that act of parliament which had given his majesty the disposal of the money before-mentioned, the earl of Orrery had come to him, and putting him in mind how the Chancellor had rejected all overtures which had been made to him of benefit out of that kingdom, (which refusal and many others, which shew how unsollicitous I have always been in the way of getting, is not more known to any man living than to the lord lieutenant) wished that he would move his majesty to confer some part of that money upon him; which the lord lieutenant very willingly did, and his majesty as cheerfully granted: That a letter was accordingly prepared, and his majesty's royal signature procured by Mr. Secretary Nicholas, who was at the same time commanded by the king not to let me know of it; and to which purpose there was likewise a clause in the letter, whereby it was provided that I should have no notice of it, which the lord lieutenant said was by his majesty's direction, or with his approbation; because it was said, that if I had notice of it, I would be so foolish as to obstruct it myself: And that there was a clause likewise in the said letter, which directed the payment of the said money to my heirs, executors or assigns, if I should die before the receipt thereof. Of all which being thus fully advertised by the Lord Lieutenant, and of which, till that time I had not the least notice or imagination, I desired Mr. Secretary Nicholas to give me a copy of that letter, (which had been since passed as a grant unto me under the great seal of Ireland, according to the form of that kingdom) which he gave me, with a larger account of many gracious circumstances in the king's granting it, and the obligation laid upon him of secrecy, and the great caution that was used that I might have no notice of it. After I was informed of all this, I did not think there was any thing left for me to do, but to make my humble acknowledgement to his majesty for his royal bounty, and to take care for the receiving and transmitting the money to me, and that I might receive the same very honestly: I did thereupon wait upon his majesty with that duty which became me; and his majesty was graciously pleased to enlarge his bounty with those expressions of favour, and the satisfaction he had vouchsafed to take himself in the conferring his donative, that my joy was much greater from that grace, than in the greatness of the gift.

At the very same time, and the very day that I received the letter from the lord-lieutenant, the late earl of Portland had come to me, and informed me of a difference that was fallen out between the lord Lovelace, and sir Bulstrode Whitlocke, upon a defect in the title to certain lands purchased heretofore by the said sir Bulstrode Whitlocke from the lord Lovelace, and possessed by the other for many years: That the lord Lovelace had been compelled, in the late ill times, for the raising of money to pay his composition, and other necessary uses, to make sale of his manor of Blunsden in the county of Wilts, and that sir Bulstrode Whitlocke had purchased the same from him at a less price than in truth it was worth: That though the conveyances had been made and executed with all the formality the doctrine of that time required; and that the lord Lovelace had covenanted, that his son, who was then under age, should join in the same assurance when he should accomplish the age of one-and-twenty, which he had now newly done about the time we are mentioning; and that the lord Lovelace was resolved, though he was in his person liable to the covenant, to take advantage of the alteration of the times, and to compel sir Bulstrode Whitlocke to pay him more money; or that his son, who was tenant in remainder, should enter upon the land. The earl said, that he desired to make an end between them; and that the lord Lovelace (whose great friend he was) should receive some more money, which his condition required, without so great a damage to sir Bulstrode Whitlocke, as by the law he would be liable to, however the other might suffer in his person; that upon conference between them, he found that the manor of Blunsden was joined to some land I had in Wiltshire, and would be very convenient to me, and therefore wished that I would purchase it at a just value, which would produce a satisfaction to both the others. This proposition being made upon the very day, as is said before, that I received the letter from the lord-lieutenant of Ireland, by which it appeared that there was near as much money already received for me as would pay that purchase, besides what would be more received within 6 months after, I wished the earl of Portland to bring both the persons concerned to me within two days, in which time I would resolve what to do; nor did I need much time to consider of it; the person who then rented the whole, and the land itself, being very well known to me: So that when they all came to me at the time appointed, after a very short conference together, we agreed upon the purchase, and appointed the writings to be prepared and executed as soon as might be; when I promised to pay more money than is usual in such purchases, presuming I could not at all be disappointed in the return of that sum of money from Ireland, which was the sole ground and encouragement I had to undertake that bargain: But the very next letters I received from thence informed me, that the necessities of that kingdom had been such, that they could only return me 6,000*l.* and that they had been forced to make use of the rest for the public, which would without doubt take care to repay me again in a few months; and so I found myself engaged in a purchase which I could not retract, upon a presumption of money which in that manner I was disappointed of: And I have not only never since received a penny of what was due upon the second payment, (and which I presumed would have been so certain, that I assigned it upon the marriage of my second son to him, as part of his portion), but the remainder of the first sum was so borrowed & taken from me, that no part of it hath been since paid to me, or to my use: By which, and the inconveniencies and damage which hath since ensued to me from thence, I may reasonably say, that I am yet a loser, and involved in a great debt by that signal bounty of his majesty, which I hope will, in due time, be made good to me under so good a security as an act of parliament; and I have great reason to complain of those my very good friends who first disposed his majesty to that act of grace, and were not afterwards solicitous enough in their several places to make it effectual to me. And this is a very true account of all that business, and of all the money which I ever received from Ireland, with all the circumstances thereof; which, I hope, in the judgment of all impartial men, will not reflect to the prejudice of my integrity and honour.

The Sixteenth Article is, "That I have deluded and betrayed his majesty and the nation, in all foreign Treaties and Negotiations relating to the late war."

I do heartily wish that those particular treaties, and the particulars in those treaties, had been mentioned, wherein it was conceived that I had deluded and betrayed his majesty, that I might have at large set down whatsoever I have known and done in those treaties, and then it would easily have been made to appear how far I have been from betraying and deluding him. It was never any ambition of my own that brought me to have a part in any treaty; God knows, I heartily wished to have meddled in nothing but the administration of that great office the king thought fit to entrust me with; but his majesty had so good an opinion of me then, that he required and commanded my service in many of those treaties; and therefore it will be necessary for me according to the method I have hitherto used, to mention every particular treaty that hath been entered into, since the time of his majesty's return into England, and the part that I have had in it: Being as willing to be called to the strictest account for any other treaty he had made when he was abroad, or for any other counsel I have ever given in my life, public or private; wherein, I doubt not, I shall be found to have behaved myself (according to the weak abilities God Almighty hath given me) with fidelity to my master, and with all imaginable affection to my country, how unhappily soever I am represented.

The first treaty was with the crown of Portugal, in which I was none of the commissioners who treated, and was only present when any report was made by the commissioners to the council-board, where all the articles were debated; and I do not remember that there was any difference of opinion upon any of them; and that treaty hath been generally held the best that hath been made with any crown, the merchants having thereby greater advantages in trade than they have in any other place, besides many other great benefits, with a great enlargement of his majesty's empire.

The second treaty was with the States of the United Provinces, in which likewise I was none of the commissioners who treated; but all that was by them transacted was still brought to the council-board, and debated there in his majesty's presence; in which the rule by which his majesty guided himself was, as I remember, that he would not remit any of those concessions which had been formerly made by them in their last treaty with Cromwell; and their unwillingness to consent to that was the reason that their ambassadors proceeded so slowly: And his majesty had the less reason to be solicitous for expedition, because the king of France had given him his royal word, and proposed to himself, that the two crowns might proceed in their several treaties with the Dutch together, that so they might be brought to such good conditions, that they might live like good neighbours with both the crowns, which, he observed, they were not naturally inclined to do; and promised positively, that for his part, he would not conclude any thing with the Dutch, before he had entirely communicated the same to his majesty. Notwithstanding which engagement, France entered into and finished their treaty, and in it made that secret article, which they declared afterwards to be the ground and their obligation to assist the Dutch in the ensuing war. However, his majesty proceeded not, till the Holland ambassadors consented to all which had been granted before to Cromwell; which being done, the peace was made and ratified on both sides, and, without doubt, with more advantage and honour to the English, than ever had been provided by any former treaty between the crown of England and those States.

From the two crowns of Sweden and Denmark, ambassadors extraordinary arrived here shortly after his majesty's return, and the several treaties were made with both those crowns before the departure of the ambassadors; in neither of which treaties I was a commissioner, nor knew any thing that passed in either, but as it was represented at the council-board, and debated in his majesty's presence; nor did I ever hear that either of them was reckoned a disadvantageous treaty, both of them containing as much benefit to the English as any treaties which had been made before with those crowns. It is very true, there were some unusual expressions of kindness and friendship in the treaty with Denmark; which in respect of that king's being at that time in a very low condition, under the disadvantageous conditions of the treaty of Copenhagen newly submitted to, and under almost as ill a treaty extorted from him by the Dutch, and yet being in terrible apprehension of some new oppression from the one and from the other, the ambassador did very earnestly solicit to have inserted, and were, upon great deliberation, allowed and inserted by his majesty's own particular direction; in consideration of the near alliance in blood between his majesty and that king; and the civilities and obligations his majesty had received from Denmark, during his majesty's being in Holland, after the murder of his father; and during his being in Scotland, when the king of Denmark sent him horses, arms and ammunition; of which his majesty had so great a sense, that he was often heard to say, that if it had pleased God to have brought him home before that disadvantageous peace at Copenhagen had been made, which was done by the countenance of the English ships, and the threats of those who were then ambassadors from the governing power in England, that he would have done the best he could to have defended and protected him; and therefore he did very readily yield to that article drawn by the ambassador; his majesty declaring at the same time, that he was very willing that those princes who were neighbours to Denmark, and from whom that kingdom apprehended new oppressions, should know his majesty's resolution to support that king, and defend him from new injuries, to which the policy of his government, as well as his inclination, invited and obliged him; though it is very true, the king of Denmark did shortly after make very ill returns to his majesty for that his so signal affection.

These were all the treaties made by the king before the war with the Dutch, for there was very little progress made either with France or Spain for the reasons mentioned before, except only a short treaty with the elector of Brandenburg: which treaty, for the most part, was particular with reference only to the prince of Orange, his majesty's nephew, and for the better ordering of his affairs; in which treaty his majesty likewise employed five or six of his privy-counsellors; and the few articles between his majesty and that elector in point of state, were likewise transacted by them, and debated and considered at the council-board, and in which all things were inserted for his majesty's benefit and service: and if they had not been afterwards violated by the elector, his majesty had reaped much fruit and advantage even by that treaty.

After the war was entered into with Holland, his majesty sent Mr. Coventry to Sweden, and sir Gilbert Talbot to Denmark, to dispose those two crowns to a confidence in each other, and then to dispose them both to adhere to his majesty, or at least not to favour or assist the Dutch. The treaty with Sweden succeeded to his majesty's wish and was concluded in a league defensive, very much to the king's satisfaction, and with the full approbation of the whole board; that crown having manifested so much affection to his majesty, and such an inclination to an intire conjunction with him, that upon very reasonable conditions they would have been induced to have entered into a league offensive, and even in the present war against the Dutch: In order to which, they sent their ambassadors hither, at the same time when Mr. Coventry returned, and they became the mediators for the peace; having first declared to his majesty, that if the treaty should prove ineffectual, the crown of Sweden would immediately join with his majesty in the war against the Dutch. What became of the other treaty with Denmark is publicly known, his majesty having declared to all the world how perfidiously he was treated by the Dane.

There remains only one other treaty to be mentioned, which is the last with the Dutch, upon which the peace was made; and therefore it will be necessary to set down the inducements to that treaty, the whole progress and conclusion of it: by all which it will easily appear that his majesty was neither betrayed or deluded in it; or if he were, that it was not done by me. After so many encounters and various successes in the war, which had been carried on with a much greater expence than his majesty, at his first entrance into it, was perswaded it would cost him, when he saw the strength and power of the Dutch so much increased by the conjunction of France and Denmark, which supplied them with money, ships, and (what they had more wanted) with men as many as they desired; and that all the propositions he could make to Spain could not induce them to enter into such alliance with him as might embark them against France; notwithstanding it was evident to all but themselves, that the French resolved to break the peace with them, having at that time published those declarations, which they afterwards made the ground of the war: his majesty clearly discerned, that the Dutch grew less weary of the war than they had before seemed to have been; and that they would be able, with that assistance and conjunction, to continue the war with less inconvenience than his majesty was like to do. He had found it necessary for the streightening the trade of the enemy (the tiepriving them of which could only induce the Dutch to desire a peace, and which he could not do by the strength of his own ships, which were still kept together to encounter their fleet) to grant as many commissions upon letters of mart to private men of war as desired the same, and with such strict orders and limitations as are necessary in those cases; and he found indeed the advantage very great, in the damage those men of war did to the enemy, which was considerable, and gave them great trouble: on the other side, the common seamen chose much rather to go on board those men of war; where their profit out of their shares of the booty was greater, and their hazards much less than in the king's ships, where they got only blows without booty, though their pay and provisions were much greater than they had been in any former times; so that when the royal fleet was to be sent out, there was greater difficulty in procuring seamen and mariners to man it. And then, whereas the advancement of trade was made the great end of the war, it was now found necessary to suppress all trade, that there might be mariners enough to furnish the ships for the carrying on the war; and this inconvenience produced another mischief; for, by the great diminution and even suppression of trade, there was likewise so great a fall in the customs, excise, and all other branches of the king's revenue, that it was evident enough, that his majesty would have very little to carry on the war, but what should arise by imposition in parliament upon the people; who already complained loudly of the decay of their rents, of the small and low price which their commodities yielded by the cessation of trade, and especially by the carrying out of all the money in specie from the several counties, to London, for the carrying on of the war; and the parliament itself appeared to be so weary of it that instead of granting a new supply, proportionable to the charge, they fell upon expedients to raise money by sale of part of the king's revenue, which was already too small to support the ordinary and necessary expence of the crown: but above all, his majesty was most discouraged by the extreme licence of the seamen in general; but especially those who were called privateers, set out in the particular ships of war upon adventure, who made no distinction between friends and foes; but, as if the sea had been their own quarters, they seized upon all ships which came within their view, and either pillaged them entirely, and so dismissed them, (which they usually did to those which they foresaw would be delivered by the course of justice) or else brought them into the harbours after they had taken from them what they best liked. And then the formal proceedings in the court of admiralty, were so dilatory and involved in so many appeals, that the prosecution of justice for injuries received grew as grievous as the injury itself; which drew a universal clamour from all nations, that, without being parties to the war, they were all treated as enemies. France had made the damage they had this way received, and the interruption of their trade, a great part of their quarrel, and one ground of their conjunction with the Dutch. From Spain, which really wished better to us than to our enemies, the complaints were as great that their whole trade was destroyed; their ships of Flanders, which supplied Spain with what they wanted for themselves, and with what was necessary for their trade and intercourse with the Indies, were all taken as Dutch, because it was very hard to distinguish them by their language; which was likewise the case of all the Hans-Towns, which made grievous complaints, and had, without doubt, received great damage. Those provinces of Italy, whose dominions reached to the sea, as the two republics of Venice and Genoa, and the duke of Florence, expostulated very grievously for their several ships taken by those freebooters of Scotland and of Ireland, both which nations enriched themselves very much upon such depredations; and how much soever the royal navy was every day weakened, the number of the men of war wonderfully increased: so that those kind of ships, of England, Scotland, and Ireland, covered the whole ocean; and of those ships which were taken and carried into Scotland or Ireland, (in England there were many re-deliveries) it was observed, that there were 'Vestigia nulla retrorsum.' Even Sweden itself, with whom a new stricter alliance was then entered into, with as severe restrictions to that licence of the men of war as could be contrived for the liberty and security of the trade of that crown, complained exceedingly of the violation of all those concessions and provisions, and that their ships were every day taken and plundered. And this universal complaint began to awaken all princes to a jealousy, that the English endeavoured to restrain all trade, till they could make themselves the entire masters of it. And it is very true, in the first entrance of the war there had been many unskilful expressions, even in the parliament, as well as in the frequent discourses of parliament-men, that by this war, and by suppressing the Dutch, (of which they made not the least doubt) the king would be able to give law to all the trade of the world, and that no ships should pass the sea without paying some tribute to England; which liberty and rashness in discourse, made a great impression upon those who wished any mischief to the Dutch, till they saw what danger might ensue to themselves by the success of the English; and thereupon wished that they might break themselves upon each other, without advantage to either party: and this general temper and complaint made the deeper impression in his majesty, by his discerning an extreme difficulty, if not an impossibility, to give a just remedy to it; and, consequently, that he should be shortly looked upon as a common enemy. He had taken very great pains, upon deliberate consultations, to suppress that odious irregularity and destructive licence that was practised amongst the seamen, and had, in many particular cases, himself examined the excess, and caused exemplary justice to be done upon the offenders, and restitution to be made of what had been taken, at least of what was left; for no justice could preserve the injured persons from being losers: he granted such rules, and privileges, and protection to the ports of Flanders, and to others of his allies, as themselves desired, and looked upon as their full security; but then he quickly found, that from those very ports, and in those very ships which enjoyed those privileges, the trade of the Dutch was driven on: so that it was evident enough, that by that liberty which other nations thought themselves in justice intitled to, if not restrained, the Hollanders themselves would be easily able to carry on their whole trade in the ships of Flanders, Hamburg, and the other free towns, or in their own ships owned by the other; and that the restraint would be likewise impossible, without a total suppression of the men of war, and a revocation of all commissions granted to any of them; which must likewise be attended with the freedom and security of trade to all his majesty's enemies. In the last encounter at sea, the Prince Royal, and three others of his majesty's navy, had been lost; and another (the London) had been burnt in the river by the negligence of the seamen; for there was never any discovery made, that there was any purpose or malice in it: The French had obliged themselves, that the duke de Beaufort, admiral of France, should, with the whole fleet under his command, amounting to eighteen good ships, join with the Dutch; and the king of Denmark was likewise engaged to send all his greatest ships, which were ten or a dozen, in order to the like conjunction. So that his majesty clearly discerned that the enemy would be much superior to him in strength and power, though he should have been able to have manned and set out all his royal navy; which he very well foresaw he should not be able to do, both for want of money, and want of seamen, who were already in great disorder and mutiny for want of their pay, of which there was indeed a great arrear due to them; and which was worse, there was grown such an animosity amongst the principal officers of the fleet between themselves, that the whole discipline was corrupted; so that it was hard to resolve into what hands to put the chief government thereof, if it could have been made ready. Upon which, and the whole state of affairs, upon deliberation and frequent consultation with the principal officers of the sea, and such others whose experience in such matters rendered them most capable to give advice, his majesty found it most counsellable to resolve to make a defensive war the next year, and to lay up all his great ships; and to have some squadrons of the lighter vessels continue in several quarters assigned to them, which should be ready to take any advantage which should be offered; and that there should be likewise ready in the river another good squadron of ships against the end of the summer, which being ready to join with those which lay out, when the enemy was weary, and their ships foul, should be able to make many notable advantages upon them; of which they who advised it were so confident, that they did believe this defensive way, thus ordered and prosecuted, would prove a greater damage to the enemy in their trade, and all other respects, than they had ever yet undergone. And in all this counsel and resolution I had no other part than being present; and not understanding the subject matter of the debate, I thought myself not to be able to answer any of the reasons which had been alledged.

These considerations, upon a full survey of his ill condition at home and abroad, induced his majesty to wish that there were a good end of the war; which inclination his majesty vouchsafed to inform me of, well knowing that I would be very glad to contribute all I could to it, as the thing I desired most in this world, and which I thought would prove 'the greatest benefit to the king and kingdom; and his majesty likewise told me, that he found all those who had been most forward and impatient to enter into this war, were now weary of it, and would be glad of a peace; so that there remained now nothing more to do, than for his majesty to advise with whom he thought fit (for there seemed many reasons to conceal both the inclination to peace, and the resolution not to set out a summer fleet, from being publicly known) what method to observe, and what expedients to make use of, for the better securing this wished-for peace, without appearing to be too solicitous or importunate for it, or so weary of the war as in truth he was; and to this consultation his majesty was pleased to call, together with his royal brother, prince Rupert, the general, the Lord Treasurer, myself, and those other honourable persons with whom he used to advise in his most secret and most important affairs.

That which occurred first was, to consider whether there were any hope of dividing the French from the Dutch; upon which supposition the prospect was not unpleasant, the war with one of them being hopelessly enough to be pursued; the conjunction was only formidable: And to this purpose several attempts were made both in France and Holland; both sides being equally resolved not to separate from each other, till a joint peace should be made with England, though they both owned a jealousy of each other, those of Holland having a terrible apprehension and foresight of the king of France's designs upon Flanders, which would make his greatness too near a neighbour to their territories; besides, that the logic of his demands upon the devolution and nullity of the former treaty upon the marriage, was equally applicable to their whole interest, as it was to their demands from the king of Spain: And France, upon all the attacks they had made both in France with the ambassador there, and in Holland by their own ambassador, found clearly, that they were to expect no assistance from the Dutch in their designs, and that at least they wished them ill success, and would probably contribute to it upon the first occasion; and this made them willing to determine their so strict alliance, which was already very chargeable to them, and not like to be attended with any notable advantage, except in weakening an ally from whom they probably promised themselves more good. However, neither the one or the other could be induced to enter into any treaty apart, though they both seemed willing and desirous of a peace: in order to which, the Dutch, through the Swedes ambassador's hands, had writ to the king, to offer a treaty in any such neutral place as his majesty should make choice of; professing that they should make no scruple of sending their ambassadors directly to his majesty, but that their conjunction with the other two crowns, which required a neutral place, would not admit that condescension; and at the same time they intimated to the Swedes ambassadors, that the king of France would not send his ambassadors into Flanders, or any place of the king of Spain's dominions; and therefore wished that his majesty would make choice of Disseldorp, Cullen, or Frankfort, or Hamborough, or any other place which his majesty should think more convenient than the other, under that exception: All which places, and in truth any other out of the king of Spain's dominions, were at such a distance (the winter being now near over), that there could be no reasonable expectation of the fruit of the treaty in time to prevent more acts of hostility.

About this time the earl of St. Albans having been sent into England by the queen-mother upon her own particular affairs, M. De Ruigny did write to him, that that court did earnestly desire a peace; and that, if he were in France, he did believe some expedient might be found that would produce the same; and he continued for many weeks together to write very earnestly to the earl of St. Albans to come into France with authority to treat and conclude a peace, and that it might be made before suspected. All which letters the earl shewed to his majesty. M. De Ruigny was a person very well known to the king, and many others in the court, to be too wise a man to write upon such a subject, and in such a manner, without very good authority; and that he was likewise a man of honour, and would not suffer himself to be made use of upon any unworthy design; and therefore his majesty concluded, that it would be fit that the earl of St. Albans should transport himself into France: who having dispatched all the business for which he was sent by the queen, his return could administer no cause of jealousy to any; nor had he so much as a letter of credit from the king, and only had direction to understand from M. De Ruigny, upon what ground he had so earnestly invited him over, and to receive any proposition he or any body else should offer in order to peace, which he should transmit to his majesty, and expect an answer; with a positive, negative instruction, that if any proposition should be made to him to oblige his majesty to assist the French against Flanders, he should utterly reject it.

At the same time the baron De Issola, who was envoy from the emperor, and a much more dexterous man than the Spanish ambassador, and so more relied upon in Madrid as well as Vienna, in those affairs which concerned their joint interest, pretended to have received letters from Holland, by the consent and with the privy of De Witt, that they had there a great mind to peace; and that if De Witt, who was looked upon as the only man that opposed it, might receive any assurance of the good-will and protection of the king, he would be willing to negotiate the peace, whether France should be willing to it or no; and the baron (who had nothing more to solicit on the emperor's behalf) offered immediately to take his leave and return to Brussels, and from thence he would go incognito to the Hague, and confer with De Witt, and would thereupon give his majesty advertisement what he might depend upon. The king would have thought the better of any peace that had been procured without the interposition of France, and therefore willingly consented to his journey; and gave him leave to assure De Witt, that he should find all possible good-will and friendship from his majesty, and that his majesty desired nothing more than a just and an honourable peace, and upon such conditions as might make it lasting.

Whilst these matters were in agitation in France and in Holland, the Swedes ambassadors earnestly solicited for an answer to the letter they presented to his majesty from the States, concerning a neutral place; which put his majesty to another deliberation. Not to return any answer, would be interpreted a refusal of the Treaty, and so make his majesty appear to all christian princes to be better pleased with the war. To accept of any of those places insinuated from the Dutch, would be against his dignity, in so far condescending to the unreasonable imposition of the king of France; and yet to nominate any place in Flanders for the Treaty, after France had so positively declared itself, would be interpreted both by France and Holland as a rejection of the Treaty, at least would make France less solicitous for a good end of it. When his majesty called that committee of the board to consult upon some expedient in this affair, he proposed himself one expedient, which I am sure I had not heard of before; which was, to make choice of the Hague for the place to treat in. The condescension to Holland, in sending his ambassadors to treat in their own province, was, not, upon a disquisition of it, thought to be of that importance, as to neglect the benefits and conveniences which might reasonably be expected from the having it in that place. The people were not only generally very weary of the war, and desirous of a peace, but the States themselves were very much divided, and De Witt had been exposed to many difficulties and reproaches, under the character of being the sole person who desired the prosecution of the war; and he had prevailed most, by taking upon him to assure the States, that the king had no thoughts of peace, but only laboured to separate France from them, and divide them amongst themselves. There could not be a greater manifestation of his majesty's ardent desire of peace, than by offering to send his ambassadors to the place where the body of the States themselves resided, and who would be the only judges of the reasonableness of what his majesty should propose, and by being upon the place might give all expedition to the work: besides, that all other princes concerned had their ministers likewise there; and therefore if his majesty's overture in this particular should be rejected, all the world would conclude that the Dutch would not endure so much as to hear of peace. And upon these reasons the resolution was taken to name the Hague for the place of the Treaty, and his majesty's letters were dispatched accordingly.

The first news we heard from Paris and the Hague, after the earl of St. Albans being arrived there, and the baron De Issola at Brussels, was a great complaint, that the king had sent the baron De Issola privately to the Hague with overtures of peace; but especially with design to divide Holland from France, and to persuade them to break their alliance with them; in which there were some particular expressions which his majesty had in truth used to the baron De Issola, and many other which he had never used. The king had reason to conclude from hence, that De Witt was never to be treated withal privately; and that the baron De Issola was not to be trusted, he having persuaded and prevailed with his majesty to give him leave to speak with De Witt upon some letters he had shewed the king from M. Fiquett, the emperor's envoy at the Hague, a gentleman not unknown to his majesty, and of a very clear reputation; wherein there was mention of a discourse made by De Witt to him, which might very well encourage the king to give that in charge to the baron, which his majesty had in truth commended to him: nor in truth had it been material, if he had said no more than his majesty gave him leave to do; which yet he promised not to mention, except he clearly discerned the other to be very willing to deal as freely with his majesty; but it plainly appeared that the baron had far exceeded his commission, and said many things for which he had not any power, and which in truth had never passed in discourse between the king and him. And as the king of France had always expressed the greatest prejudice, and the most bitter jealousy, from the time that the Baron was designed for England, as a person who delighted in nothing so much as in puzzling and perplexing, and creating intricacies in all treaties in which he had ever been engaged, which had been many in several courts of Christendom; so indeed his parts were most proportioned for embroiling and for preventing any conclusion, in which he gave himself leave to say and do any thing which he thought would contribute to his end, without the least consideration of ingenuity or sincerity in the matter; though otherwise it cannot be denied that he was a man of great parts, and of a universal understanding in the affairs of Christendom.

At the same time the king of France complained of the authority given by his majesty to the baron De Issola, we found in the Dutch printed Gazette. the copy of a letter written then by the king of France himself to the States; in which he informed them of the earl of St. Albans being newly come to him with propositions from the king of England in order to peace; and that he had a plenipotentiary commission to treat and conclude, mentioning some of the conditions he had offered; and therefore desired that they would arm their ambassadors in France to join in the Treaty. This gave his majesty great offence, and just cause to suspect that whatever pretences France had made, it did not at all desire the peace; and he had the more reason to complain of this injury, because there was not the least colour or ground of truth in the relation, the earl of St. Albans having not anything like of commission; nor, as he protested upon this occasion, (whereof he had likewise taken notice at Paris, and complained before he could have any advertisement from England) had he ever pretended to have the least power from his majesty; nor had he ever mentioned any of those particulars to any person which were so formally inserted in that king's letter to the States: and his majesty was the more confirmed in his belief that France would not contribute to the peace, because they did at this very time, with equal passion to De Witt himself, oppose the Treaty at the Hague; against which they could have no reason to except, if they had a mind to the peace, unless they hoped, by the trick that is mentioned before, to have got the Treaty to Paris by a commission to the Earl of St. Albans; which they had tried all the ways they could to obtain, and his majesty had as positively refused to grant, and then resolved to insist on the Hague, or upon some place in Flanders, let the success be what it would.

During this agitation, an express was sent over from the earl of St. Albans, with two papers which he had received from M. de Lyonne, and both in his own hand, which originals were sent to the king; the one contained a proposition for the peace, that there should be no mention of the charges of the war, or the damages received by it on either side; but that it should be in his majesty's choice whether all things should remain in the state they were at present, either side to keep what it had taken, and were possessed of by reason of the war; or that both sides should come to an account, and either be repaired by the other for the damages it had sustained; and that after his majesty had made his election of those two particulars, from thence the peace should be observed between the king and the Dutch, according to the last treaty which had been made at London after his majesty's return. The other paper was a proposition made to his majesty, that he would promise under his hand that he would not, during the space of a year to come, enter into any treaty to the prejudice of France, nor give any assistance against France during that year, this overture being made about the beginning of March; and in consideration hereof, the king of France would restore the island of St. Christopher's, which he had newly taken from the English, and would undertake that the Dutch should consent to the peace upon the conditions formerly mentioned; and that the treaty should be, if his majesty desired it, at Dover or Canterbury, since it would not be possible to persuade De Witt ever to consent that it should be at the Hague; which he looked upon as a design only to countenance the party of his enemies; and at the same time the States writ again to the king, and offered to treat at Dover or Canterbury.

Though his majesty had, in all his answers to the Dutch, demanded satisfaction for the damages he had sustained, and for the charge of the war; and made little doubt, if France had not entered into that conjunction, that they would have been induced to have made some compensation towards it; yet the case was now altered, and they thought themselves by the new alliances to stand upon the advantage ground, so that his majesty found any demand of that kind would not be submitted to; nor, in truth, had the like been insisted upon in any treaties of this age, after the longest or sharpest war that had been made. Hereupon, after full deliberation, his majesty was well contented to accept of the propositions made by the king of France for the peace, and made choice of the first alternative, that both parties should be contented to enjoy what they had got without any account, the Dutch having lost very much more than the English; and we having taken from them in Guinea, and upon that coast, more important places than they had taken from us: and the restitution of St. Christopher's by the king of France, put his majesty into the same condition in his plantations in the West Indies, as he had been before the war.

When his majesty thought that all things upon the matter had been adjusted, and cared the less where the treaty should be; and having sent such an answer into France as was punctually agreeable to what had been thence desired; he received another dispatch from thence, with infinite excuses, and protestations of sincerity, that the Dutch had expressly refused to consent to a peace, except the king would remit and part with the island of Polaroon in the East Indies; an island which had been formerly taken by the Dutch from the English with very foul circumstances, and the re-delivery whereof was promised by them in their treaty with Cromwell, and again renewed in their last treaty with the king, and his majesty had sent ships thither to receive it; which not being delivered upon pretence of want of some formality in the demanding, it was one of the grounds of the present war, as an indignity and breach of faith towards his majesty: though they protested that it was only the fault of their governor in those parts, who for want of an order from the East India Company, though he did receive the order of the States General, had not refused, but delayed its delivery; and that that, and all other orders that could be required, were again renewed, and already sent thither, and they were confident the place was by that time given up. It was alledged by the king of France, that the Dutch had always declared to him, in all the discourses which had been between them of a treaty, that they would never restore Polaroon: and M. de Lyonne protested, that he had never known that the restitution thereof was comprehended in the last treaty, but conceived that it would fall within the alternative, if the king should make choice of that; which he had done, or otherwise would fall into the account: and concluded with a very earnest desire, that the king would rather yield in that particular, than break the treaty for an island which was nothing worth for the present, nor could be made valuable in less than seven years; with a protestation still, that he would do all that was in his power to persuade the Dutch to part with Polaroon; but if they should deny to do it, he could not separate himself from them upon that point, since they had still mentioned it as a condition: but if his majesty would yield in that particular, all difficulties should be removed, and the Treaty concluded without any new obstruction. This unreasonable litigation, and the receding from what had been so fully undertaken before, removed all confidence from his majesty of the sincere intentions of France; nor could he foresee what other new scruples would arise from the one hand, and be admitted by the other. However, after a full deliberation with his council upon the whole state of his affairs, and after having communicated to them all that had passed, he did resolve not to reject the Treaty, but was contented that Breda should be the place; not thinking it fit, for many reasons, to bring the Treaty to Dover or Canterbury, to give the enemy that advantage if it should prove ineffectual, that it should be broken in his own dominions: or to make other advantages by infusions to the people, who were generally more dissatisfied than they had reason to be: and thereupon his majesty named the lord Hollis, and Mr. Henry Coventry of his majesty's bed-chamber, for his ambassadors in that Treaty, men very well qualified for the service, who were dispatched to Breda as soon as was possible, which was about the beginning of May; France having promised, that the fleet under the command of the duke de Beaufort should remain in the port, and that he would use his utmost power to dispose the Dutch, in the entrance into the Treaty, to consent to a cessation, that so there might be no more acts of hostility on either side, until it might appear what success the Treaty was like to have towards a Peace: and concerning the business of Polaroon, he gave them charge to insist upon the delivery, and sent to the East-India Company, who had the sole interest in that island, to send their deputies to the Treaty, who should be privy to all that should be treated upon that affair, and who might propose or accept whatsoever they thought best for themselves; towards the obtaining whereof, France was so fully engaged to use their utmost interposition.

What passed during the Treaty is known to so many, that I need not mention it here, every dispatch from the ambassadors being read and debated at the Council-Board; and when such difficulties did arise that the ambassadors would not take upon them to make any conclusion without a particular communication of the temper, and disposition, and resolution of all the persons concerned, they thought fit that one of themselves (the lord ambassador Coventry) should attend his majesty, being obliged to return with his majesty's answer within so many days; and as soon as he arrived, he gave his majesty a full account, before the whole Council-board, of all that had passed in the Treaty; that the Dutch behaved themselves very insolently, and that the authority of De Witt was so great at the Hague with the States, that nobody durst oppose any thing he advised; that the Dane, by his instigation, had made demands of a very insolent nature; that they believed that the French ambassadors had behaved themselves very well, and done all that was in their power to do, and had restrained the Dutch from their insolence by threats and menaces, which they likewise used towards the Dane: In fine, he read all the articles which were concluded between them; with all those which remained undetermined and unconsented to, on either side; with what the French ambassadors resolved to persuade and reduce the Dutch to consent to yield to, or to declare against them in their master's name. Upon which report, every particular article was at large debated at the board, which took up many days. The ambassador said, there was not the least hope of having Polaroon restored to the English; that they said it was contained in that alternative which the king had made choice of; and when it was replied to them, that the words of that alternative clearly determined the contrary; for that either side was to remain possessed of what they had got by reason of the war, which could not be applied to this island, which they had unjustly taken and usurped so many years before; and that they were obliged, by the last treaty, to restore it, so that the war had no operation upon that; to this they answered, that they had, according to the treaty, sent orders for the re-delivery of it, and that they believed it had been delivered accordingly; and that, upon the news of the war, their subjects had retaken it again, which would bring it within the very letter of the alternative: and this our East-India Company was so far from contradicting, that they believed it to be true, and had shewed me, before the Treaty began, a letter they had received from one of their factors in the Indies, that there was a report there, that the Dutch had delivered up Polaroon to those who were sent to receive it, and that shortly after that they had taken it from them again; and therefore they desired that a special article might be inserted in the Treaty, whereby the Dutch might be obliged to give it up again, if they had in truth so indirectly delivered it, that they might again repossess themselves of it; which could not but be understood to be a plain violation of their public faith, or a vile artifice to elude it. The ambassadors replied, That if it had been in truth delivered by them, though so indirectly taken, they could not insist upon it, but allow it to be in the alternative; they desired only that it might be inserted in the article, that if in truth it had never been delivered, they should be obliged to do what so long since they should have done. The Dutch answered, That the end of this Treaty was to establish a firm Peace, and therefore they would admit of no doubtful expressions which might create future disputes. The ambassadors said, It was very evident, and the French ambassadors had acknowledged the same to them, that they were resolved never to part with the island; so that there remained no more to be considered upon that particular, but whether, upon the refusal of Polaroon, the war should be continued. The East India Company were sent for to deliver their opinion; and they very frankly declared, that they believed a Peace to be very necessary for the kingdom, and therefore would not that the war should be continued upon any particular interest of theirs; and it was evident enough, that if the war continued, their whole East-India trade must be destroyed, the Dutch being so much superior in shipping, and all kind of strength, in those parts. Hereupon the king resolved to consent to their keeping of Polaroon; and I do not know that there was one man at the board of another opinion. To conclude, after a long debate for so many days upon every particular, the king resolved, with the concurrence of the whole board (one or two persons only excepted) to consent to the Peace upon such concessions and provisions as the French ambassadors had obliged themselves to bring the Dutch to consent to; and thereupon the ambassador returned with full power, and in a short time after that Peace was concluded and published. And therefore I cannot understand how his majesty could be deluded or betrayed in that Treaty, which passed with such a full examination and disquisition; and in all which debates his majesty himself had taken the pains to discourse more, and to enlarge himself in the answer of all those objections which were foreseen, than I had ever known him to do upon any other article.

It is very true, that I had been commanded by the king to write most of the letters and directions which had been sent to the earl of St. Albans from the time of his going over, concerning the Treaty, his lordship having (I presume by the same direction) directed most of his letters to me; and most of the dispatches to the ambassadors were likewise prepared by me, they being by their instructions (without my desire or privity), to transmit their account to one of the secretaries, or to myself: but it is as true, that I never received a letter from either of them, but it was read entirely in his majesty's presence to those lords of the council, who attended, where directions were given what answer should be returned; and I never did return any answer to either of them, without having first read it to the council, or having first sent it to one of the secretaries to be read to his majesty; and I can with a very good conscience protest to all the world, that I never did the least thing, or gave the least advice relating to this war, or relating to the Peace, which I would not have done if I had been expiring, and to have given an account thereof to God Almighty that minute: and as his majesty prudently, and piously, and passionately desired to put an end to that war; so no man appeared more delighted with the Peace when it was concluded than his majesty himself did; though, as far as I could make any judgment of the public affections, the publication of that Peace was attended with the most universal joy and acclamation of the whole nation, that can be imagined: nor is it easy to forget the general consternation that the city and the people of all conditions were in, when the Dutch came into the river as high as Chatham; and when the distemper in the court itself was so great, that many persons of quality and title in the galleries and privy-lodgings very indecently every day vented their passions in bitter execrations against those who had first counselled and brought on the war, wishing that an end were put to it by any Peace; some of which persons, within very few days after, as bitterly inveighed against the Peace, and against the promoters of it. But I am so far yet from repenting or being ashamed of the part I had in it, that I look upon it as a great honour, that the last service performed for his majesty was the sealing the proclamations, and other instruments for the conclusion and perfection of that Peace, the great seal of England being that very day sent for, and taken from me.

The Seventeenth and last Article is, "That "I was a principal author of that fatal counsel of dividing the fleet about June, 1666."

How far I have always been from giving advice in the prosecution of the war either by land or sea (except by being present at some of the debates) I have at large set down before; I never in my life having pretended, either in the time when I served his late majesty during the war, or in this king's time, to understand any thing of that affair: but when I have been present in councils of that nature, I have always governed myself by their opinions who had the greatest reputation of skill in that profession; and I never presumed less in my life to give an advice, than I did in this particular concerning the division of the fleet; and I should make a full answer to this charge, if I should say no more, than that I am not guilty of it. But since it hath made so much noise, to the disadvantage of the king, and of the conduct of his affairs, and that no care hath been taken to inform men of the whole carriage in that particular; I will, as I have done at large to the other articles, for his majesty's honour, and for the vindication of those of his council who were present in those debates, (how unjust soever many of them have been to me) set down very particularly all that I know of that matter, and how the fleet came to be divided; upon the view of which, I am of opinion, what misfortune soever attended it, no man will have cause to be ashamed of any fault he committed in it. From the time that his majesty resolved to send prince Rupert and the General with a joint power and authority to command the fleet, there was cause enough to apprehend that there would not have been so good an accord between them as the conducting so great a service required; and I was then thought to have so great an interest in both of them, that his majesty commanded me to use the utmost endeavours to dispose them to a good understanding towards each other; and I believe they will both confess, that I performed all the offices I could, and with some success, to that good end: And I was the more solicitous in it, because I found that the prince was much unsatisfied with the resolution his majesty had taken, that they should both go in one and the same ship; and that his highness was very desirous to be in a ship by himself, and even to command a part of the fleet upon any enterprize that should offer itself, separated from the other: And there was too general an opinion, from what ground I know not, even at the time when our fleet was ready, and when the two generals went to it, that the Dutch were not in any degree ready to come out; that the greatest ships had not taken in their provisions, and that they had not men enough to man the fleet; and that they had no design to come out of their port till the duke de Beaufort should be ready upon the coast to join with them; which fleet was then at Brest, and in great readiness. I had no part in managing the intelligence, nor in truth so much as a correspondence by letter at that time, with any man in France or Holland. The two generals were not many days at sea, when my lord Arlington informed his majesty and my Lords, that he had received intelligence from a good hand, that the Dutch were in no degree ready to come out with their fleet; and that the duke de Beaufort on such a day of the month had all his fleet ready, and his men on board, to take the first opportunity of the wind to set sail from Brest; that the wind had been fair these two last days, and therefore that it might be presumed that he was by that time at sea, and making his course for Holland. Whereupon it was consulted, whether any order should be sent to the fleet, that prince Rupert with part of it might bend his course towards Brest, whilst the general, with the other part, waited the Hollander's motion. There had been a long prospect and frequent debates upon this contingency, and how advantageous a thing it would prove, if we could have timely advertisement of the duke de Beaufort's motion, that a part of the fleet might be sent to encounter him before his conjunction with the Dutch; and for that purpose the lord Arlington had taken all the pains he could to get particular intelligence of the motion of that fleet. When this intelligence was communicated, some were of opinion that his majesty should send present orders to the generals, that prince Rupert should with such a number of ships as they should think fit, bend his course as is before mentioned. The late lord-treasurer and I were present at this debate; and though we seldom offered advice in such cases, yet being now both of one opinion, we did desire the king, that he would not take upon himself to send positive orders in an affair of such moment, upon an intelligence that might not be true; though we believed it to be very probable, that the generals were like every day to know more of the motion of the enemy than we could do: And therefore we humbly offered it to his majesty, whether it might not be fit in this case to send some of the council then present, and who had seen the intelligence, and heard the whole debate, presently to the fleet to inform the generals of what his majesty had heard, and of the considerations which had been thereupon; and if they had received no advertisement to the contrary, and upon conference together, thought fit to divide the fleet, and that prince Rupert should set sail in order to engage the duke de Beaufort, his majesty would be very well content that they should put that design in execution, without staying for farther orders. His majesty was pleased (with the concurrent opinion of every person present) to approve of this proposition; and immediately made choice of Mr. Vice-Chamberlain, and sir William Coventry, to use all possible expedition to find out the fleet, and inform the generals of all that had passed. I must not forget to say, that at this conference, and before the messengers were dispatched, Mr. Secretary Morrice informed the king, that he had received intelligence very different from what my lord Arlington's was; which was, that the Dutch fleet was even ready to come out, all their men being aboard, which was likewise commended to those two honourable persons to make part of their information. The winds were so favourable, that the two messengers went to, and returned from the fleet with more speed than could reasonably have been expected; they reported to the king, that they had imparted all his commands to the generals, and that they had had full conferences together upon it; that by all the intelligence they had received, they did conclude that the Dutch were not ready to come out; and therefore they thought it very counsellable, that the prince should endeavour to meet with the duke de Beaufort; and in order to that, they had agreed before their coming away, and had agreed what ships should attend prince Rupert and what should stay behind with the general, which they resolved should be executed by such a time, if they did not receive his majesty's orders to the contrary; which his majesty did not think fit to send, since they were of the same mind, and so they separated each from other, as was agreed. I have heard (but I was not then present) that upon a more certain intelligence that the Dutch fleet was come out, orders were sent to hinder the prince from going out; which, if they had been transmitted with care enough, would have come to him in time: but there being some negligence in that they came not to him time enough to return till the second day of the engagement; which is so well known, that I need not enlarge upon it. And this is all that I know of the dividing the fleet; in which I do not know that any man can be justly blamed with more reason than all men may be, whose counsels have not that success which is desired; and if there were any fault committed, I am sure there is no colour to impute it to me, nor am I in the least degree responsible for any consequence upon it.

I have now, according as my memory hath been able to supply (for I have not any paper or note by me for my assistance), answered every particular charge against me; I hope so fully, that, how powerful soever my enemies shall be yet able to appear, as they do continue very powerful, all indifferent men will absolve me from any guilt: and though I neither do or can expect any thing of justice or ingenuity from those persons who have by all the evil arts imaginable contrived my destruction, by infusing into his majesty's ears stories of words spoken, and things done by me, of which I am as innocent as I was when I was born, and other jealousies of a nature so odious, that themselves have not the confidence publicly to own; yet, I say, notwithstanding all this disadvantage for the present, I do not doubt but that posterity, if not the present age, will clearly discern my integrity and innocence in all the particulars which are objected against me, and lament my present suffering, that after so many years of very faithful and painful service, I should be banished my country, and forced to seek my bread in foreign parts at this age. However, it concerns me very much to wipe off one reproach which I may seem to have brought upon myself, by my withdrawing and secretly flying out of the kingdom, to avoid as it may be thought, the justice of parliament; which, as it is made the ground and foundation of the act of banishment, so I may reasonably presume that it hath made deep impression in the minds of many worthy persons, who were not ever-inclined to entertain a prejudice against me, and who, by my withdrawing, may reasonably believe, that if I were in truth so innocent as I have professed myself to be, I would not have declined the most severe and strictest examination of all my actions, of which I ought to be very ambitious; and that an exact inquisition might be made into my whole life, from which, and from which only, if I am so innocent as I pretend to be, I might reasonably promise to myself such a full vindication, as might amply repair me in point of integrity and honour, not only to the shame of my enemies, but to my full reparation for the damages I have sustained, if I could prove such a gross combination and conspiracy against me as I have seemed to accuse them of: and therefore it concerns me very much to make such a defence for myself in a clear relation of all the motives and circumstances which prevailed with me at that time to withdraw myself, after I had so often rejected all overtures and advice to that purpose, and so publicly declared that I would rather undergo all the danger and ruin which might attend my being brought to a trial than to contribute to my own infamy by endeavouring to decline the trial: and I hope that when I have made a faithful narration of all those reasons and motives which obliged, and even forced me to do what I did, I shall be thought by all dispassionate men not only not to have detested and betrayed my own innocence, but to have complied with that obligation and duty which I have always paid to his majesty, and to his service; and against which I hope, and am most confident, that God Almighty will always preserve me from committing the least fault or omission.

When his majesty was pleased first to send me an intimation of his purpose to take the seal from me, which was by the duke of York, he vouchsafed to use all the gracious expressions that can be imagined; the great satisfaction and benefit he had received by my service, the assurance he had of my fidelity, and that he was confident nothing could be objected against me, which I would not be well able to answer: but that the parliament had contracted so great a prejudice against me, that if they had sat but one day longer before their last adjournment, they would have accused me of high-treason, and that he was most assured that they continued in that resolution, and would execute it the first day of their next meeting; that I well knew the condition of his affairs, and how much he depended upon the house of commons for a supply of money, without which he should not be able to support his government: his advice therefore was, that I should deliver up the seal to him out of my own choice, by which he should be able to protect me from further inconvenience; and it would be so grateful to the parliament, that he should, in consideration thereof, receive all that he could desire from them. It will easily be believed that I was enough surprised at this message, it being a time when my mind was broken with the loss of my wife; for which his majesty had vouchsafed in his royal person to condole with me very few days before, and when my condition in all respects was in no degree pleasant to me: I desired the duke that he would procure an audience for me with his majesty; which his royal highness had not the least doubt of obtaining, and made as little doubt but that his majesty, in respect of my lameness and indisposition, would be graciously pleased to come to my house; which his majesty the next day promised to do; but upon conference with others, afterwards changed that his gracious purpose, and appointed me to attend him in a morning in my own chamber at Whitehall, which, being a ground room, would not put me to the trouble of going up stairs; and thither his majesty did vouchsafe to come to me, there being nobody then present but his majesty and the duke. The king received me very graciously, with all those expressions which he had used to the duke; and when I asked him whether he had taken any offence at my carriage, and whether I had misbehaved myself in his service? he said, no, but the contrary, that I had served him very well, and that he believed no prince had a better servant; and that the resolution he had now taken was for my good and preservation; and so enlarged himself upon the resolution the House of Commons had taken to accuse me of high-treason, and the prejudice they had against me. I told him, that he might possibly be deceived in that information; and that if he examined it better, he would find that I was not a man so universally odious to any persons of power and interest to serve him; at least, that my lord Arlington and sir William Coventry, who were my known enemies, would not be found to be more popular than myself; that the manifestation of his displeasure in this manner would be so far from preserving me, that it would infallibly expose me to the malice of my enemies, and was upon the matter to call for accusations against me to gratify his majesty; and I told him then, as I had done before, that sir William Coventry had taken upon him, upon the day of the last prorogation, to offer some leading men of the House of Commons, that the chancellor should be sacrificed to them, if that would content them. His majesty told me, that he knew much more of the combination that was against me than I did; and that he was most assured, that if I were not removed before the parliament met, it would not be in his power to preserve me; but if I voluntarily gave up the place, and withdrew into the country, he would undertake I should not receive the least further trouble. I told him, the seal was in his own disposal, he might take it when he pleased; but that I would not bring the reproach upon myself, by voluntarily giving it up, that I deserted his service at a time when some men would believe that I might be of some use to him. His majesty seemed to be resolved upon the matter, but dismissed me with many gracious expressions of his good opinion; which he continued long after to do to those persons, who of themselves taking notice of this discourse in the court, presumed to speak to his majesty: and to dissuade him from proceeding in that manner towards me; as the archbishop of Canterbury, the lord general, the earl of Bridgewater, and others; to all whom his majesty mentioned me as a person of whose affection and integrity to his service he had an unquestionable assurance: and I do in truth believe, that his majesty at that time had been persuaded to believe that my removal was necessary for his service: and had in himself no displeasure towards me, in order to any further prosecution.

As soon as the seal was taken from me and delivered to the king, I heard that Mr. May had kissed the king's hand, and told him he was then king of England, and never before; and then every day my enemies declared their animosities against me; and sir William Coventry declared publicly in all places, that he had advised the king to remove me, as a thing upon which his welfare depended: My lord Arlington had persuaded the duke of Buckingham, that I had been the sole person who had contrived the prosecution that had been lately against him; whereas in truth, I had never heard anything of it till the king told it me, and the lord Arlington brought me the examinations which had been taken, and assured me there would be much more proved against him; upon which I gave such advice as my duty obliged me to do: but so far was I from malice towards the duke, that I did him all the offices I could with the king, and contributed at least as much as any man, as soon as I found by the lord Arlington that some of the witnesses were dead, and that the proofs would not make all that good which he had pretended; but the duke of Buckingham was informed that I was the only cause of his suffering, and thereupon inveighed against me with his usual bitterness.

As soon as the parliament came together, it quickly appeared that my enemies had so far prevailed with his majesty as to declare his own displeasure against me, and against all those who appeared to have no ill opinion of me; and then nothing was spoken so much of as the resolution to take my life; and the lady Castlemain declared that the duke of Buckingham was to sit lord high steward of England upon my trial, many wagers being laid in the court that I should lose my head; and sir Thomas Osborn, a person of great intimacy with the duke of Buckingham, had declared in the country, before his coming up to the parliament, that if the chancellor were not hanged, he would be hanged himself. All which unusual proceedings did not in the least degree terrify me; only the manifestation of the king's so great displeasure against me (for what cause God of heaven knows I cannot to this day imagine) did afflict me as it ought to do: Upon which I writ to the king, beseeching him not to give ear to the reports raised by my enemies; but to let me know in what I had offended him.

and to beseech him to be satisfied with the disgrace and damage I had already received.

From the beginning of the prosecution in parliament against me, some persons who wished me very well, and were well informed of the severe intentions against me, earnestly advised me to withdraw myself, and thereby to provide for my security; which I utterly refused to do. And it is well known, that the day when the House of Commons sent up their general impeachment of High-Treason against me, that my coach was ready, and waited three or four hours to carry me to the House, I expecting to be sent for till the rising of the House. When the debate grew so hot in the House of Peers, and that after many expostulations from the House of Commons, the House of Lords still refused to commit me to prison, I received new importunities from my friends to make my escape; and they were persuaded by some who had had the greatest hand in contriving my ruin, to believe that it would be grateful to the king, and that there should be no means used to obstruct my going away: And when nothing of this could work upon me, the bishop of Hereford (who had not carried himself so well towards me as some men thought I deserved from him) first sent to the bishop of Winchester, to persuade him to get me out of the kingdom; and confessed to him, that it was the king's desire, though he would not own it to any body else: and then came to me himself, pressing the same thing to me; and undertook, upon his salvation (which was his own expression), that I should neither be stopped in my passage, nor suffer in the least degree in my honour or my fortune by my absence; which he said I could not believe he would undertake without very good authority: and thereupon enlarged upon the calamities the kingdom must suffer by this difference between the two Houses, of which I should be looked upon to be the sole cause, and therefore had reason to apprehend what sense the people were like to have of it; and Mr. Seymour had the confidence to tell a noble lord of the House, who had vigorously opposed my commitment, that if the House of Peers did not comply with the House of Commons, the people would not only pull down my house, but the houses of all those Lords who adhered to me. I told the bishop, I was very innocent in all things laid to my charge, and therefore I was not to be terrified by any threats: however if it were thought fit for his majesty's service that I absented myself I would, without any consideration how far I might suffer in point of reputation, submit to his majesty's direction; only I desired that I might have such a pass as might secure me from being stopped, and exposed as a spectacle to the people, and as a man running away from justice; which the bishop thought I might reasonably require, and made no doubt of sending it me accordingly: but the next morning he told the bishop of Winchester, that if the king should grant such a pass, it might give great offence to the parliament, which hazard his majesty would not run, but renewed all the assurances he had before given for the security of my passage: and I as positively refused to accept thereof: and so continued in my house, and spoke every day publicly with many persons a full week after the time that the bishop had been with me, notwithstanding the daily advice and importunity I received from my friends and nearest relations to withdraw.

It pleased God that the duke of York had been for some weeks sick of the small-pox, so that nobody had spoken with him of any business for the space of near a month: but the malignity of the disease being spent, his majesty himself had, upon the last Friday in November, visited his royal highness; and saying little more then, than in congratulating his recovery, and expressing his own great joy in it, he came again to him the next morning early, and had some private conference with him. And the king no sooner departed from him, but the duke bid his wife send presently to me, and conjure me presently to be gone; that she should let me know that it was absolutely necessary for the king's service; and that I might be very confident and secure, that I should meet with no obstruction in the way, nor undergo the least damage in my honour or fortune by being gone. And upon this authority and command I did the same night, on Saturday the last of November, 1667, leave my own house, and went by coach to Erit, where I embarked; and it pleased God, after four days struggling with ill wind and weather, I arrived at Calais the Wednesday following. And I did no more in this adventure, whatever prejudice I have undergone by it, than I shall always do, in sacrificing my honour, and my life itself, upon the least intimation of his majesty's pleasure, and whenever he thinks his service may be advanced by it. And if any man shall yet think, notwithstanding all that I have said, that I ought not to have withdrawn myself, but to have remained there in prison, or any other condition they would have put me in, until I had been fully cleared upon a fair trial; he will, I hope, have so much compassion of me, as to think I had great difficulties to contend with, and will lament, on my behalf, that I am forced to undergo so hard a fate, after the age of threescore years, whereof thirty have been spent in the service of the crown; and for the prosperity whereof, and the happiness of his majesty's royal person, my daily prayers shall be poured out, in what condition soever I am in, and in what corner of the world soever I shall be confined or condemned to.

216. The Trials of JOHN TWYN,* Printer, for High Treason; also of THOMAS BREWSTER, Bookseller, SIMON DOVER, Printer, and NATHAN BROOKS, Bookbinder, for Misdemeanors, at the Old Bailey: 15 CHARLES II. A. D. 1663.

FIVE several Indictments being drawn up, viz. one of High-Treason, against John Twyn printer; and the other four for Sedition, viz. two against Thomas Brewster bookseller, one against Simon Dover printer, and one against Nathan Brooks bookbinder; were presented to the Grand Inquest in London, at the sessions of gaol-delivery of Newgate, holden at Justice-Hall in the Old-Bailey, the 19th day of February 1663. Except that against Brooks, which was found the day following, by the same inquest. And after divers witnesses were sworn and examined before the said grand inquest, the said bills of indictment were severally returned Billa Vera.

* “At the Sessions in the Old Bailey, 20th Feb. 15 Car. 2. John Twyn was indicted on the Stat. 25 Ed. 3, of High Treason, for compassing and imagining the king's death, and the overt act laid in the indictment was, the printing of a seditious, poisonous and scandalous book, entitled; ‘A Treatise of the execution of justice, wherein is clearly proved that the execution of judgment and justice is as well the people's as the magistrate's duty, and if the magistrate's pervert judgment, the people are bound by the law of God to execute judgment without them, and upon them.’ And besides that title of the book, several passages in the book were set forth in the indictment which in substance were, first, that the supreme magistrate is accountable to the people. 2. The people are incited to take the management of the government into their own hands. 3. The people are encouraged to take up arms against the king and his family. 4. They are stirred up to revolt, as an action honourable and conscientious, and encouragements given to any town, city or county in the three kingdoms to begin the work. 5. The people are exhorted, not only to cast off their allegiance, but to put the king to death. And upon the evidence it was proved, that Twyn being a printer, by himself and servants printed this book; That he corrected some of the sheets, and that he scattered many of them to be sold; and he was found guilty, and had judgment for high treason, and was accordingly executed.

“At this trial were present of the judges the chief justice Hyde, and myself, and also my brother Wyldes recorder of London, and resolved by all clearly, that printing and publishing such wicked positions, was an overt act declaring the treason of compassing and imagining the king's death, which was also agreed by the rest of the judges upon our discourse with them.” Kelyng.

VOL. VI.

The Names of the said Grand Inquest being as followeth, viz. Arthur Jourdan, Arthur Browne, Simon Rogers, James Whetham, Ralph Blore, Isaac Barton, Roger Locke, Thomas Cooper, Samuel Taylor, Roger Hart, John Watson, Christopher Pits, Thomas Gerrard, John Cropper, Thomas Partington, Ralph Coppinger, Matthew Pelazer.

At Justice-Hall in the Old Bailey, Feb. 20, in the morning.

The Court being set, Proclamation was made: “O Yes! All manner of persons that have any thing more to do at this sessions of the peace, and sessions of Oyer and Terminer, held for the city of London and sessions of gaol-delivery holden for the city of London and county of Middlesex; draw near and give your attendance, for now the Court will proceed to the Pleas of the Crown of the said city and county. God save the king.”

Silence commanded.

Clerk of the Peace. Set John Twyn to the bar: [who was set there accordingly.] John Twyn, hold up thy hand.

Twyn. I desire to understand the meaning of it. [But being told he must hold up his hand in order to his trial, he held it up.]

Clerk, &c. ‘Thou standest indicted in London by the name of John Twyn, late of London, stationer, for that thou as a false traitor against the most illustrious Charles the 2nd, by the grace of God, of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, king, defender of the faith, &c. thy supreme and natural lord and sovereign—not having the fear of God in thine heart, nor weighing the duty of thy allegiance, but being moved and seduced by the instigation of the devil; and the cordial love, true duty, and natural obedience, which true and faithful subjects towards our sovereign lord the king bear, and of right ought to bear, altogether withdrawing; minding and with all thy force intending the peace and common tranquillity of this kingdom to disturb; and sedition and rebellion within these his majesty's kingdoms to move, stir up, and procure; and discord between our said sovereign and his subjects to make and move; the 27th day of October, in the year of the reign of our said sovereign lord Charles the 2nd, by the grace of God, &c. the 15th, at the parish of St. Bartholomew's, in the ward of Farringdon without, London, aforesaid, traitorously didst compass, imagine, and intend the death and final destruction of our said sovereign lord the king, and the ancient and regal government of England to change and subvert; and our said sovereign lord the king of his crown and regal government to depose and deprive. And these thy most wicked treasons and traitorous imaginations to fulfil, thou the said John Twyn, the said 27th day of October, in the year aforesaid, in the parish and ward aforesaid, advisedly, devilishly, and maliciously didst declare, by imprinting a certain seditious, poisonous, and scandalous book, entitled, "A Treatise of the Execution of Justice," &c. In which said book, amongst other things, thou the said John Twyn, the 27th day of October, in the year aforesaid, in the parish and ward aforesaid, falsely, maliciously, and traitorously didst imprint, &c.—against the duty of thy allegiance, and the statute in that case made and provided; and against the peace of our said sovereign lord the king, his crown and dignity.

What sayst thou, John Twyn; art thou guilty of this high-treason whereof thou standest indicted, or Not Guilty?

Twyn. I desire leave to speak a few words: My lord, I am a very poor man; I have been in prison several months—

Clerk. Are you Guilty, or Not Guilty?

Twyn. With all due submission to your honours, I desire to speak a few words.

L. C. J. Hyde. You must first plead to your Indictment, and then you may say what you will; that is the rule of the law. We receive no expostulations till you have pleaded to the Indictment, Guilty or Not Guilty.

Twyn. I do not intend to answer to the Indictment, by what I shall now say; I am a poor man, have a family and three small children, I am ignorant of the law, and have been kept prisoner divers months—

L. C. J. Hyde. Pray plead to the Indictment, you shall be heard, say what you will afterwards.

Twyn. I humbly thank you, my lord.

Clerk. Are you Guilty, or Not Guilty?

Twyn. I beseech you to allow me counsel, and some consideration; I desire it with all submission.

L. C. J. Hyde. You must plead first; then ask what you will.

Clerk. Are you Guilty, or Not Guilty?

Twyn. Not Guilty of those crimes.

L. C. J. Hyde. God forbid you should.

Clerk. How wilt thou be tried?

Twyn. I desire to be tried in the presence of that God that is the Searcher of all hearts, and the disposer of all things.

L. C. J. Hyde. God Almighty is present here; there is no other trial by the law of England, but by God and the peers, that is the country, honest men. You shall have all your challenges, and all that is due to you, by the help of God; we are bound to be your counsel, to see you have no wrong: therefore put yourself upon your trial; say how you will be tried.

Twyn. I desire to be tried in the presence of God.

L. C. J. Hyde. So you shall: God Almighty is present here, looks down, and be-holds what we do here; and we shall answer severely, if we do you any wrong. We are as careful of our souls, as you can be of yours. You must answer in the words of the law.

Twyn. By God and the Country.

Clerk. God send thee a good deliverance.

L. C. J. Hyde. Now say what you will.

Twyn. I am a very poor man.

L. C. J. Hyde. Nay, let me interrupt you thus far: whatever you speak in your defence, to acquit yourself of this crime, that you may reserve till by and by. This is but an arraignment; afterwards the evidence for the king is to be heard, then make your defence. If you have any witnesses on your part, let's know their names, we will take care they shall come in. If I did not mistake, you desired to have Counsel; was that your request?

Twyn. Yes.

L. C. J. Hyde. Then I will tell you, we are bound to be of counsel with you, in point of law; that is, the court, my brethren and myself, are to see that you suffer nothing for your want of knowledge in matter of law.*

* This is a very good explanation of the maxim, that the Judge shall be counsel for the prisoner. See the Note to the case of Don Pantaleon Sa, ante, vol. 4, p. 466. In the 5th Resolution in the case of Henry Vane's Case, ante, p. 131. It is said, "The court is always so far of counsel with the prisoner as to see that he hath right, and if they find any thing doubtful they of themselves will take time to advise." In addition to the particulars collected in that note, may be mentioned the sturdy and pertinacious claim of John Lilburne to counsel upon his trial for treason, A. D. 1649, (ante, vol. 4. p. 1269), and the curious altercations which occurred thereon. His claim was not allowed, though during the Usurpation it does appear that counsel were allowed perhaps more liberally than might have been expected. In Coleman's Case, A. D. 1678, Chief Justice Scroggs tells the prisoner, "You need not have counsel, because the proof must be plain upon you," agreeably to Lord Nottingham's reason in the case of Lord Cornwallis, A. D. 1678, and to 3 Inst. 137. It is observed in that Note, vol. 4, p. 470, that "Emlyn does not in his Preface include the privation of counsel in his enumeration of the hardships of the law." But, indeed, Emlyn does say in that Preface, (See vol. 1. p. xxxi, of this Collection) that "hitherto the law allows not a copy of the indictment nor of the names of the jurors, nor the assistance of counsel, as to matter of fact, in any indictments for felony," and he adds, "yet it is the opinion of many it would be never the worse if it did, for it seems very strange to allow a man these assistances in defence of his property and deny them to him when his life lies at stake." And he proceeds to enter somewhat farther into the subjects, particularly as to the list of the jurors' names, and copy of indictment.

I say, we are to be of counsel with you. But for this horrid crime, (I will hope in charity you are not guilty of it, but if you are) it is the most abominable and barbarous treason that ever I heard of, or any man else: the very title of the book (if there were no more) is as perfectly treason as possibly can be. The whole book through, all that is read in the indictment, not one sentence, but is as absolute high treason as ever I yet heard of. A company of mad brains, under pretence of the worship and service of God, to bring in all villainies and atheism (as is seen in that book.) What a horrid thing is this! but you shall have free liberty of defending yourself. To the matter of fact, whether it be so or no: In this case the law does not allow you counsel to plead for you; but in matter of law, we are of counsel for you, and it shall be our care to see that you have no wrong done you.

Clerk. Set Simon Dover to the bar: [who being set, his Indictment was read to the purpose following.]

‘Thou standest indicted in London, by the name of Simon Dover, late of London, Stationer, for that thou, &c. the 15th day of Feb. in the 13th year of the reign, &c. at the parish of St. Leonard’s Foster lane, in the ward of Aldersgate, London, falsely, maliciously and wickedly, didst imprint a certain false, malicious, scandalous and seditious book, intitled, “The Speeches and Prayers of some of the late King’s Judges,” &c. and the same didst sell and utter, against the duty of thy allegiance, &c. How sayest thou, Simon Dover, art thou Guilty of this Sedition and Offence, wherof thou standest indicted, or Not Guilty?’

Dover. My lord, and the honourable bench, I desire I may be heard a few words—

L. C. J. Hyde. When you have pleaded, you shall.

Dover. I shall be willing to plead—

L. C. J. Hyde. You must either confess it, or plead Not Guilty. I hope you are Not Guilty of this foul crime.

Dover. I am not, by the laws of England, Guilty.

L. C. J. Hyde. You shall be tried by the laws of England, whether you are Guilty or no.

Dover. I am willing to be so, and I am glad I am come before you to that purpose, having been long a prisoner: I am Not Guilty of any thing in this Indictment, neither as to matter, time nor place.

L. C. J. Hyde. What do you mean by time and place?

Dover. I am not guilty in manner or form. And now, my lord, I being altogether ignorant of the law, I humbly beg counsel, and a copy of my Indictment: I hope I shall not be destroyed, because I am ignorant of the law: I have been 18 weeks close prisoner.

L. C. J. Hyde. What would you have?

Dover. I desire time, and counsel assigned me, and a copy of my Indictment.

L. C. J. Hyde. For a copy of your Indictment, though it be for a foul offence, yet (in favour to you, it being not made so capital as the other) we cannot deny it you: For counsel you may have what you will, we need not assign it. [Make him a copy,] but I will tell you, we shall try it now.

Dover. I do protest I knew not what I came for; I never imagined what my Indictment was; I know not what there is in it—

L. C. J. Hyde. You shall have a copy made presently. If you have counsel or witnesses, send for them; we must try you to-day; but you will have some time, for we will begin with the other.

Dover. I beg I may have a copy of the Indictment in English, I cannot understand Latin.

L. C. J. Hyde. That that is against you, is in English; the Latin signifies no more, but that you did seditiously and maliciously print all that which is in English.

Dover. I hope I have done nothing, but I shall acquit myself of.

L. C. J. Hyde. I hope you may; but we can give you nothing but a copy of the record: send for your own clerk to understand it.

Clerk. Set Thomas Brewster to the bar: [who was set; and then his Indictment was read, which was:]

‘That he the said Thomas Brewster, late of London, Stationer, not having, &c. (in the form aforesaid) the 15th day of February, &c. at the parish of Little St. Bartholomew’s, in the ward of Farringdon without, London, maliciously, &c. did cause to be imprinted the aforesaid book of “Speeches and Prayers,” &c. and the same did sell and utter, against the duty,’ &c.

Who being demanded, Whether he was guilty of that sedition and offence? answered, Not Guilty.

Clerk. How will you be tried?

Brewster. By God and the Country.

Clerk. God send thee a good deliverance.

L. C. J. Hyde. Say what you will now.

Brewster. May it please your lordship, I am wholly ignorant of the proceedings of the law; I have been a close prisoner these 18 weeks, no body to advise with me, scarce my wife suffered to come to me; I desire some time to take advice.

L. C. J. Hyde. I doubt we shall not be able, if you mean till next sessions—

Brewster. No, my lord, I have had too long imprisonment already, would I had been here the first sessions after I was a prisoner.

L. C. J. Hyde. If you desire a copy of the Indictment and counsel, you shall have it.

Brewster. I humbly thank you; but I must have time to consult them, or they will do me little good.

L. C. J. Hyde. If you have any friends or witnesses, you may send for them.

Brewster. I thank you, my lord.

Clerk. ‘Thomas Brewster, thou standest again indicted in London by the name of, &c.

'for that thou not having, &c. the 10th day of July, in the 13th year, &c. at the parish of Little St. Bartholomew's, in the ward of Farington without, London, &c. falsely, maliciously, scandalously, and seditiously, didst cause to be imprinted a book, intituled, "The Phoenix, or the Solemn League and Covenant," &c.—and the said book didst sell and utter, against the duty, &c. How sayest thou? Art thou Guilty of this sedition and offence whereof thou standest indicted, or Not Guilty?

Brewster. Not Guilty, my lord.

Clerk. How will you be tried?

Brewster. By God and the country.

Clerk. Set Nathan Brooks to the bar.

'Thou standest indicted in London, by the name of Nathan Brooks, late of London, stationer; not having, &c. [The same as to make, time, and place, with that of Dover's] and knowing the said book to be scandalous and seditious, didst sell, utter, and publish the same against the duty, &c. How sayest thou, Nathan Brooks; art thou Guilty of this sedition and offence whereof thou standest indicted, or Not Guilty?

Brooks. Not Guilty.

Clerk. How will you be tried?

Brooks. By God and the country.

Clerk. God send thee a good deliverance.

L. C. J. Hyde. If you desire to have a copy of your indictment and counsel, you may have it.

Brooks. I am a poor man, I have not money to get counsel; I hope I shall not want that that belongs to me by law, for want of money.

L. C. J. Hyde. You shall not, by the grace of God.

Clerk. Set John Twyn, Simon Dover, Thomas Brewster, and Nathan Brooks, to the bar.

Clerk. John Twyn, those men that you shall hear called, and personally appear, must pass between our sovereign lord the king and you, upon trial of your life and death; if you will challenge them or any of them, you must do it when they come to the book to be sworn, before they be sworn. And you that are for seditions and offences, look to your challenges.

Dover. We desire we may have a jury of booksellers and printers, they being the men that only understand our business.

L. C. J. Hyde. There are those already that understand it as well as booksellers or printers; besides, half the jury are such, and they are able to make the rest understand it: but you may challenge whom you will.

The jury were, William Samborne, William Rutland, Thomas Honylove, Robert Lucas, Robert Beversham, Richard Royston, William Hall, John Williams, James Flesher, Simon Waterson, Samuel Thomson, Thomas Roycroft. Who were severally sworn by the oath following: 'You shall well and truly try, and true deliverance make, between our sovereign lord the king, and the prisoners at the bar, whom you shall have in charge, according to your evidence. So help you God.'

All Four. We are all satisfied with the jury.

Clerk. Crier, make proclamation. "O Yes! If any one can inform my lords the king's justices, the king's serjeant, or the king's attorney, before this inquest be taken between our sovereign lord the king and the prisoners at the bar, let them come forth, and they shall be heard; for now the prisoners stand at the bar upon their deliverance; and all others that are bound by recognizance to give evidence, against any of the prisoners at the bar, come forth and give evidence, or else you will forfeit your recognizance."

Clerk. John Twyn, hold up thy hand. You of the jury, look upon the prisoner, and hearken to his cause; you shall understand that he stands indicted in London by the name of John Twyn, late of London, stationer: [Here the Indictment is read over again.] Upon this indictment he hath been arraigned and thereunto hath pleaded Not Guilty; and for his trial, hath put himself upon God and the country, which country you are: Your charge is to enquire whether he be guilty of the high-treason, in manner and form as he stands indicted, or not guilty: If you find him guilty, you shall enquire what goods and chattels, lands and tenements he had at the time of committing the said treason, or at any time sithence. If you find him not guilty, you shall enquire whether he fled for it; if you find that he fled for it, you shall enquire of his goods and chattels, lands and tenements, as if you had found him guilty: If you find him not guilty, nor that he did fly for it, say so, and no more, and hear your evidence.

Mr. North, Barrister of the law. John Twyn stands here indicted, for that he as a false traitor to the most illustrious Charles the 2nd, &c. not having the fear of God before his eyes, nor weighing the duty of his allegiance, &c. [Here was opened the form of the Indictment.] To which he hath pleaded Not Guilty; if there shall be sufficient evidence given you of the charge in the indictment, you must do the king and the nation that justice, as to find him guilty, that sentence of law may pass on him.

Mr. Serj. Morton. May it please your lordships, and you gentlemen that are sworn of this Jury, I am of counsel with the king against John Twyn, the prisoner here at bar, who stands indicted of a most horrid and damnable treason: It is, the compassing and imagining the death of the king, to deprive him of his crown and royal government, and to alter and change the ancient legal and fundamental government of this kingdom: which he has endeavoured to do, and did intend to do, by printing a traitorous and seditious Book, which in itself contains as many and as great treasons, as it was possible either for the malice of the devil, or the corrupt and treasonable thoughts of blood-thirsty men to invent; It contains treasons against the king in his own royal person; against his government, both ecclesiastical and civil; full of treasons, as my Lord Chief Justice was pleased to observe to you, treasons against the queen, scandals against all manner of professions both in church and kingdom, of magistracy and ministry. My lord, there are in this Indictment, thirteen Paragraphs of that treasonable book recited; and each of them contains as many treasons as there be lines in it. Nay, my lord, this treasonable book was intended to set a flame in this nation, to raise and stir up rebellion in this kingdom against the king and his government. I shall observe to your lordship the time when it was to be printed; it was in the beginning of October, your lordship knows, and I do not doubt but the Jury have heard, that there was a great and dangerous design in this nation, set on foot by men of dangerous principles, to embroil this nation in a new war, for the destruction of the king and his government. It was executed in part, as far as time and other circumstances would give way and leave to the undertakers (the 12th of October last); and, my lord, it was proved upon the execution of a Commission of Oyer and Terminer at York, that there was a council here in London, that sat to prepare matter for an universal rebellion all England over. They sent their agitators into the north, west, and all parts, to give notice to their party to be ready to rise at a certain time: Several days were appointed, but it seems they could not be ready till that 12th of October; for the seditious books that were to lead on that design, and the libels and declarations could not be printed before that day: And truly that had been printed and published too, if there had not been great diligence used by the king's agents and ministers, to take them just as they were preparing it. This book, gentlemen, doth contain a great deal of scandal upon the king's government, dispersing false and base rumours, to the prejudice of it. It is a rule in my lord Coke, 'That the dispersing of false and evil rumours against the king and government, and libels upon justices of the kingdom, they are the forerunners of rebellion.'

We shall now go to the Proof: We shall prove that this prisoner at the bar, to print this Book, had two presses in one room: That he himself did work at one of those presses, his servants at the other by his command, and in his presence: That he did compose part of it, print the sheets, correct the proofs, and revise them all in his own house, which were corrected and brought back into the work-house by himself, in so short a time, that they could not be carried abroad to correct, so that he must needs correct them himself: That this work was done in the night-time (and it was proper, as it was a deed of great darkness, and not fit indeed to see the light; and it was well it was strangled in the birth, or else for ought I know, we might by this time have been wallowing in our blood). We shall make it appear that this man, when Mr. L'Estrange came to search his house, brake the forms, conveyed away as many of the sheets as he could from the press to other places; yet notwithstanding, God's providence was so great in the thing, that he left there three or four sheets, which Mr. L'Estrange then seized on, and many more within a little time after: And somewhat of the same matter remained upon part of a form of letter, which his haste would not give him leave to break. When he was charged with it by Mr. L'Estrange, he confessed that he had printed some sheets of this seditious Book; and being demanded by Mr. L'Estrange, What he thought of it? He told him, 'He thought it was mettle some stuff.' He had great joy in it; he confessed he had received money for printing of this; and much other matter, taken upon examination before Mr. Secretary. We shall call our Witnesses: I should have observed to you, That this man would have done it with all the privacy that could be, and to be done forthwith; there was great haste of it, about the beginning of October, and the design in the north was upon the 12th; so that it was clearly intended for that design.

Several Witnesses were sworn.

Joseph Walker. My lord, whereas my master is indicted for printing this Book—

Ld. Hyde. Your master! who is your master?

Walker. He at the bar.

Ld. Hyde. What say you of it?

Walker. I desire to see the Book; [it was shewed him.] About the four first pages of this Treatise I composed.

Ld. Hyde. Who delivered it to you to compose?

Walker. My master delivered the copy to me.

Ld. Hyde. What do you mean by composing?

Walker. Setting the letters.

Ld. Hyde. Well, and you set the letters to print according to the copy; and you had it of your master, had you?

Walker. Yes, my lord; but all this copy we did not print.

[Part of the copy in Manuscript being shewed him, he said, he composed by that copy.]

Serj. Morton. How much did you print?

Walker. About three sheets.

Serj. Morton. How many of those did your master compose?

Walker. Truly, Sir, I cannot tell.

Ld. Hyde. Did he compose one?

Walker. As to a whole one, I cannot say.

Mr. Recorder (Mr. Serj. Wilde). Did he compose the Title?

Walker. Here is no Title.

Mr. Recorder. No? Read the top.

Walker. A Treatise of the Execution, &c.
[He reads the Title].

Mr. Recorder. Did your master compose that?—Walker. No, I did.

Ld. Hyde. Did your master give you that to compose?—Walker. Yes.

Serj. Morton. Who composed the second, third and fourth sheets?

Walker. I composed some of them, but to particularize, I cannot.

Ld. Hyde. Who gave you what you did?

Walker. My master.

Ld. Hyde. Can you turn to any part of that you did compose?

Walker. I cannot tell that.

Ld. Hyde. You composed, you say, four pages: There are eight in a sheet: Who composed the other of the same sheet?

Walker. I think my master did.

Ld. Hyde. At the same time, and in the same room with you?

Walker. He wrought not in the same room.

Ld. Hyde. After you had stamped the sheet, who did peruse and over-read it, to see if it were right?

Walker. I carried them into the kitchen, and laid them down upon the dresser by my master.

Ld. Hyde. Who compared them?

Walker. I know not.

Ld. Hyde. Who brought them back to you?

Walker. My master brought them into the workhouse, and laid them down.

Ld. Hyde. Was there any body in the house that might correct it?

Walker. Not that I saw.

Ld. Hyde. When you had carried a sheet down, how long was it ere it was brought back again?

Walker. About an hour, or an hour and a half.

Ld. Hyde. Was there any body in the house besides you and your master?

Walker. There was my fellow-apprentice, and the woman that keeps the house.

Ld. Hyde. Were there no strangers there?

Walker. No, my lord.

Recorder. Were they printed in your master's house?—Walker. Yes.

Serj. Morton. What room?

Walker. In the press-room.

Serj. Morton. Did your master work at the press about this work any part of the time?

Walker. Yes, I saw him beat some sheets.

Ld. Hyde. When you had printed one sheet, were there not some mistakes of the letters to be mended?—Walker. Yes, there were literals.

Lord Hyde. Who made the amendments?

Walker. Upon my oath I cannot tell.

Lord Hyde. Do you believe it to be your master's?

Walker. I cannot tell that.

Lord Hyde. Have you seen your master write heretofore?

Walker. I have seen him write, but because I have heard of them that could counterfeit mens hands, I dare not swear it was his writing.

Lord Hyde. Were the amendments that were brought back like his hand?

Walker. The letters were something like them, but I cannot swear positively that they were his.

Lord Hyde. No, that you cannot, unless you saw him write them; but was it like his hand?*

Walker. It was not much unlike his hand.

Mr. Recorder. Did not your master use to correct other works before this?

Walker. Yes.

Recorder. Then by the oath that you have taken, were not the corrections of this book like those of other corrections of his own hand?

Walker. I know not that.

Recorder. Did any body correct books in your house but your master?

Walker. No, sir.

Serj. Morton. Did you see your master with copy?

Walker. Yes, he had copy before him.

Serj. Morton. What time was this printed? by night or by day?

Walker. In the night-time.

Serj. Morton. What directions did your master give you about printing it? did he direct any privacy?

Walker. He was not much desirous of that.

Recorder. At what time did you work about it?

Walker. In the morning, from two till four or five.

Serj. Morton. Pray, sir, thus; were you in the house when Mr. L'Estrange came up?

Walker. Yes.

Serj. Morton. Were you at work then or before?

Walker. Not when he was above, but immediately before I was.

Recorder. You are not bound to conceal treason, though you are bound to keep your master's secrets.

Serj. Morton. What were you then at work upon?

Walker. Upon the signature D, the sheet D of this treatise.

Serj. Morton. What did your master say, when you told him Mr. L'Estrange was below?

Walker. Very few words; I cannot be positive in them.

Serj. Morton. To what purpose were they?

Walker. Hearing somebody knock at the door, I went down into the composing-room, and looked through the window, and saw people; I imagined Mr. L'Estrange was there, and I told my master: whereupon he said, He was undone, or to that effect.

Recorder. Did he not wish you to make haste in composing it?

Walker. No, he did not.

Recorder. How long had you been at work upon it? how many days?

Walker. I cannot tell justly.

Recorder. You can guess.

Walker. About three or four days.

Recorder. Did not your master work in that time?

* Of the law concerning proof of hand-writing, see the Case of Algernon Sidney, infra, A. D. 1683.

Walker. He was in the work-house, and did set letters.

Recorder. Did he not likewise print ?

Walker. Yes, he did.

Serj. Morton. Did not you, by his direction, break the form which Mr. L'Estrange came to search ?

Walker. I brake one indeed.

Serj. Morton. What became of the other ?

Walker. My fellow-apprentice brake it ?

Serj. Morton. By whose direction ?

Walker. I had no order for it ; I brought it down, and went to set against a post, and it fell in pieces.

Serj. Morton. Did you ask your master who delivered him this copy to print ?

Walker. I did ask him two several times ; but he made no answer.

Lord Hyde. Did he not say, 'He would not tell you ;' or that 'it was no matter to you ;' nor nothing ?

Walker. Yes, he did afterwards say, 'It was no matter to me.'

Recorder. Did not your master nor fellow-apprentice tell you who brought the copy ?

Walker. No.

Recorder. And did not you know ?

Walker. No.

Serj. Morton. Was he not used to tell you the authors of books that you printed ?

Walker. The authors he did not ; but for whom they were printed he used to tell me. My lord, I humbly beg pardon for what I did, I was his apprentice.

Ld. Hyde. How many sheets did you print ?

Walker. Two reams on a sheet, which makes a thousand.

Ld. Hyde. The first page being the title of it, your master brought to you to compose ; at the same time when you were composing one part, your master was composing another part of the same sheet in the next room ; and part of it your master did print as well as compose : I think you said this ?

Walker. Yes.

Ld. Hyde. Likewise that the proofs were carried to him to overlook, and he brought them back within an hour, or an hour and half after, and laid them down in the work-house ; and that you saw the hand of the amendments, but you cannot swear it was his, only you say that it was not unlike it ; and that he had corrected former sheets that you had printed, and that the hand with which he corrected others and this, was alike : and that there was no stranger in the house to correct it ?

Walker. Not that I saw.

Ld. Hyde. This is the substance of what you said ?—Walker. Yes.

Recorder. Did your other man, or you ever correct ?—Walker. No.

Recorder. Did he use other correctors at any time ?

Walker. Yes, about some books.

Recorder. What books ?

Walker. Hooker's Ecclesiastical Polity.

Ld. Hyde. You did rise to work at two of the clock in the morning about it : and your master said when you told him Mr. L'Estrange was below, that he was undone ?

Walker. It was so, my lord.

North. Mr. L'Estrange, pray tell my lord and the jury of your taking this.

Mr. L'Estrange. My lord, I do remember, that three or four days, or thereabouts, before the 12th of October last, I had notice of a press that had been at work for several nights in Cloth-Fair, and employed a person to watch the house ; who told me that they still gave over early in the morning, at day-light or soon after. At length intelligence was brought me in these very words, 'That now they were at 'it as hard as they could drive' (which was about four in the morning). I arose, went to one of the king's messengers, and desired him to take a printer by the way ; who did so : And I called up a constable, and so went to Twyn's house, where we heard them at work. I knocked a matter of a quarter of an hour, and they would not open the door, so that I was fain to send for a smith and force it ; but they perceiving that opened the door and let us in. There was a light when we came ; but before the door was opened, it was put out. When I was got up stairs, and a candle lighted, I found a form broken (that is, the letters dispersed), only one corner of it standing entire ; which was compared by a printer that was there, with a corner of a page newly printed, and appeared to be the same. This form was brought down out of the press-room into the composing-room. As yet we could not find the whole impression ; but at last they were found thrown down a pair of back-stairs. I remember they told me the impression was a thousand. I asked him where he had the copy ? He told me, He knew not, it was brought to him by an unknown hand. I told him he must give an account of it. He told me at the last, He had it from Calvert's maid. I asked him where the copy was ? He told me, He could not tell. (When I speak of the copy, I mean the manuscript.) We searched near two hours, and could not find it : And at length went thence to the constable's house in Smithfield, and staid there a while with the prisoner. I asked him, Mr. Twyn, said I, who corrected this sheet ? Alas, said he, I have no skill in such things. Who revised it then ? Who fitted it for press ? Truly I had nobody but myself ; I read it over. What thought you upon reading it ? Methought it was mettlesome stuff : The man was a hot fiery man that wrote it. But he knew no hurt in it.

Serj. Morton. When you had taken these sheets, were they wet or not ?

L'Estrange. They were not only wet, but half of them were imperfect, printed only on one side. Missing the copy, I told him after he was carried to Whitehall ; Mr. Twyn (said I) it may possibly do you some good yet, to bring forth the copy : If you will be so ingenuous to produce the copy and discover the author, you may find mercy for yourself ; pray therefore get this copy: Perchance I may make some use of it. After that, his servant Bazilla Windsor brought out this part of the copy:

[Producing a sheet of Manuscript in Court.]

Ld. Hyde. Joseph Walker, was the whole copy of this book in the house when you composed that which you did?

Walker. I cannot tell: I saw it but sheet by sheet.

Recorder. Did not you see the whole entire copy in your master's hand?

Walker. No: But [taking some part of the manuscript in his hand, said] this is the hand that I composed by.

Recorder. Mr. L'Estrange, where had you the entire copy?

L'Estrange. It was only the copy of the last sheet, that I took in the press.

Recorder. Who helped you to that?

L'Estrange. Bazilla Windsor, by direction of the prisoner, as I conceive: For I told him, if you can help me to the copy, it may do you some good; and soon after part of it was brought me by her. I asked Mr. Twyn further How did you dispose of those sheets which you had printed, those several heaps, whither are they gone? He told me, he had delivered those sheets to mistress Calvert's maid at the Rose in Smithfield.

Recorder. You say he told you mistress Calvert's maid received them of him; did you since speak with that maid?

L'Estrange. I was long in searching Twyn's house, and one of his apprentices made his escape, and probably gave notice of it: For the night I went to mistress Calvert's house, she and the maid too were fled. I have since taken the mistress, and she is now in custody, I have heard nothing of the maid since.

Justice Keeling. Twyn owned to you that he had corrected some of the sheets; that he had read them, and said, It was mettlesome stuff.

L'Estrange. I did ask him in the house of the constable, Who corrected this? The corrector must certainly know what it was. Said he, 'I have no skill in correcting.' But when I speak of correcting, I mean who revised it, over-looked it for the press? 'I read it over,' says he.

Twyn. I never said such a word.

L'Estrange. He spake this in the presence of two or three here present. Could you read over this book, said I, and not know that it was not fit to be printed? 'I thought it was a 'hot fiery fellow; it was mettlesome, or mettlesome 'stuff.' Somewhat to that effect.

Serj. Morton. What did you hear him confess before sir Henry Bennet?

L'Estrange. He owned the thing; that is, he acknowledged he had printed the sheet I shewed there, and two other sheets of the same treatise.

Serj. Morton. Did he acknowledge he corrected them?

L'Estrange. I know not whether before sir Henry Bennet he did, or no.

Serj. Morton. What know you about money received by him?

L'Estrange. He said Calvert's maid paid him 40s. in part for that work.

Twyn. I said I had received money of Calvert's maid for work I had done; but named not that.

Mr. Dickenson sworn.

About the 7th day of October, it being Wednesday, as I remember, about five o'clock, we attended Mr. L'Estrange, myself and others: we came to the house of the prisoner in Cloth-Fair, and upon the back-side of his house we stood listening a good while, and heard presses a working. Upon that I came to the fore-part, by Mr. L'Estrange's order, and knocked; but none would answer: I took the constable's staff, and knocked again; and none would answer yet. After that Mr. L'Estrange knocked near half an hour; and no body coming, he at last sent for a smith's hammer to force it open. Afterwards they came down and opened the door. Then Mr. L'Estrange and the printer (Mr. Mabb) went up stairs: I continued below with the constable and the king's messenger, to observe whether any went in or out. After which, some sheets fell down on the other side of the house. Meeting with one of them, and perceiving they had discovered the sheets they enquired after, I read some part of it: and finding what it was, I went up, and found the sheets thrown behind the door. Mr. Twyn (said I) I wonder you would print such a thing as this: you could not chuse but know that it was very dangerous to do any such thing. He answered, 'That he did not consider what it was.' Questionless, said I, you could not but know it was very dangerous; for when you revised it, you must needs know the sense of it. I think it was a dangerous business; what did you think of it? Says he, 'I thought he was a good smart angry fellow; it 'was mettlesome stuff;' or to that purpose. This was the substance of our discourse.

I did see some of the sheets printed on one side, and some on both sides: the form lay disordered; yet not so but there was one corner of it yet remaining, and I having the sheet in my hand did compare them together, and to the best of my remembrance, I do remember these very words, 'Execution of Judgment,' and 'Lord have.'

Lord Hyde. Who did he say revised the press?

Dickenson. He seemed to confess that he had corrected it himself: for when I urged it to him, That he could not chuse but know the matter of it by reading it; truly, says he, 'I thought he was an angry smart fellow: it was 'good mettlesome stuff, indeed.'

Judge Keeling. The question asked by my Lord is, Whether he did confess he revised it, or whether you did collect it from his reply?

Dickenson. Truly, by that answer I guessed he corrected it.

Recorder. Did he confess that he read it?

Dickenson. I put that question to him; and, to the best of my remembrance, he did not deny it.

Lord Hyde. To Mr. L'Estrange he confessed he read it over.

Thomas Mabb sworn.

My Lord, I was with Mr. L'Estrange in this man's house; and being there, going up, we found the press had been lately at work. There was at each press a sheet laid; I took them off the tinpin [some of the jury understand that term:] they were just laid upon the points, printed on one side. I gave Mr. L'Estrange these two sheets, the same with these [shewing two sheets], some were perfect, others imperfect. I could not find the form a great while. I gave him the sheet to peruse; and in the mean while I went down, and below I found the two forms, but broken: somewhat indeed was standing; whereof I took part in my hand, and read in the letters. Mr. Dickenson having the sheets, he heard what I read, and looking on the sheets, found them agree.

Twyn. What were the words that you read?

Mabb. The words were 'Execution and Judgment,' and 'Lord have.' There was a back pair of stairs out of his press-room, partly between his house and his neighbours; and in the hurry they had thrown the sheets down there; part fell behind the door, and part at the bottom. When I questioned him how many was done, he said 500; but I adjudged those I saw to be about 750. Looking again over the door, I espied the remainder of the sheets, about 250 more, and I brought them together; and then he owned there was 1,000.

Lord Hyde. What else do you know?

Mabb. At the constable's house I heard him use the words, that 'it was mettlesome stuff,' and that 'no body corrected it but himself.' Said I, I wonder you would offer to do it; you could not compose it, but you must understand it. Said he, 'It was my bad fortune to meddle with it.' Said I, You lost a press but a little while since, I wonder you would do this. He seemed to be sorrowful.

Serj. Morton. He did confess he corrected it?

Mabb. Yes, my Lord.

Twyn. No, my Lord, I did not.

John Wickham sworn.

Upon the 7th of October, as I take it, about four o'clock in the morning, Mr. L'Estrange came to my house, being one of the king's messengers, and told me I must go immediately with him to Cloth-Fair, and sent me to call one Mr. Mabb by the way. I met Mr. L'Estrange near Mr. Twyn's house between five and six o'clock: we had a constable, and went and knocked at the door: they knocked at least half an hour before they got in. I heard some papers tumbling down, and heard a rattling above, before they went up. But I stood at the back-door, to secure any from running out that way; and at last, when they said there were some sheets thrown into the next house, I went and looked, and there were two or three hundred, and they were wet, newly come off the press. That is all I can say.

Serj. Morton. Did you hear this man say that he had corrected it?

Wickham. No: but I having him in custody at my house, I asked him about it; he said, 'It was a very bitter thing, that it was his unhappy fortune to meet with it.'

Jury. Did he confess he printed it?

Wickham. Not to me.

Serj. Morton. He said, 'It was a bitter thing;' and that 'it was his unhappy fortune to meet with it.' Make the best of that; compare that with the rest of the evidence.

William Story sworn.

Gentlemen of the jury, upon the 7th of October last, early in the morning, I was sent for to Mr. L'Estrange into Cloth-Fair: we went to the house of this Twyn. After some time knocking, they went up stairs, and brought down several papers: I know not what they were. I went into the next house with Mr. Wickham, and there we found two or three hundred sheets, and brought them to Mr. L'Estrange. I asked the prisoner at my house, whether he could not write or read? He said, Yes. Did you not use to read what you printed? He said, Yes. Did not you know treason when you read it? 'It was a fiery thing; I did not mind it much: but I should have got money by it.'

Mabb. He owned he had but a very small price for the doing of it.

Mr. Joseph Williamson sworn.

That which I can say is, that I know this [looking upon a paper] to be my own hand writing, and to be the examination taken of this Twyn. I took it; and he owned it after it was written.

Serj. Morton. What was the substance of it?

I.d. Hyde. What did he confess before Mr. Secretary, when he was examined?

Williamson. He said, that the copy of the book was brought to him by one Evans, maid to Mrs. Calvert. That for the author, being asked if he knew him, he said he did not; and that he had seen the copy of three sheets of the book; that he had printed only two of those sheets, a thousand exemplaries of each.

Judge Keeling. Did he confess that?

Williamson. Yes. And further, That he had delivered them to this Evans at the sign of the Rose in Smithfield; that he himself had corrected those sheets he had printed, and that he had read them after they were printed; that for his pains and printing of them, he had received 40s. in part from this maid at the delivery of them at the Rose; that the maid carried away those exemplaries from the Rose; and that he parted with her at the door.

Serj. Morton. I hope you observe, gentlemen. We have now done: we desire the prisoner may give his answer to it; and then we shall make our reply.

Ld. Hyde. What say you? you have heard the witnesses, and what is laid to your charge

Twyn. I did never read a line of it in my life.

Ld. Hyde. That's impossible. I'll tell you: First, your own man, who set part, swears you did both set and print part of this book yourself: you gave him the title to set. You composed one part of the book, whilst he was composing another part. Is it possible you could compose, and not read a line of it? he tells you further, when the first sheet was printed, he brought it into the kitchen, and laid it down, knew not of any one in the house but yourself; about an hour, or an hour and half after, you brought it back again corrected, laid it down; and the hand that corrected it was not unlike your hand upon other corrections of books. Pray, brother Morton let the jury have books, and Mr. Lee read the Indictment, that they may see they agree.

Serj. Morton. I observed to you there were thirteen treasonable Paragraphs; you shall find them marked out in the margin.

Ld. Hyde. You shall see there are treasons with a witness: see the very Title.

Mr. Lee. [Reads the Title of the Indictment.] 'A Treatise of the Execution of Justice: wherein is clearly proved, that the Execution of Judgment and Justice is as well the peoples as the magistrates duty; and if the magistrates pervert Judgment, the people are bound by the law of God to execute Judgment without them and upon them.'

Ld. Hyde. That you gave to your man to set.

Mr. Lee reads, 'It is one of the scarlet sins of this nation, that the people suffered their Rulers, &c.'—The particular Passages are too impious to be published, and indeed too foul to be repeated, but in substance. Those mentioned in the Indictment are as follows:

1. The Supreme Magistrate is made accountable to the people.
2. The People are rebelliously incited to take the menage of the government into their own hands.
3. They are animated to take up arms, not only against the person of his sacred majesty, but likewise against the royal family.
4. They are stirred up to a Revolt (in that very term) as an action honourable and conscientious; making publication in the next clause of encouragement to any town, city, or country in the three nations to begin the work.
5. The people are laboured not only to cast off their allegiance to the king, but in direct terms to put his sacred majesty to death. And to the purposes before mentioned tends the whole scope of the Treatise.

Serj. Morton. You may judge of the rest by this: we will not put you to any more expence of time; there hath been sufficient treason in that which you have read.

Ld. Hyde. Now say what you will. But I must tell you, in those particulars that have been compared, there is as much villainy and slander, as is possible for the devil or man to invent: It is to destroy the king in his person, to rob him of the love and affections of his people; to destroy the whole family, and all government, ecclesiastical and civil. And this you read by yourself, owned, and caused to be printed.

Twyn. Except it was that sheet which Mr. L'Estrange read to me when I was taken, I never heard it before, nor read it.

Ld. Hyde. Your man swears that you did set and print part of it: It is impossible to compose and set, but you must read it. Nay, you did examine and correct the sheets; brought them up again. Mr. L'Estrange swears you confessed you read it over; it was 'mettlesome stuff.' Mr. Dickenson says, you did not say you read it over; but he saying to you it was impossible you should set it and not read it, you told him also it was 'mettlesome stuff.' You could not judge it to be 'mettlesome stuff,' but you must read it. There is Mr. Williamson says, that you confessed before Mr. secretary Bennet that you had seen three sheets, printed off two sheets; corrected those two sheets; and after printed, and delivered them; and that you had 40s. in part of payment. Besides this, when Mr. L'Estrange came first, you were up (nay, at two o'clock in the morning.) When they came and knocked at the door, they heard presses going, you would make no answer till they called a smith, with intent to force it open. When they came in, they found a form brought out of the printing-room, and broken, all but one corner; that taken up by a printer, and compared with the lines of the printed sheets, and found to agree. Some of the sheets were printed on one side only, the rest perfected, you threw them down stairs, part into your neighbour's house, you said, you were undone, when you understood Mr. L'Estrange was there. What needed all this, but that you knew what you were doing, and did it purposely to do mischief?

Twyn. I did never read or hear a line of it, but when Mr. L'Estrange read it when I was taken.

Judge Keeling. Was it printed at your house, or no?

Twyn. I know not but that it might: Not that I did it with my own hand.

Judge Keeling. The papers were found wet with you: Who was in your house?

Twyn. My two servants.

Judge Keeling. Did any set them at work but yourself? Did they work of their own heads?

Twyn. I did use to set them at work; but I did not set them on that particular work.

Ld. Hyde. Have you any thing else to say? God forbid but you should be heard; but the jury will not easily believe such denials against so much evidence:

Judge Keeling. Tell us to whom you carried this copy to be corrected?

Twyn. I know not who corrected it.

Ld. Hyde. If you have any thing to say, speak it; God forbid but you should have a full hearing; Say what you will.

Twyn. I say I did not read it, nor heard it, till Mr. L'Estrange read it.

Ld. Hyde. Have you any thing else?

Twyn. It is possible I may, upon consideration.

Ld. Hyde. We cannot spend all the day: I must let the jury know they are not to take your testimony.

Serj. Morton. I am counsel for the king: I shall reply, if he will say no more.

Judge Keeling. You have heard your charge; this is your time to make your answer: If you do not speak now, you must not speak after. Therefore if you have any thing to speak in your justification, or witnesses to call, now is your time.

Ld. Hyde. Let me give you this caution: We cannot spend time in vain; we have other business before us, and it grows late. The best counsel I can give you, is this: You said at first, that you desired to be tried in the presence of God. You are here in the presence of Almighty God, and I would to God you would have so much care of yourself, and do so much right to yourself, to declare the truth, that there may be means of mercy to you. The best you can now do towards amends for this wickedness you have done, is by discovering the author of this villainous book: If not, you must not expect, and indeed God forbid that there should be any mercy towards you.

Twyn. I never knew the author of it, nor who it was, nor whence it came, but as I told you.

Ld. Hyde. Then we must not trouble ourselves. Did you never see the hand before, with which this copy is written?—Twyn. No.

Ld. Hyde. I am very confident you would not then have been so mad, as to have taken such a copy; A copy fraught with such abominable treason and lies; abusing, in the first place, the late king that is dead, who was, I will be bound to say it, as virtuous, religious, pious, merciful, and just a prince as ever reigned, and was as villainously and barbarously used by his rebellious subjects. Nay, you have not rested here, but have fallen upon this king, who has been gentle and merciful beyond all precedent. Since he came to the crown, he has spared those that had forfeited their lives, and all they had: and he has endeavoured to oblige all the rest of his people by mildness and clemency. And after all this, for you to publish so horrid a book, you can never make amends: God forgive you for it.

Twyn. I never knew what was in it.

Ld. Hyde. You of the jury, I will say only this: That in point of law, in the first place, there is no doubt in the world, by the law of the land, the publishing such a book as this, is as high a treason as can be committed: by this he has endeavoured to take away the life of the king, and destroy the whole family, and so consequently to deliver us up into the hands of foreigners and strangers. It is a great blessing that we have the royal line amongst us. But, I say, there is no question (and my brothers will declare the same, if you doubt it) that this book is as fully treason by the old statute, as much the compassing and endeavouring the death of the king, as possible: And he rests not there, but incites the people to rebellion, to dethrone him, to raise war. And the publishing of this book is all one and the same, as if he had raised an army to do this. The proof is, That he set part, printed part, and corrected it; by his own confession, read it over, 'It was mettlesome stuff;' confessed how many sheets he printed; the reward and recompence, you took notice of it. And I presume no man among you can doubt but the witnesses have spoken true: and for his answer, you have nothing but his bare denial. And so we shall leave it to you.

Set Simon Dover to the Bar.

Dover. My lord, I pray time, till Monday morning: I have sent away the copy of my indictment.

Ld. Hyde. The sessions will be done to-night: Mr. Recorder and the rest are to go away on Monday; and therefore we must end to-night.

Dover. I beseech your lordship I may have time till night.

Ld. Hyde. Men clamour, and say they are hardly used, their trials being put off: Are you content to lie in gaol till the next sessions?

Dover. No, my lord, I have had enough of that: We are willing now to have it tried.

Ld. Hyde. You have had a kindness done to you, that it is not laid treason; and therefore go on to your trial. But because you shall not say you are surprized, if you will not go on now, you must lie in the gaol till the next sessions: We cannot bail you.

Dover. My lord, the indictment is full of law, and I understand not the formalities of it: I desire but till 4 o'clock.

Ld. Hyde. We must do it before we go to dinner, or not at all; for there is judgment to be given to the gaol, and all of us Judges are commanded by the king to attend him to-night.

Dover. I am not able to plead to it.

Ld. Hyde. Then because you shall not say you had not all the right imaginable, we will dispatch the rest of the gaol to-night, and adjourn the sessions till Monday morning, and you shall then have a fair trial, by the help of God. You and your company, Nathan Brooks and Thomas Brewster, are you all desirous to be tried on Monday morning?

All Three. Yes.

Ld. Hyde. Because you shall not want advice; or any thing else, you shall have all the liberty you will desire, to send for persons; but you must be prisoners till then.

All Thres. We humbly thank y
Then the Jury went out; and after about half an hour's consultation, they returned to the Court, and took their places.

Clerk. Are you all agreed of your verdict.

Jury. Yes.

Clerk. Who shall say for you?

Jury. The foreman.

Clerk. Set John Twyn to the bar: Look upon him, my masters, how say you, is he Guilty of the High-Treason whereof he stands indicted, or Not Guilty?—Foreman. Guilty.

Cl. of Newgate. Look to him, keeper.

Clerk. Hearken to your verdict, as the court hath recorded it: You say that John Twyn is Guilty of the High-Treason whereof he stood indicted, and that at the time of committing the said Treason, or any time since, he had no goods, chattels, lands nor tenements, to your knowledge; and so you say all?

Jury. Yes.

Clerk. John Twyn, thou hast been arraigned for High-Treason, and thereunto hast pleaded Not Guilty, and for thy trial hast put thyself upon God and the country, and the country hath found thee Guilty; what canst thou say for thyself, why the court should not proceed to judgment, and thereupon award execution of death against thee, according to the law?

Twyn. I humbly beg mercy; I am a poor man, and have three small children, I never read a word of it.

Ld. Hyde. I'll tell you what you shall do: Ask mercy of them that can give it; that is of God and the king.

Twyn. I humbly beseech you to intercede with his majesty for mercy.

Cl. of Newgate. Tie him up, Executioner.

Crier. O Yes! My lords the king's justices command all manner of persons to keep silence while judgment is in giving, upon pain of imprisonment.

Ld. Hyde. John Twyn, and John Dunsmore, (one convicted for clipping of money) I am heartily sorry that your carriage and grievous offences should draw me to give that Judgment upon you that I must. It is the law pronounces it, God knows it is full sore against my inclination to do it; I will not trouble myself or you with repeating what you have done; but only this in the general, John Twyn, for you: Yours is the most grievous and highest treason, and the most complicated of all wickedness that ever I knew; for you have, as much as possibly lay in you, so reproached and reviled the king, the dead king, and his posterity, on purpose to endeavour to root them out from off the face of the earth. I speak it from my soul, I think we have the greatest happiness of the world, in enjoying what we do under so gracious and good a king; yet you in the rancour of your heart thus to abuse him! I will be so charitable to think you are misled. There's nothing that pretends to religion, that will avow or justify the killing of kings, but the Jesuit on the one side, and the Secetary on the other; indeed, it is a desperate and dangerous doctrine, fomented by divers of your temper, and it's high time some be made examples for it. I shall not spend my time in discourse to you, to prepare you for death; I see a grave person whose office it is, and I leave it to him. Do not think of any time here, make your peace with God, which must be done by confession, and by the discovery of those that are guilty of the same crime with you. God have mercy upon you; and if you so do, he will have mercy upon you. But forasmuch as you John Twyn have been indicted of High-Treason, you have put yourself upon God and the country to try you, and the country have found you Guilty: therefore the Judgment of the court is, and the court doth award, "That you be led back to the place from whence you came, and from thence to be drawn upon an hurdle to the place of execution; and there you shall be hanged by the neck, and being alive, shall be cut down, and your privy-members shall be cut off, your entrails shall be taken out of your body, and you living, the same to be burnt before your eyes; your head to be cut off, your body to be divided into four quarters and your head and quarters to be disposed of at the pleasure of the king's majesty. And the Lord have mercy upon your soul."

Twyn. I most humbly beseech your lordship to remember my condition, and intercede for me.

Lord Hyde. I would not intercede for my own father in this case, if he were alive.

The Behaviour and Speech of Mr. JOHN TWYN at his Execution.

In the interval betwixt the condemnation and execution of John Twyn, divers applications were made to him, in order both to his temporal and eternal good; and in particular, Mr. Weldon, the Ordinary of Newgate, spent much time and pains upon him, to convince him of that horrid crime for which he was to suffer; particularly pressing him to a confession both of his offence, and of the author of that treasonable piece for which he was to die. His answer was, That it was not his principle to betray the author, but it belonged to others; whereupon Mr. Ordinary demanded of him, What it was that could prevail with him to undertake the printing of it? He said, He was a poor man; that he had received 40s. and the promise of a larger sum, whereupon he undertook it; but who it was that made him that promise, he would not discover.

Mr. Ordinary did likewise further urge him to a confession of the Author, upon a confidence that such a discovery might save his life: to which he replied, That he neither could do it, nor did believe himself obliged to it, if he could; for better (says he) one suffer, than many. Being pressed to receive the blessed Sacrament, he returned, That he was not free to do it; he was against receiving according to the forms of this Church, and, he hoped he might do well enough without it ; and in this temper he continued until he came to the place of execution, where going up the ladder, Mr. Sheriff told him, That if he had any thing to say, he should remember the cautions he had given him.

Twyn. I suppose this appearance of people doth expect that I should say something as to the matter I come here for. It is true, I come here condemned as a Traitor, for printing a book, taken to be, owned to be, and judged to be scandalous and seditious.

Sir R. Ford. And treasonable, put that in too.

Twyn. For my own part, I can say this, I knew it not to be so, until I came to the bar to be tried : I was surprized in the doing of it, both in the beginning, and at last, I was clear and free in my own thoughts, as not to intend any sedition.

Sir R. Ford. I would not willing interrupt a dying man ; I told you before that you must not declare any thing in justification, or mitigation of so foul a crime ; but if you had any thing to say that was for the disburthening of your own conscience, or to give any good admonitions to the people to beware of falling into the like crime, you should be patiently heard ; but I wonder you should go about to justify yourself in this, when you did confess both to my brother here, and myself after Sentence, that that which was passed upon you was just and deserved.

Twyn. I do not say otherwise of it, but that it was just ; but as to my ignorance of the matter of intending or imagining to foment and contrive any such thing tending to such ends, but barely for getting a little money for my family ; I was as clear as the child unborn of any other design knowingly, of any such thing I do look upon it as a surprizal. First, I was surprized in this matter, by reason of that dangerous sickness and weakness I was in when it was brought ; I received it with my own hands, but it was wrapt up in waste paper, and so I delivered it to my servant, he went on with it : and two or three days after, it was taken from me by those that came to search my house, who themselves told me, they came upon information ; so that it was a matter I was surprized with when it was brought in, by reason of my sickness and weakness, being unable to overlook it : and likewise as soon as it was brought in the third day I was discovered in it, by some way of information ; and whether those that were the senders of it in, might not be the discoverers, I know not. Some discovery was made by the confession of those that searched my house : they came by information, not by chance. Then when they had taken me, I did ingenuously acknowledge and confess who I had it of ; and yet for all this the searching after those persons concerned, was neglected that whole day, though they were at home, and easy to be taken, I could prove it.

Sir R. Ford. Mr. Twyn, give me leave to tell you once more, that I am heartily sorry you have given me the occasion to interrupt you a second time ; all these things you pleaded at the bar, and said as much as you could ; the wisdom and justice of the bench did not think this to be a sufficient excuse of that treason you are found guilty of : I would ask to what end this discourse tends ? Tell me your end.

Twyn. My end is this, and it please your worship, to shew how ignorant and unacquainted I was with the nature of the thing ; and how far I was in my conscience from intending that Treason.

Sir R. Ford. You say you were surprized, and that you knew not the Treason ; was it not clearly and plainly (by your own servant) proved that you composed some part of it, and printed it yourself, and corrected it ? You understood English, or else you could not correct it ; if you understood English, or sense, you could not be ignorant that it was a horrid piece of Treason, such as no honest man ought to see and conceal one half hour ; therefore do not justify yourself, it serves not to any purpose here, or in the world to come : If you are not guilty of the malice, you have the more easy access to comfort hereafter ; but that will not help you here on earth : Pray spend that little time you have to some better purpose than this ; if you have any thing to say that may become a modest man to say, we are willing to hear it : If you can remember any person that assisted you in correcting it, or otherwise were concerned in it, say it.

Twyn. No person assisted me, I corrected it not ; it was carried out of my house to correct, and brought in corrected.

Sir R. Ford. You shall not say that you are denied that Christian liberty a dying man ought to have ; we are not to suffer any reflections on this business, you had a fair trial : I say, we would not deprive you of your liberty of speaking, but do not abuse that liberty that is given you, by spending your time impertinently, and fruitlessly ; but if you have any thing further to offer to God, which is more for your good, go to that.

Twyn. I shall forbear to insist any further, as to the narration of that matter ; I shall be very unwilling and tender of reflecting any thing upon the king, or the government, or give offence to your worships any way.

Sir R. Ford. Nothing but that shall offend us.

Twyn. I shall go to prayer.

Sir R. Ford. Do, do, we will join with you, and pray for you.

He continued in private prayer on the ladder some time.

Sir R. Ford. Executioner, do not turn him off, 'till he has given you a sign.

Mr. Ordinary of Newgate. Mr. Twyn, give a sign to the executioner, when you have done ; you must not throw yourself off, you will be your own executioner in that.

Twyn. Executioner, when I give you the sign, by pulling you by the shoe, then turn me off.

Executioner. I will, I will, the Lord bless thy poor soul.

Afterwards, the executioner coming down, Mr. Twyn told him, the sign should be by moving his foot.

Twyn. "O Lord, hear the Prayer of thy poor servant, receive me into thy mercy! Lord, in thee I believe, receive my spirit! Lord Jesus! let my prayers be acceptable in thy sight! O Lord, my strength, and my Redeemer! O Lord, I beseech thee, receive me into the arms of thy mercy; let me have an inheritance with thee, to live with thee for ever, and then come, Lord Jesus! come quickly!"

Then giving the sign, the Executioner did his office; and being cut down, his head was severed from his body, and his body divided into four quarters, which are to be disposed of as the king shall assign; since which time, his head is placed over Ludgate, and his quarters upon Aldersgate, and other gates of the city.

It will be here convenient to make two Observations upon the words of the prisoner:

First, he says, That the proofs were sent out of his house to be corrected, and brought back again corrected, and so not corrected by himself; which is not only contrary to what he formerly owned, as was made out by several proofs at his Trial, concerning his own correcting of it, but to his solemn declaration at the bar, avowing, that he knew nothing more of the business than what he there delivered: For, supposing such a confession; the next question would infallibly have been, To whom was it carried? or, Who corrected it? as the readiest way to the discovery of the author.

Secondly, he says, That the persons concerned (meaning Calvert, and her maid) were neglected that whole day, being at home, and easy to be taken, which is disproved; both by his own servants, and Mrs. Calvert's: And likewise proved, on the other side, That if he himself would have ordered his apprentice to have looked after the maid (as he promised, and was directed,) she had been secured that very morning; the fellow meeting her in St. Bartholomew's Close, within a quarter of an hour after his master was carried away, not knowing that she had any concern in the business. As to the mistress herself, she is, at present, under custody.

TRIAL OF DOVER, BREWSTER, AND BROOKS.

Monday Feb. 22, 1663.

The Court proclaimed.

Clerk. Set Simon Dover, Thomas Brewster, and Nathan Brooks to the bar.* Look to your challenges.

* "At the sessions in the Old Bailey 20 Feb. 15 Car. 2. Simon Dover, Tho. Brewster, and Nathan Brookes, printers and booksellers, were indicted at the common law, as for a great misdemeanour, for printing and publishing one book, called, The Speeches and Prayers of Harrison, Cook, Hugh Peters, and others con-

The same Jury sworn anew.

Clerk. Set Thomas Brewster to the bar, and the rest set by. You of the jury, look upon the prisoner; you shall understand that he stands indicted in London by the name of Tho. Brewster, &c. [and here he reads the Indictment] for causing to be printed, and selling a book called, The Speeches, &c. Upon this indictment he hath been arraigned, and thereunto hath pleaded Not Guilty, and for his, &c. Your charge is to inquire whether he be guilty of this sedition and offence, or Not Guilty. If you find him, &c.

Mr. North. May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury, Tho. Brewster stands here indicted of a foul misdemeanour; it is for causing to be printed, publishing and uttering a seditious, scandalous, and malicious book. The Indictment sets forth, That he not having, &c. [Here Mr. North opens the Indictment] and to this Indictment he hath pleaded Not Guilty. If there be sufficient demned for the murder of the late king, in which were many desperate passages, justifying their villainy; and another book called the Phoenix, or Solemn League and Covenant; in which also were passages of dangerous consequence. And they being found Guilty, it was resolved, That though printing be a trade, and selling of books also, yet they must use their trade according to law, and not abuse it, by printing or selling of books scandalous to the government, or tending to sedition. So in case of a counsellor at law, he may plead his client's cause against the king; but if, under colour of that, he takes upon him to vent sedition, he is to be punished.

"Memorand. Cooke's Case, a lawyer in Grays-Inn, who managed that villainous charge against the late king at his Trial, would have excused himself because he acted only as counsel; but that would not serve his turn; he was executed with the rest. And in this principal case the persons were told, that the king had dealt mercifully with them, that he did not proceed against them capitally, and they were all fined, viz. Brewster 100 marks, and Dover and Brookes 40 marks a piece, and every of them, to stand in the pillory, one day at the Exchange, from 11 to 1, and another day in Smithfield, for the same time, with their papers on their hats, declaring their offence, for printing and publishing scandalous, treasonable, and factious books against the king and government, and to lie in gaol without bail till the next gaol-delivery, and then to make an open confession and acknowledgment of their offences in such words as should then be directed; and afterwards to remain in prison during the king's pleasure, and not to be discharged before every one of them put in good sureties by recognizance, themselves in 400*l.* a piece, and two sureties for each of them in 200*l.* a piece, not to print or publish any books but such as shall be allowed by authority." Kelyng. p. 28.

proof of the charge, you are to find him guilty of the matter contained in it.

Thomas Creek, George Thresher, Thomas Loft, and Peter Bodvel sworn.

North. Tho. Creek, tell my lord and the jury what you know concerning Brewster, and your printing of a book called The Speeches, &c. and his uttering and publishing of it.

Creek. I shall, Sir. There is a mistake in the time, for it was before Christmas that Mr. Brewster, Mr. Calvert, and Mr. Chapman did come to me at the Cock in Little-Britain; and there they had some copy of the beginning of the Speeches of the men that suffered, that were the king's judges, and they spake to me to print it: and I did print part of the book, I cannot tell you how much, without I had the book, and then I can tell you how much I did print, [The book being shewed him] it this be my printing; I suppose it was done afterwards, another impression, and I must not own it in that. [He was shewed one of another impression] My lord, thus far I own; the printers that are of the jury will judge [pointing to the page] this is my letter, and here I ended.

Hyde. What folio is that you ended at?

Creek. You shall see, it is 36.

North. By whose orders did you print that?

Creek. They all gave me order together.

Ld. Hyde. They all? Name them.

Creek. Mr. Calvert, Brewster, and Chapman.

North. Did they charge you to do it privately?

Creek. With as much privacy and expedition as I could.

North. When you had printed them, what did you do with them?

Creek. I disposed of them by their order.

North. Did you print but one impression or more?

Creek. Yes, my lord, I did print but part of a second impression.

North. That we use as evidence, that he had uttered the first, because he went upon a second: How many did you print at first?

Creek. To my best remembrance, the first impression was 3000.

Ld. Hyde. These three employed you to print this book, and you printed to the 36th folio?—Creek. Yes.

Ld. Hyde. And who printed the other part?

Creek. I cannot say positively.

Ld. Hyde. Did these three afterwards direct you to give out the sheets to such and such persons, bookbinders, to stitch up and dispose of?—Creek. Yes.

Ld. Hyde. The first was three thousand, you say: what number did they take?

Creek. They had all; they sent for them of me as fast as I did them.

J. Keeling. Who did you send the proofs to?

Creek. They were sent for to my house.

J. Keeling. Sometimes by Calvert, sometimes his man, sometimes his maid, sometimes by Brewster.

Ld. Hyde. Do not you know, who began where you left off?

Creek. I am not able positively to say. I do believe, and I have heard, and spoken with them that said Mr. Dover did; but I cannot positively say it.

Ld. Hyde. You were not by, to see it done?

Creek. No.

Ld. Hyde. What grounds have you to believe that Dover printed the rest?

Creek. Grounds! Truly it is so long ago, to swear positively I cannot.

Ld. Hyde. It is but three years ago.

Creek. To the best of my remembrance, Mr. Dover in the time of printing it, did meet me, and converse with me about it; but to express time or place I cannot.

Ld. Hyde. Did you and he agree that he should print the other part?

Creek. No, my Lord; I had nothing to do to agree it with him.

Ld. Hyde. Did he declare to you that he printed the other?

Creek. To the best of my memory, he told me he printed some sheets.

North. Who changed sheets with you?

Creek. Some sheets were changed at Mr. Dover's.

J. Keeling. Who paid for printing?

Creek. Mr. Brewster paid me some, and some Mr. Calvert paid me.

Ld. Hyde. If you desire to ask him any questions, you may.

Brewster. By and by I shall, my Lord.

Dover. I desire he may tarry till I come to my trial.

Serj. Morton. Don't doubt it.

North. George Thresher, speak your knowledge to my Lord and the jury, whether Brewster did not bring you the book called The Speeches, &c. to be stitch'd, and what you did with them, tell the manner of it.

Thresher. May it please you my Lord, and the honourable bench, it is thus: This book it seems was printed, Mr. Brewster came to my house to know whether I could fold them, and stitch them in blue paper. That night I went to several printers, Mr. Dover was one of them, we had several sheets from thence, (I did not see them printed) I carried them home; and went about the working them that night.

J. Keeling. How many books were delivered to you?

Thresher. First and last, about 500.

J. Keeling. Who delivered them to you?

Thresher. Some were brought to my house.

J. Keeling. By whose direction?

Thresher. Mr. Brewster's.

J. Keeling. Did you deliver them to any body?

Thresher. Yes, to Nathan Brooks, ready stitch'd.

J. Keeling. Who paid you for them?

Thresher. Mr. Brewster for them he had, and Brooks for them he had.

North. Thomas Loft, tell your knowledge in this business.

Thomas Loft. May it please you, all that I can say is this: There was to the number of about or near upon a thousand, as I take it, folded and stitched in my master's house, one Mr. Perry, I was then his apprentice; they were sent in, as I judge, by Mr. Brewster's order, but I cannot positively say it: my master appointed us to do them; I saw Mr. Brewster there sometimes, but I cannot positively say that Mr. Brewster paid for the doing of them.

North. Did not your master press the dispatch?

Loft. My master did so; but I know not whether they conversed to that purpose.

North. Who fetched them away?

Loft. His then apprentice did fetch some of them from our house.

North. Peter Bodvel, tell my lord and the jury what you know.

Bodvel. I did carry some three years ago some bundles of books from Mr. Creek's house, and I think they were the bundles of The Speeches of the King's Judges.

Ld. Hyde. From whence had you them?

Bodvel. From Mr. Creek's.

North. What did you do with them? Were they sold?

Bodvel. I did see some of them sold in the shop.—North. Who sold them?

Bodvel. Myself, and my mistress sometimes.

Ld. Hyde. Were they brought to the shop to sell, by his privy?

Bodvel. I do believe he knew of them.

Ld. Hyde. By the oath you have taken, did he send you for them to the printers?

Bodvel. He or my mistress did.

Ld. Hyde. Has he been in the shop when they have been sold?

Bodvel. I cannot truly tell; it is three years ago.

J. Tyrrel. To whom did you pay the money that you received for them?

Bodvel. We put it in the box.

J. Keeling. Do not booksellers keep account what books they sell, and set down the money?

Bodvel. Not for Pamphlets.

Mr. North. Did he not send you to the book-binder's for them, when they were stitched?

Bodvel. It was by his or my mistress's order.

J. Keeling. What was your book-binder's name?—Bodvel. Perry.

J. Keeling. Where was this book kept? Publicly, as other books, or in other rooms.

Bodvel. In the shop, my lord.

J. Keeling. Were they publicly to view, as other books?

Bodvel. Not so public as other books, but public enough, Mr. L'Estrange knows.

Ld. Hyde. I know you use to let your titles of a new book lie open upon your stalls; did you lay these open?

Bodvel. No, my lord, they did not do so.

Ld. Hyde. Who was the cause they did not? Did your master direct the privacy?

Bodvel. I think he did, we had some direction to that end.

Ld. Hyde. Not to lay them open upon the stall?—Bodvel. No.

Ld. Hyde. Give the jury some books, and read the Indictment; let them be compared.

Clerk reads the Indictment: first the title; The Speeches and Prayers of some of the late king's judges, viz. major-general Harrison, October 13. Mr. John Carew, Oct. 15. Mr. justice Cook, Mr. Hugh Peters, Oct. 16, Mr. Thomas Scot, Mr. Gregory Clement, col. Adrian Scroope, col. John Jones, Oct. 17, col. Daniel Axtell, and col. Francis Hacker, Oct. 19, 1660. The times of their deaths, together with several occasional speeches, and passages in their imprisonment, till they came to the place of execution. Faithfully and impartially collected for further satisfaction.

Mr. Cook's Letter to a friend, fol. 40. 'And so I descend to the cause, for which I am in bonds; which is as good as ever it was: and I believe there is not a saint that hath engaged with us, but will wish at the last day that he had sealed to the truth of it with his blood, if thereupon called; for I am satisfied, that it is the most noble and glorious cause that has been agitated for God and Christ since the Apostolical times; being for truth, holiness, and righteousness, for our liberties as men, and as christians for removing all yokes and oppressions.' And fol. 41. 'It is such a cause, that the Martyrs would again come from Heaven to suffer for it, if they might: I look upon it as the most high act of justice that our story can parallel, &c.

[Not to trouble the reader with all the particulars mentioned in the Indictment; since the rest are but more of the same kind in other words.]

Ld. Hyde. What say you to this book?

Brewster. I desire to ask Mr. Creek a few questions: Mr. Creek how much of that in the Indictment did you print?

Creek. The jury may see if you please.

Ld. Hyde. Truly if he says true, he says he printed no part of that with which you are charged, but the title-page; he left off at folio 36, your charge is the Title, and beginning at fol. 40.

Brewster. So that you see he printed nothing for me that is in the Indictment.

J. Keeling. Did you print the Title?

Creek. Yes, my Lord.

Ld. Hyde. And you printed the rest, by his, Calvert's and Chapman's directions?

Creek. They delivered me the copy together to print.

Ld. Hyde. If you have any thing to say, speak to the Court, the jury will hear you.

North. Pray, my lord, give me leave to ask Creek one question: There were two impressions printed, did not you print more in one, than in the other?

Creek. I am upon my oath; to the best of my remembrance I printed the same that I did before, for I had some of it standing, and so I had the same sheets again.

North. Had you no more?

Creek. No, I had rather less.

Brewster. That is usual, he that prints the first, doth print the same of the second.

Ld. Hyde. He says he did so; what have you to say to the charge?

Brewster. I conceive that part that I ordered the printing of, is not included in the indictment.

Ld. Hyde. Yes, every part; he says in both impressions he printed to the 36th folio; and all the rest was printed by your direction.

Creek. No, my lord, I printed to the 36th folio by his direction, the rest was printed elsewhere.

J. Keeling. Your indictment was this, For causing to be printed this book, called The Prayers, &c. and for selling and uttering of it. For the evidence that you caused it to be printed, he swears you directed some, and it is not likely you would print half, and let the other half alone; we leave that to the jury. For your uttering, that anon.

Ld. Hyde. There are these two particular charges in the indictment, that you must answer: The first is, your causing it to be printed; and it is not essential, or of necessity, that every particular that is in the indictment be proved, to be done by you: you caused this book to be printed, with such a title; that he swears he did for you: then let the jury, or any man living, judge whether you did direct the book to be wholly perfected or by halves. The second charge is, that you uttered them: You delivered five hundred of these to be stitched up, and disposed of them, so that you are in effect both printer and publisher of the whole book.

Brewster. He speaks of one part that I ordered, there is no more proof, and that was but to the 36th page: he speaks also of somebody else that was present with me; and where they had the rest of the copy printed, he tells you he knows not.

Ld. Hyde. Have you any more to say?

Brewster. Yes, my lord, though he says I caused that part to be printed, yet he doth not say I did it maliciously, or with any design against the government.

Ld. Hyde. The thing speaks itself.

Brewster. Booksellers do not use to read what they sell.

Ld. Hyde. You have forgot what he swore; you brought the proof.

Brewster. He did not swear that; he says Mr. Calvert's man, and sometimes others.

Ld. Hyde. Ask him again.

Creek. I did declare that the proofs were sent for, and carried away and read, sometimes by Mr. Calvert's man and others, and sometimes by his servants, not by himself; they were wrapt up and sent.

Ld. Hyde. For a man to pretend he did not know, when, he being master, sends for his proofs by his servant; for any man to suppose this is not the master's act, (nay, and directing it to be done privately) you shall never find a man guilty: they were sold in his shop.

Brewster. The grand part of the indictment lies, That it was done maliciously, and seditiously, and then it says knowingly: though it be granted I did do it, and sell it, yet it does not follow that I did it maliciously and seditiously; I did it in my trade: we do not use to read what we put to print or sell. I sav, my lord, selling of books is our trade, and for the bare exercising of it, knowing nothing of evil in it; it came out in a time too, when there were no licensers, or appointed rules; so that whatever was done we are not accountable for, for we read very seldom more than the title, that some of the jury knows; so that I hope I cannot be said to do it maliciously or knowingly. I can give testimony I am no person given to sedition, but but have been ready to appear upon all occasions against it.

Ld. Hyde. Have you any more? If you have, say it.

Brewster. My lord, they are the sayings of dying men, commonly printed without opposition.

Ld. Hyde. Never.

Brewster. I can instance in many; the bookseller only minds the getting of a penny: that declares to the world, that as they lived such desperate lives, so they died; so that it might shew to the world the justice of their punishment; and so I think it a benefit, far from sedition. It was done so long ago too, it was not done in private, it went commonly up and down the streets, almost as common as a Diurnal: it's three years and a quarter ago, or thereabouts.

Justice Tyrrel. You speak of your behaviour, have you any testimony here?

Brewster. I do expect some neighbours; Major-General Brown knows me, Capt. Sheldon, Capt. Colchester, and others: I can give a very good account as to my behaviour ever since.

L. Hyde. Say what you will, and call your witnesses, and make as much speed as you can.

Justice Keeling. There is another indictment against you, and while that is trying, your neighbours may come.

Brewster. My Lord, I shall desist for the present.

Serj. Morton. May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury; I am of counsel for the king against Thomas Brewster, bookseller, that stands here indicted, for that he, contrary to the duty of his allegiance which he owes to our sovereign lord the king, did cause maliciously a seditious and scandalous book to be printed wherein there are divers scandalous clauses contained, that are in disparagement of the king's royal prerogative, and against his government, crown and dignity; and likewise that he hath sold and uttered the same books in contempt of his majesty's laws. This is the effect of the indictment: it has been proved to you by four witnesses, that for which he stands indicted; First, that he did cause part of the book to be printed; that's clearly proved by Greek: likewise that he has sold and uttered those books in his shop: nay, he confesses that he did, and says they were sold openly as a Diurnal; and therefore he thinks it was lawful for him to do it. He has gone about to make a defence of this his seditious behaviour; he tells you he did not print all the book; it is not said that he printed such and such a letter of the book, but that he caused such a book to be printed: and it is to be presumed, if he caused one part he would cause the other, or otherwise it would be a book of maimed sense and imperfect. Gentlemen, for the uttering and selling of them, that himself confesses: you have heard the excuses he hath made, whether you will not find him guilty of this crime, that I must leave to you, and to the direction of the court.

Ld. Hyde. You of the jury, you see the indictment is for causing a libellous and seditious book to be printed, under such a title, that is, The Speeches and Prayers, &c. it is for causing this, seditiously, factiously and wickedly to be printed; and for selling and publishing it abroad to the king's people. For the matter of evidence you have heard it: I will not repeat the particulars to you, only something to what he has said, that you may not be mis-led. First, he says, it does not appear, that he did it maliciously or knowingly; there are some things that you that are of the jury are not to expect evidence for, which it is impossible to know but by the act itself. Malice is conceived in the heart, no man knows it unless he declares it: as in murder, I have malice to a man, no man knows it; I meet this man and kill him; the law calls this malice. If a man speaks scandalous words against a man in his calling or trade, he lays his action, malice, though he cannot prove it but by the words themselves. If I say Printer or Stationer is an ignorant person, has no skill in his trade, I would not have any man to deal with him, he understands not how to set letters, or the like: here is nothing of malice at all appears, yet if you bring your evidence, you must lay it maliciously; it is the destroying your trade, and you will have damages. I instance in this particular, that you may see there is malice supposed to a particular private person in that slander, much more to the king and the State. The thing itself, in causing a book to be printed that is so full of scandals and lies, to inveigle, misguide, and deceive the people, this is, in construction of the law, malice; and though no malice appear further. The next is this; factiously, seditiously, knowingly: this carries sedition as well as malice. Such a barbarous transcendent wretch that murdered his prince, without the least colour of justice to declare that he rejoiced in his bonds; and that the martyrs would willingly come from heaven to suffer for it. Horrid blasphemy! All the saints that engaged in it, to wish that they had sealed it with their blood! What can you have more to encourage and incite the people to the killing of kings, and murdering their lawful prince! This they publish, and say it was spoken publicly; let it be upon his own soul that did it: for in case he did it, no man knew it but those that heard it. But to publish it all over England, 3,000 of the first impression, and a second; this is to fill all the king's subjects with the justification of that horrid murder: I will be bold to say, not so horrid a villainy has been done upon the face of the earth, since the crucifying of our Saviour. To print and publish this, is sedition. The next thing is your trade. I have a calling to use, and I may justify the using of it, so long as I use it lawfully; but that must not justify me in all manner of wickedness against the king and state. As if a lawyer, I will put it in my own court, plead a man's cause, and against the king; this is justifiable, he ought to plead for his client, but he must plead as becomes him. If a lawyer in defence of his client will speak sedition, do you think he is free from being punished? So of a printer; if a printer prints seditious and factious books, he must look to himself; that's no part of his calling to poison the king's people: so though printing of a book be lawful, he must use it as the law appoints him, and not to incite the people to faction. Writing of letters you know it is common and lawful; but if I write treasonable letters, give notice to rise, do such and such unlawful acts, I am to be punished for these letters. A printer he is a public agent, he is to do what he is able to answer, or else he must take what follows. He says, There was no act against him: it is true, you see he is not indicted upon the statute, but at the common law, for an offence in the nature of a libel. If I were a printer, and would compile a pamphlet against a man, though not in authority, and disparage him, this is the publishing of a libel, and an offence for which I ought to be indicted, and punished by the common law; and he that prints that libel against me, as a public person, or against me as sir Robert Hyde; that printer, and he that sets him at work, must answer it, much more when against the king and the state. Another thing is this; he talks to you of dying men's words: if men will be so vile to be as wicked at their deaths, as they had been in their lives; put the case of that man on Saturday convicted for printing a horrible villainous thing, if he will be so unchristian to himself, as to justify this at his death, or to speak as bad as he had caused to be printed, is that a justification to publish them, because they are the words of a dying man? God forbid. A robber declares upon the gallows, it is for a noble cause, for taking a purse upon the highway, that it is an unjust law to condemn to death for such crimes. Shall any man publish this in print, and not be liable to be punished for it? If any that were tried here upon Saturday, shall vilify the Lord Mayor, or any of the bench, traduce them for doing of justice, shall this go unpunished, if a man take it up and print it? This I speak to let you see this is without colour of law: He pretended he did it not knowingly; I will not repeat the evidence; He sent for them, had them stitched, caused them to be kept privately, not upon the stall. And observe, he tells you it was done long ago: it is but three years ago that they were as publicly sold as Diurnals, he says. I shall repeat no more, I know you are men of understanding, and of obedience to your king; it is high time to take notice of this dispersing of pamphlets: if therefore you do believe that he did cause it to be printed, or published it, or both, he is Guilty of the misdemeanor laid in the Indictment; (and he hath a great kindness in that it is not made capital:) If you do believe that he did either cause it to be printed or published, that's enough to find him Guilty of this Indictment.

Clerk. Hearken to the other Indictment: He stands indicted in London, &c. and this for causing to be printed a certain book called the Phoenix, &c. publishing the same [the Indictment was wholly read]. To this Indictment he hath pleaded Not Guilty; so your issue is to enquire whether he be Guilty of this offence, or Not Guilty.

Mr. North opened the Indictment in manner as before. To this he hath pleaded Not Guilty; if the Charge of the Indictment be sufficiently proved, you are to find him Guilty.

Serj. Morton. May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the Jury, here is another Bill of Indictment preferred against Thomas Brewster; it is, that contrary to the duty of his allegiance to his sovereign lord the king, and purposely to incite the people to sedition, and to withdraw them from their natural allegiance to the king, he hath caused to be imprinted, maliciously, falsely and scandalously, a certain scandalous book, entitled The Phoenix, &c. And this he hath done to disturb the peace of the kingdom, and to withdraw the people from their allegiance; and to the scandal of his majesty's government, he hath caused this book to be printed, uttered and sold: and this we take to be a great offence against the king, and his crown and dignity. Gentlemen, the dispersing of seditious books is of great danger to the kingdom; false rumours, they are the main incentives that stir up the people to sedition and rebellion, that raise discontentments among the people, and then presently they are up in arms. Dispersing seditious books is very near a-kin to raising of tumults; they are as like as brother and sister: raising of tumults is the more masculine; and printing and dispersing seditious books, is the feminine part of every rebellion. But we shall produce our witnesses, we shall prove that this Thomas Brewster caused this book to be printed; That when it was printed he did receive 300; That these he caused to be stitched up; That he uttered and sold them, part in his own shop, and part elsewhere. It being an offence of that great and dangerous consequence, which tends to the disturbance of the peace of the kingdom; I hope you will take it into your serious consideration, and if the matter stand proved against him, you will give him his due demerit.

Creek, Thresher, Loft and Bodvel sworn again.

Mr. North. Creek, tell my lord and the jury what you know of the printing of the book called The Phoenix.

Creek. My lord, it was in May that Mr. Calvert, Brewster, and Chapman brought that book to me to print.

L. C. J. Hyde. What book? Name it.

Creek. The Phoenix, &c. it was printed for them three. All that I can say is, that Mr. Brewster's part was delivered to me by his direction.

L. C. J. Hyde. Who paid you for printing it?

Creek. Mr. Brewster paid for his part.

J. Keeling. How many was his part?

Creek. His part of 2,000, that was 600 and odd.

L. C. J. Hyde. These three men joined to bear each man his share.

Creek. Yes, every man was to have his share.

J. Keeling. Did he wish you to do it with privacy?

Creek. Yes, with expedition and privacy.

Brewster. Was the copy written or printed?

Creek. It was all printed formerly, some in quarto, some in octavo, and might have been bought single in any place almost.

L. C. J. Hyde. What do you mean by all printed formerly?

Creek. My lord, they were in several parcels printed; there was Mr. Calamy's sermon, and Mr. Douglas's sermon, and the rest.

J. Keeling. How long ago was it since they were brought to you to print?

Creek. It was in May, three years.

Brewster. Did I order you how you should print them, or Mr. Calvert? Did not you hear him say, that they had staid two hours for me at an alehouse to be his partner?

Creek. I did hear him say so.

J. Keeling. What made you so loath to be their partner? Were they two hours persuading of you?

Creek. No, they waited two hours for him to be their partner.

Serj. Morton. Thresher, did Brewster deliver any of those books to you to stitch up?

Thresher. Yes, and please you, my lord, and I had them by Mr. Brewster's order to fold.

Serj. Morton. How many?

Thresher. To the number of 2 or 300.

Mr. North. Did he not enjoin you privacy?

Thresher. Yes, I think he did.

J. Keeling. When they were bound, had you a note to deliver those books safely to any?

Thresher. Yes, from his own hand; he desired me to go and give them to such and such persons, booksellers. Said I, I shall hardly remember them: he thereupon gave me a note of their names to whom I should deliver them; I judge they were to be trusted more than others.

Serj. Morton. Did you deliver them accordingly?—Thresher. Yes, I did.

E. C. J. Hyde. How many did you deliver in that manner?

Thresher. Two dozen and more.

J. Keeling. If you will ask him any questions, do.

Brewster. Did I give you any order to deliver them to any particular booksellers?

Thresher. Yes, you did; I believe Mr. L'Estrange and Mr. Williams (one of the jury) can remember I shewed them the paper you wrote to that purpose.

Mr. Williams. I did see the note.

Brewster. I do not remember I gave you any order, they were all common things before.

J. Keeling. You may ask him what questions you will.

Brewster. I shall ask him no more.

Mr. North. Peter Bodvel, speak what you know concerning the selling or uttering the book called The Phoenix, &c.

Bodvel. I never knew of the printing of them, I never knew my master sell any of them, nor heard him give order for selling of them.

J. Keeling. Did you sell any of them for him?—Bodvel. I think I did sell some.

Serj. Morton. Were they in the shop to be sold?—Bodvel. Yes, they were.

L. C. J. Hyde. Were they in the shop publicly, with the title-page lying open upon the stall, as other books do, when they are newly out?

Bodvel. We seldom did so with bound books.

J. Keeling. Where were the books found when they were seized?

Bodvel. I think they were in some of the upper rooms.

J. Keeling. Where were they found, by the oath you have taken?

Bodvel. That Mr. L'Estrange can tell better than I, I did not see him find any of them.

L. C. J. Hyde. By the oath you have taken where was the place whence you were to fetch them, when you were to sell them?

Bodvel. In the Hall, the room over the shop.

L. C. J. Hyde. Were they put up privately?

Bodvel. They were so.

Just. Keeling. What private place was that?

Bodvel. It was a hole in the wall.

Just. Tyrrel. By whose direction were they laid there?

Bodvel. I know not whether by his, or my mistress's.

Just. Keeling. Were not some found under the bed?

Bodvel. I heard that Mr. L'Estrange found some of the titles under the bed.

Serj. Morton. I think it is enough; what say you to it, friend?

L. C. J. Hyde. Observe this, and answer it: It appears that you and two more (Calvert and Chapman) did agree with Creek for printing this book (several parcels drawn into one volume) and you were to bear each of you a third part; and to have a third part of the books, he swears you did both pay your part, and had your part of the books: these books were printed before, and so they were common enough, and therefore you must needs know what was in them. The third full part was brought to you and delivered by your appointment; you gave a note how they should be disposed of, and you owned them not in public: (your own soul told you they were not to be justified) two dozen were delivered privately to particular persons by your direction. Lay these things together, and now answer them: for the indictment is, that you caused such a book to be printed and published.

Brewster. In the first place, the evidence does say, that Mr. Calvert did acknowledge when he gave him the copy to print, that he staid so long for me, in order to be their partner, he that was the collector of it together. They were all printed before, and printed by licence: for the books I never read them: we seldom read the books we sell, being they were before printed, and with licence sold single, (as the gentlemen of the jury know) I thought there was no crime to print them all together. It was done in an interval when there were no licensers, we knew not where to go: what has been printed formerly, we took it for granted it might be reprinted, until this late act for printing; and this was done before this act.

Just. Keeling. Have you any more to say?

Brewster. No, my lord, I shall leave it to the jury. But my lord, here are now some neighbours to testify that I am no such person as the indictment sets forth, that I did maliciously and seditiously do such and such things.

L. C. J. Hyde. We will hear them, though I will tell you it will not much matter; the law says it is malice.

Capt. Sheldon sworn. My Lord, all that I can say is, he was ready at beat of drum upon all occasions; what he has been guilty of by printing or otherwise, I am a stranger to that; I know he was of civil behaviour and deportment amongst his neighbours.

Just. Keeling. It is very ill that the king hath such trained-soldiers in the band.

Capt. Hanson and others offered to like purpose.

L. C. J. Hyde. If you have a thousand to this purpose only, what signifies it?

Just. Keeling. Are you his captain?

Capt. Sheldon. No, my lord, Captain Bradshaw.

L. C. J. Hyde. He should be cashiered the band; not but that he should be charged with arms. I will tell you, do not mistake yourself, the testimony of your civil behaviour, going to church, appearing in the trained-bands, going to Paul's, being there at common service, this is well: but you are not charged for this; a man may do all this, and yet be a naughty man in printing abusive books, to the misleading of the king's subjects. If you have any thing to say as to that, I shall be glad to find you innocent.

Brewster. I have no more to say.

Lord Hyde. Then, you of the jury, there are some things in this indictment (as in the other) necessary to be stated to you ; my brothers and I have consulted here about it : the indictment is for causing a factious and seditious book, called The Phoenix, &c. with divers other things therein, to be printed. But, pray let them see the book, and compare it with the indictment.

Clerk. [Reads the indictment, and first the Title.] The Phoenix, or the Solemn League and Covenant. [Edinburgh, printed in the year of Covenant-Breaking.] A king abusing his power, to the overthrow of religion, laws, and liberties, which are the very fundamentals of this contract and covenant, may be controuled and opposed. And if he set himself to overthrow all these by arms ; then they who have power, as the estates of a land, may and ought to resist by arms ; because he doth by that opposition break the very bonds, and overthrow the essentials of this contract and covenant. This may serve to justify the proceedings of this kingdom against the late king, who in an hostile way set himself to overthrow religion, parliament, laws, and liberties. [The rest is much at the same rate, only now and then a spice of blasphemy, for the credit of the holy league : A greater sin (is the breach of that Scotch' covenant, according to our author, pag. 158.) than a sin against a commandment, or against an ordinance, &c.]

L. C. J. Hyde. You of the jury, you see the indictment agrees with the book. There is a great deal of mercy that this man hath not been indicted of Treason ; for those very particulars you have heard are as high treason as can be. First, he doth declare, that the king abusing his power, the people may resist, and take up arms against him : that is express treason, without any more ado. Then he tells you what a horrid thing it is to break that Solemn League and Covenant ; justifies the raising of arms and rebellion against the late king, unthroning and murdering of him. I tell you that Solemn League and Covenant was a most wicked and ungodly thing, against the law of God, and the law of the land. To have such villainous stuff to be published, it is a great mercy of the king it had not been drawn higher. You see the man is so far from acknowledging any guilt, that he justifies the fact.

Brewster. No, my lord, I do not justify myself.

L. C. J. Hyde. Yes, you do. The printer swears he was to go share and share alike : he had his part ; he publishes them to some particular friends : I say he justifies this. He tells you in his defence, That it was commonly printed ; that it was done by printed copy, and that done formerly by licence ; and when things are printed by licence, they do not expect or need any new or second licence : They were commonly sold asunder ; here they are only printed together. That he says is nothing. What is this but justifying the printing of it ! Observe, weigh, and see what kind of defence here is. The Title, what is it ? ' The Phoenix, or Solemn League and Covenant.' You all know it, and rue it. When was it printed ? It was when the wicked rebels here could not seduce sufficient numbers of the king's subjects to support their rebellion ; and then they invite their dear brethren (as they called them) the Scots, to unite with them. The Scots were cunning ; they would not do it till they had entered into a covenant, in a league ; and then they consent to unite with the rebels here. This league and covenant was indeed in defence of the king ; but how long ? So long as he defended them (the Presbytery and Scotch discipline). When they had got this good king into their hands, they put what terms upon him they pleased ; and then were these seditious sermons printed. Douglas's was printed in Scotland ; was it licenced here ? No, it was done there, and brought hither. Then for the other sermon, by what licence was that printed ? Observe the time when it was printed ; was it not to set forward rebellion, to set up the Scotch Presbytery ; and this in forty-five, when they were in arms against the king, after the king put himself upon his defence, and was at Oxford ? Do you tell me of the licence of rebels then for your justification ? Now, when the king is so happily returned, now to publish these things afresh to the people, that they might do the same again ? And I tell you once again, it is mercy in the king that he was not indicted for treason. I shall leave it to you, you have had it fully proved.

Clerk. Set Simon Dover to the bar. [And here the Indictment is read.]

Mr. North opens this Indictment as the rest.

Serj. Morton. We have but two witnesses, and they will prove the matter clearly. There were two impressions of this book ; we will prove he had a share in both of them.

Creek sworn again.

Creek. I delivered before what I can say.

Judge Keeling. Look you, you must deliver all that evidence over again, because it concerns another person.

Creek. I did say, and say still, That, to the best of my memory, Mr. Dover did print part of that book, and that he and I did converse about it in the time it was doing ; but I cannot swear it positively, because I cannot remember the time when, or the place where.

Judge Keeling. Did you change sheets with him ?

Creek. With him, I cannot say ; but some sheets were changed by our men.

Serj. Morton. You say you think you had some discourse with him : Did not you speak about the danger of printing it ?

Creek. We talked of making an end of it.

Serj. Morton. Can' you remember to what letter you printed ?

Creek. I have shewed the gentlemen of the jury.

Judge Keeling. Had you no discourse of the danger of it ?

Creek. I thought it could not come to any thing: I did tell sir R. Brown, (then lord-mayor) That if they hanged twenty more, I thought I should print their speeches.

Judge Keeling. You knew the contents of the book?

Creek. Yes, I did.

Judge Keeling. Such men as you, the king and the government hath a great interest in your trade: That you shall think it lawful to print what a man says when he dies, and to scatter it abroad, though never so bad, it is a great offence: I would not have it pass for so clear a thing.

L. C. J. Hyde. If you are of such principles, to print what you list, you are not fit to live in a civil place; for a printer or bookseller to print any thing one against the other, is actionable. Do you think the press is open to print what you list?

Creek. I did so then.

L. C. J. Hyde. I will deal plainly with you: For this book, if you had had your due, you ought both to have been drawn, hanged and quartered. When did you give Mr. L'Estrange information of this matter?

Creek. Lately, when I was a prisoner in Ludgate.

Mr. Royston. [One of the jury] I desire to ask him one question: Whether Mr. Creek saw this book a printing at Mr. Dover's house, or no?

Creek. No, I did not.

Serjeant Marton. They changed sheets.

Thresher sworn.

Thresher. This is all that I have to say, That the first night that Mr. Brewster sent for me to stitch these books, it was very late before we could get them: I went that night to Mr. Dover's, and had some of the sheets, the rest at Mr. Creek's. I did not see him print any of them.

Serjeant Morton. What quantity was there of them?

Thresher. I suppose there was two or three hundred sheets.

Mr. North. Were they not of this book?

Thresher. Yes, of the Speeches.

Mr. North. Where were they delivered?

Thresher. In the lower room: I suppose some of them were hanging upon lines before I had them.

L. C. J. Hyde. What say you to it?

Dover. I desire to ask him some questions. I do say I never saw the man before: I would ask whether ever he saw me before in his life?

Thresher. Not before that: I was never in his house but that night. By this token I saw you, and you me: when I came for the sheets, you asked Mr. Brewster whether he and Mr. Calvert were agreed, or else you would not deliver the sheets.

Dover. I desire to know what time and place: I am charged in the indictment on a day and place.

L. C. J. Hyde. That is not very material.

Dover. He fixes nothing on me.

L. C. J. Hyde. That the Jury can best tell: have you any more questions?

Dover. No, my Lord.

[The Indictment and Books were compared.]

Dover. My Lord, there is no person swears that I printed it, or part of it: nothing fixed upon me.

L. C. J. Hyde. The first man swears that you set it to printing.

Creek. I do not swear it positively; I never saw him print a sheet: it was the report of the town that he did it.

L. C. J. Hyde. You printed it: for whom?

Creek. For Brewster, Calvert, and Chapman.

L. C. J. Hyde. But you say that you and he did converse about it when it was printing.

Creek. I did say, To the best of my memory we did.

L. C. J. Hyde. By the oath you have taken, who did you change sheets with?

Creek. I cannot say I did change any with him: I say that some sheets were changed by my men, and they told me they had them of his men.

Dover. Where are those men that changed the sheets? Which of my men are they?

Justice Keeling. Look you, Dover, you are indicted for causing to be printed this wicked book, and for publishing and vending of it. You are a printer by your trade, as well as this man that comes against you: He says he did not see you print it; but he took it, and believed that you printed it. I tell you how far that weighs: you are a printer by trade; and comes the other and desires the sheets; you would not deliver them unless Mr. Brewster and Mr. Calvert were agreed. How comes the sheets to your house, being a printer, and yet you not print it? Answer that.

Dover. I shall, my Lord: it is no consequence at all. Admit I had these sheets, it is no consequence at all that I printed them; for printers and booksellers usually have books they did not print themselves.

L. C. J. Hyde. Thresher, by the oath that you have taken, did you see those sheets hang upon the line in his house?

Thresher. My Lord, I judged these had lately hung up: and I saw other sheets hanging there; and I knew nothing to the contrary but those that hung upon the line were the same with these.

L. C. J. Hyde. Here are sheets upon the lines; you delivered him to fold part of those on the lines: what would you have more plain? you would not deliver them, if they were not agreed: then they were agreed, and you delivered them.

Dover. I say this; I look upon the witness to be altogether invalid: he is a person of no good repute.

L. C. J. Hyde. A better man than you, for aught appears: you are indicted for a foul offence, so is not he.

Dover. I am not the man you take me to be.

L. C. J. Hyde. You shall have evidence, if you will, that you are at work at this time upon as bad as this.

Dover. If it be a crime, I am sorry for it.

Mr. L'Estrange sworn.

Mr. L'Estrange. Shall I speak to the whole matter, or only to the particular you last mentioned?

L. C. J. Hyde. Say your knowledge.

Mr. L'Estrange. When I came to his house, which was about the middle of October, to search, I found at that present a little unlicensed quaking book; and in his pocket the libel that was thrown up and down the town, called, Murder will out, ready printed.

L. C. J. Hyde. Which was a villainous thing, and scattered at York.

Mr. L'Estrange. Since that, I was at his house, to compare a flower which I found in the Panther, (a dangerous pamphlet); that flower, that is, the very same border, I found in his house; the same mixture of letter, great and small, in the same case; and I took a copy off the press. I found over and above this letter, [producing the letter] dated the 7th of February, 1663, and directed, For my dear and loving wife, J. Dover. Is it your lordship's pleasure I shall read it all?

L. C. J. Hyde. If it be touching the printing of things you found, do.

Mr. L'Estrange reads it. "I would fain see my sister Mary; therefore sister Hobbs will not come, take her order, and instead of her name, put in sister Mary's: it will never be questioned here. However, do it as wisely and handsomely as you can, &c. [And then in a post-script] You must either get Tom Porter, or some very trusty friend, (possibly C. D. may help you) to get for you a safe and convenient room to dry books in, as soon as possibly you can. [And again:] Let me know what you intend to do with the two sheets and half. I will have it published, when I am certain I shall be tried."

L. C. J. Hyde. Let the jury see now, whether you are the man you would be thought.

Dover. I desire to know whether my name be to that letter?

Mr. L'Estrange. No, it is not.

L. C. J. Hyde. Where did you receive or find this letter?

Mr. L'Estrange. My Lord, I found it about his wife.

L. C. J. Hyde. Let the jury judge if this come from you or no.

Judge Keeling. You of the jury, you must understand this, that what is said now is only upon his reputation, not to the point in question at all: that matter rests upon its own bottom.

L. C. J. Hyde. I will deal plainly with you: had he not stood upon such terms, I should not have spoke of this: but when a man will be thus bold and confident, I thought it proper to let you see how he continues now in the Dover. I do not vindicate myself in it; but I speak against the witness: I do conceive that the witness does not fix any thing upon me.

L. C. J. Hyde. Have you any thing else to say to the indictment?

Dover. I am indicted as a malicious and factious man: the witnesses say no such thing.

L. C. J. Hyde. You are not indicted so, but that you have maliciously and factiously caused to be printed such a seditious book; not your person, but the action.

Dover. There is nothing of that proved: admit I was guilty of it, it was done when there was no act or law in being touching printing. The witnesses do not swear positively that I did do it: one says he did not see me; the other, that he only believed it; that he did see some sheets upon the line, and they were the same for aught he knew; does not remember the time or place of our discourse: I do not know that ever I had half an hour's discourse with him in my life: I never had any meeting with him about any such matter, nor had any converse with him. The title of the book says, 'faithfully and impartially collected for further satisfaction;' so that it cannot be interpreted maliciously. It is a maxim in law, That 'the best interpretations are to be put upon the words of the indictment, in favour of the prisoner at the bar;' and I hope this honourable bench and the jury will mind that. I am a printer by trade; what I did was for my livelihood: the Scripture says, 'He is worse than an infidel that takes not care for his family.' I speak not this to justify any thing against his majesty or his government. Through my ignorance I may possibly transgress: if I have done any such thing, I am sorry for it: I hope I shall be more careful for the future. The other part of the indictment is for selling of them: no man swears that I sold one book of them. Mr. Creek says, That some of his men told him that they had some of those sheets from some of my folks; but of whom he does not say. That I did meddle with them, knowing them to be scandalous; I hope there is nothing proved of that nature: there being then no law, I humbly hope there was no transgression.

L. C. J. Hyde. Have you done?

Dover. I humbly desire your honours, and this jury, to take notice of what I have said.

L. C. J. Hyde. You of the Jury, I will not spend time (it is too late) in repeating the evidence: you have heard the evidence particularly, and his answer. He doth in part make the same answer with his fellows, which was, that it is his trade. It is true, no doubt but he ought to maintain his wife and children by his lawful calling; but if a thief should tell you that he maintained his wife by stealing, is that lawful? Printing books lawfully, no man will call him to account for it; but if he prints that which is abusive to his king and his government, that is no part of his trade, and his trade will not bear him out in it; he is charged for printing and publishing of these scandalous books, that he did it knowingly, maliciously, falsely, factiously, and seditiously. I told you, that although all these things be not proved, yet if he did it, the law calls it malice, faction, and sedition. Consider the circumstances, you see it is done in the dark; the sheets delivered at his house, and discourse about delivery of them; he would not deliver them unless Brewster and Calvert were agreed. I leave the evidence to you in this case: pregnant, strong, undeniable circumstances are good evidence. Though a man doth not come and tell you he declared to him he knew what was contained in this book, yet if there be sufficient evidence to satisfy you in your consciences, that he knew what was in it, and was privy to the printing and publishing of it; there is enough for you to find the indictment. You are to weigh circumstances as well as pregnant full proof, in cases of this nature.

Clerk. Set Nathan Brooks to the bar. You of the jury, you shall understand that he stands indicted, &c. [Reads the Indictment.]

Mr. North afterwards opened the indictment.

Serjeant Morton. This man, we shall only prove him guilty of stitching and dispersing the said books.

Thresher sworn.

Thresher. This man I have not seen these three years.

Serj. Morton. Did he set you to work in stitching those books?

Thresher. He brought none to me, that I can remember: But by Mr. Brewster's order I delivered about two hundred, or thereabouts, and carried them to his house in St. Martin's, and he took them at the stair-foot, and paid me for stitching of them in blue paper.

Serj. Morton. Who furnished you with blue paper?

Thresher. I went by Mr. Brewster's order to a stationer in Bread street, and received some.

Brooks. I desire to know whether in those books he said he delivered me, there were those passages in the indictment?

Thresher. I know not: They were The Speeches and Prayers that I delivered you.

Brooks. How did you deliver them to me?

Thresher. They were stitched; and I tied them up with a piece of packthread and carried them to him: He received them himself, and came afterwards to an alehouse, and gave me a flagon of beer. He knew not what they were, for some being imperfect, he said Mr. Brewster must make them good: And Mr. Brewster gave order, if he came for them, they should be delivered him.

Brooks. Did you know there were those passages in them?—Thresher. No, not I.

Brooks. I knew only the title of it.

Ld. Ch. Just. Hyde. Let there be what there will in it, if you knew the title look you to it. Have you any thing else to ask?

Brooks. No, my Lord.

Henry Mortlock sworn.

Serj. Morton. Mr. Mortlock, how many of those books did you receive of this Nathan Brooks?—Mortlock. About forty or fifty.

Serj. Morton. What talk had you about receiving them?

Mortlock. I do not remember any discourse.

Serj. Morton. Where did you receive them?

Mortlock. I am not certain whether in my shop or no.

Ld. Ch. Just. Hyde. Were they open?

Mortlock. They were tied up.

Ld. Ch. Just. Hyde. Did you speak for them?

Mortlock. I cannot tell; he brought them to me.

Ld. Ch. Just. Hyde. How came he to bring them to you?

Mortlock. May be I might speak for them; I paid him for them.

Ld. Ch. Just. Hyde. You and he knew what book it was?

Mortlock. I think we did.

Ld. Ch. Just. Hyde. Did you not open them? They might have been The Devil of Edmonton, for ought you knew. Did you open them afterward? And did they appear to be this book?—Mortlock. Yes.

Mr. L'Estrange sworn.

Mr. L'Estrange. I came to the house of Nathan Brooks about October last, and knocking at the door, they made a difficulty to let me in: At last seeing not how to avoid it, Brooks opened the door: I asked him what he was? He told me he was the master of the house. By and by comes one that lodged in the house, and throws down this book [shewing the book] in the kitchen, with this expression, I'll not be hang'd (says he) for never a rogue of you all: Do you hide your books in my chamber? This book had The Speeches in it, with other schismatical treatises. After this I searched the next house; and there I found more difficulty to get in. But after a long stay, I saw the second floor in a blaze; and then with a smith's sledge I endeavoured to force the door. At length the fire was put out, and one comes down and opens the door. I went in, and up stairs, where I found about two hundred of the Prelatick Preachers, and certain Notes of Nathan Brooks, wherein he mentions the delivery of several of these Speeches, and other seditious pamphlets. There is one particular wherein he records, that Thomas Brewster did in the presence of captain Hanson undertake to bear his charges of imprisonment; this Nathan Brooks having been formerly imprisoned for a crime, wherein Brewster was to bear him out.

L. C. J. Hyde. What was it that burnt above?

Mr. L'Estrange. My Lord, they had burnt I suppose, some of the Prelatick Preachers (a desperate book): I found one bundle untied, and I suppose (as the man told me after) that it was a part of that which was burnt.

L. C. J. Hyde. You say this was in the next house to Brooks: What had Brooks to do there? Had he conveyed these books thither?

Mr. L'Estrange. The owner of the house said he knew nothing of them: But a man and his wife, lodging in the chamber where the fire was, said, That Nathan Brooks had delivered with his own hands to them those parcel of books that were there found.

L. C. J. Hyde. You hear what he says, That one of your guests came down, said, 'He would not be hanged for ne'er a rogue of you all;' throws down the book——

Brooks. What is that to me, if a man have a book in his house, and throws it down, and say so, doth that concern me? He did not bring it out of my chamber.

One Mercer sworn.

Mercer. My lord [having the Book in his hand] this is the book that I did find in a room, brought up by Nathan Brooks; and I brought it down: I had it in a room where two boys and my sister lay. He came first and knocked at our chamber-door: Said I, Who is there? Says he, a friend. Who are you? Brooks, your landlord, says he: Pray open the door, and lay up this book for me. No, said I, if you were my father or brother, I will not receive it; I will not meddle or make with you. After I had denied the book, he slings it into the next room.

L. C. J. Hyde. How came you by the book?

Mercer. After Mr. L'Estrange had enquired there for books, I knew nothing; but my wife called to my sister, and asked her if she heard Mr. Brooks in the room? She said, Yes, and he had left a book with her. Having notice, I went up stairs, took the book, and brought it down presently.

Brooks. Is that the book, the very individual book, that I brought up there?

L. C. J. Hyde. He swears this, That you knocked, and prayed him to take in a book; he refused it: You went up to the next chamber, and there you left it. And his wife asking afterwards if you had been there, his sister said, Yes, you had left a book. He brought it down; and this appears to be the very individual book, nothing can be more clear.

Mercer's Wife sworn.

That morning they knocked at Brooks's door, we were a-bed; I heard a noise of thieves. Upon that, I being awake, and my husband asleep, I awaked him, and desired him to go to the window. He asked who was there? One said to him, rise, and open the door. Said my husband, I am but a lodger; let my landlord open it, if he will. Who is your landlord? Mr. Brooks. That is the man I look for, says the other. So with that, after some time, Mr. Brooks went down, and opened the door. Mr. L'Estrange coming up to my husband, says he, are you sure there is nothing in your room? There is nothing, said he. When my husband went down, I called to my sister: Said I, do you hear Mr. Brooks there? Yes, said she, he has left a book here. Said I, do you know what is in it? It may bring us all into trouble. And my husband having confidently denied any such thing, fearing he might be troubled, I called him up, and told him of it. Said my husband, I will call up the gentleman, and give it him. No, said I, go take the book, and carry it him.

Mercer's Sister sworn.

Mercer. It is very true that that is the very book I received from Mr. Brooks.

L. C. J. Hyde. Now the individual book is brought to light.

Brooks. What was the title of it?

Mercer. I know not; but there was The Speeches of the ten men that were executed.

Brooks. Did you see the book, that very book? Mercer. Yes.

One Mr. Merridale sworn.

Merridale. My lord, this very book did Mercer bring down, told us, He would be hanged for never a rogue of them all: Did he think to lay his books at my door? I know this is the very book: I took notice of the picture of sir Henry Vane in it; and he there owned it.

Mercer. I can tell that he owned it, and said that it was brought to him to be bound.

L. C. J. Hyde. Here are 200 of these books delivered to you to sell: Fifty you delivered to another. When Mr. L'Estrange comes to search, you open not your doors: When you see you could not stay longer, you run up to deliver it to Mercer, your guest: He would not receive it; you delivered it to his sister: She keeps it in her hands. When her husband had denied books to be there, and his wife understanding afterwards you had left it, she was afraid of her husband for denying it, calls him, and gives him the book; and then he said, He would be hanged for never a rogue of you all: throws down the book: And that was the very book she received from you: and yourself did own it, and confess it.

Brooks. As for Mr. L'Estrange, it is not so; he says, when first he knocked at the door, I did not hear him: Afterwards I called out, who is there? said one, Which is Mr. Brooks? said I, here. I told them, if they would be civil, I would open the door, give me but leave to put on my breeches. I went and opened it. He doth not swear positively they are my books. My lord, this Mercer was a lodger in my house; I have often desired him to pay his rent, and since I have been taken, I have sent several messengers: I told him I would seize his goods, and thereupon he speaks against me maliciously. I desire you to consider, I being only a workman, how can I be guilty of sedition and scandalous things? I never printed any thing, I am only a bookbinder, that is my trade; I hope you will consider, that I am only a bare workman. My lord, I desire when they go out, that somebody may stand at the door, that nobody may go in to the jury.

L. C. J. Hyde. We will take care of that : Have you any more to say ?

Brooks. No, my lord.

L. C. J. Hyde. You of the Jury, you have heard so much of the other indictments of the same nature, I need not say much to this. That which he speaks touching his trade, I must repeat the same as before ; he is not questioned for using, but abusing of his trade ; for publishing and dispersing seditious and scandalous books, printing and publishing, but the evidence is only for publishing. If you be satisfied that he published it, that's the crime ; printing alone is not enough, for if a man print a book to make a fire on, that's no offence, it is the publishing of it which is the crime. You have heard the evidence, how far forth it is proved, two hundred delivered to him, fifty by him delivered to another : This book you see his own conscience tells him what it was ; when Mr. L'Estrange came he would have slipt it into his guest's chamber ; he refused it : Then he carries it to another. Lay your evidence together ; if you find him guilty of the publishing, it is enough.

Jury. We desire to know upon what statute law this indictment is grounded ?

L. C. J. Hyde. Upon none ; but it is an offence at common law, I told you so at first.

[The Jury went forth, and after near an hour's consultation, returned to the Court and took their places.]

Clerk. Are you agreed of your verdict ?

Jury. Yes.

Clerk. Who shall say for you ?

Jury. The foreman.

Clerk. Set up the prisoners at the bar : How say you, is Tho. Brewster Guilty of the offence whereof he stands indicted, for printing the seditious book called 'The Speeches, &c.' or Not Guilty ?

Foreman. Guilty of selling and uttering the said books.

Clerk. What say you, is he Guilty of the offence of printing and publishing the book called 'The Phoenix, &c.' or Not Guilty ?

Foreman. Guilty of publishing it.

Clerk. How say you, is Simon Dover Guilty of the offence for printing and publishing 'The Speeches, &c.' or Not Guilty ?

Foreman. Guilty.

Clerk. How say you, is Nathan Brooks Guilty of the offence for printing and selling the said book ?

Foreman. Guilty of selling it.

Clerk. Harken to your verdicts as the Court hath recorded them : You say, that, &c. And so you say all ?

Jury. Yes.

Mr. North. My lord, we humbly pray sentence against the prisoners.

L. C. J. Hyde. You three, Thomas Brewster, Simon Dover and Nathan Brooks ; you have been severally indicted for a heinous and great offence : Brewster, you have been indicted for two several books, as full of villainy, and slander, and reproach to the king and government, as possibly can be : And I will tell you all three, it is the king's great mercy you have not been indicted capitally ; for every one of those are books filled with treason, and you for publishing of them, by strictness of law, have forfeited your lives and all to the king : It is his clemency towards you. You may see the king's purposes ; he desires to reform, not to ruin his subjects. The press is grown so common, and men take the boldness to print whatever is brought to them, let it concern whom it will ; it is high time examples be made. I must let you and all men know, by the course of the common law, before this new act was made, for a printer, or any other, under the pretence of printing, to publish that which is a reproach to the king, to the state, to his government, to the church, nay to a particular person, it is punishable as a misdemeanour. He must not say, He knew not what was in it ; that is no answer in law. I speak this, because I would have men avoid this for time to come, and not think to shelter themselves under such a pretence. I will not spend time in discoursing of the nature of the offence, it hath been declared already ; it is so high, that truly the highest punishment that by law may be justly inflicted, is due to you. But, Thomas Brewster, your offence is double : Therefore the judgment of the Court is,

'That you shall pay to the king, for these offences committed, an hundred marks : And for you (the other two), Simon Dover and Nathan Brooks, you shall pay either of you a fine of forty marks to the king.

'You shall each of you severally stand upon the pillory from eleven to one of the clock in one place at the Exchange, and another day (the same space of time) in Smithfield ; and you shall have a paper set over your hats, declaring your offence, For printing and publishing scandalous, treasonable, and factious books against the king and state.

'You shall be committed till the next gaol-delivery without bail ; and then you shall make an open confession and acknowledgement of your offences in such words as shall be directed you.

'And afterwards you shall remain prisoners during the king's pleasure : And when you are discharged, you shall put in good security by recognizance, yourselves 400*l.* a-piece, and two securities each of you of 200*l.* a-piece, not to print or publish any books, but such as shall be allowed of. And this is the judgment of the Court.'

217. The Trial of Colonel JAMES TURNER, JOHN TURNER, WILLIAM TURNER, MARY TURNER, and ELY TURNER, at the Old Bailey, for Felony and Burglary: 15 CHARLES II. A. D. 1664.

JAMES Turner the titular Colonel, William Turner, Mary Turner, and Ely Turner, were brought to the bar.

Clerk of the Peace. James Turner, hold up thy hand: which he did. John Turner hold up thy hand.

Col. Turner. He is not here, but he is hard by, and I will send for him. My Lord, it has been reported he was fled; it was a mistake, he is in Fleet-street, where he has been ever since this business.

[And thereupon he sent one for him, and then the court proceeded to some other business. About half an hour after, the said John came into the court, and was set among the other prisoners at the bar.]

Cl. of the Peace. James Turner, hold up thy hand; John Turner, hold up thy hand; William Turner, hold up thy hand; Mary Turner, hold up thy hand; Ely Turner, hold up thy hand: Which they all did, and then the said clerk read the indictment; which was as followeth:

The Indictment.

' You stand indicted in London by the names
' of James Turner late of London gentleman,
' John Turner late of London labourer, Wil' liam Turner late of London labourer, Mary
' Turner late of London spinster, (otherwise
' Mary Turner the wife of the said James Tur' ner) and Ely Turner late of London labourer;

' Six 22*s*. pieces of gold, five other pieces of gold called 5s. 6d. a piece; three other pieces of gold of 2s 9d. a piece; another piece of gold of 20s. two other pieces of gold of 5s. a piece; four 11s. pieces of gold; five pieces of French gold of 16s. 6d. a piece, and 1028*l.* in money, (particularly named in the said Indictment) of the goods and chattels of the said Francis Tryon, then and there being found, then and there feloniously and burglarly you did steal, take and carry away. And that you the said Mary Turner and Ely Turner knowing the said John Turner the felony and burglary aforesaid to have committed; the said John Turner afterwards, that is to say, the 8th day of January in the 15th year aforesaid, at London aforesaid, that is to say, in the parish of St. Andrew Undershaft, in the ward of Aldgate, feloniously did receive, comfort and maintain against the peace of our said sovereign lord the king, his crown and dignity.'

How sayest thou, James Turner, art thou Guilty of the felony and burglary whereof thou standest indicted, or Not Guilty?

Col. Turner. My lord, and the honorable bench, I shall no way be refractory, nor do any thing that doth not become a gentleman; but I humbly beseech your honours that you will stand my friend, that I may have justice, and your honours opinion—

Lord Hyde. (Chief Justice of the King's Bench). You are to plead now to your indictment—

Col. Turner. I do not refuse it; my lord I beg your honour to hear me a word—

Lord Hyde. Plead to the indictment and then say what you will; untill that be done, all you can say will signify little: we are to receive your answer to your plea first, afterwards say what you will; you must now say Guilty or Not Guilty.

Turner. I shall not refuse to plead, but I beg my own goods may be restored to me; my house, my lord, is locked up, and children turned out of doors, and I have nothing to support us.

Lord Hyde. Are you Guilty or Not Guilty? you shall have right done you.

Turner. I will take your honours word for it; I am Not Guilty.

Clerk. How will you be tried?

Turner. By God and the country.

Clerk. How sayest thou, John Turner, art thou Guilty of the felony and burglary whereof thou standest indicted, or Not Guilty? [And so W. Turner, and likewise Mary, and Ely Turner, as accessaries, being demanded the like questions, severally pleaded Not Guilty and put themselves on God and the country to be tried.]

Lord Hyde. Now, Mr. Turner, let us know who has seized any thing of yours.

Turner. The sheriff, Sir Rd. Ford and Sir Rd. Rives, and they are in possession of my house; I have none but a child of 7 and 9 at home, and not a shirt to command. It is true the sheriff, sir Rd. Ford, was so civil yesterday as to give me some linen.

Sir Rd. Ford. I shall give your lordship an account of this: I suppose, my lord, we have done nothing but what was customary; a seizure we have made now, but after we had heard this gentleman was committed for felony and burglary, and that none but children were in the house, my lord, we thought it our duty both for his good, to secure his estate, if acquitted, and so for the king, if convicted, that so the same might not be imbezzled; and hereupon caused an inventory to be taken hereof: but, my lord, we dispossessed none: it is true, we have left a servant or two, for whom we are and must be responsible; whatever they would dispose or had occasion for, they had it without contradiction. We offered him, that if he had any friend of his own that would undertake them to be forth-coming, in case he were convict, we would leave them in possession of them: we have made no seizure; what we have done is according to custom; if we have not done that which your lordships approve of, we beg your pardon.

Lord Hyde. We are to look to that which is according to law; the goods of a man that is accused of felony (he is but only so yet) he forfeits none of his goods, until convict; more than that, he is to live upon them during his trial; but on the other hand, where a man is accused of felony, and indicted for it, it is but prudence, and agreeable to law, to take care the goods be not imbezzled; because, if a conviction follow, they are forfeited to the king; therefore the sheriffs have done but what they ought to do: they are not taken from you, what you have occasion for, either for money (or goods to turn into money) for your present supply, until your trial be over, God forbid but you should have it; and you shall have it if you have any friend that will undertake the goods shall be forthcoming for the king, in case you be convicted, or for yourself if acquitted, it shall be done. In the mean time what you have occasion for yourself, wife or children, God forbid but you should have it: and this is as much as by justice you ought to claim.

Turner. I submit to your honour, and I beg of your honour, and the bench to be of counsel for me;* for though the world looks on me as a solicitor, it is a mistake, my lord, it is not in law, I am a stranger to it; it has been only in dealings for monies, by purchases and the like. But, my lord, I am informed your lordship may restore me these goods without security; if the law directs security I am ready to give it.

L. C. J. of the Common-Pleas. (Bridgeman) For that, that you may not mistake the law, it is very true, the words of the statute of Rd. 3. say, A man's goods shall not be seized before indicted. You must understand the difference of the law, that has made the mistake; it was then good, but not now; then a man's course was to indict them and process against them before committed, but now it is altered; for when it remained indifferent, whether Guilty or Not Guilty, he was to be maintained out of his goods: so ought you and your family: for the town being answerable for the goods of such a felon, that they might not be amerced, in such cases sufficient sureties were given: the statute of Philip and Mary gives the power of commitment by justices of peace, and so now it is quite altered; and though they cannot seize the goods, yet they being responsible for them they ought to have good security.

Sir Rd. Ford. I do assure your lordships that from the very first hour we put our people into the house, none of his family there then or now have been denied any thing in the house: if I be not misinformed, that very night that he was committed, there was conveyed out of his house for his use and his occasions, some say 200*l.* they that say least, say 100*l.* they have had a free disposal of what was in the house; and then, my lord, could we do less than what we have done?

Turner. I would have made a short business of this, I tendered security of 5,000*l.* to their own content, they accepted of the persons, but one standing by, said, By no means; and so it is still undone. If you please, I have security now.

Lord Hyde. There need not much ado for security; if your trial were not to be presently, then there were cause for you to insist on this; but now there is but one night; if you want any thing for this night, the sheriffs here offer what you will, to-morrow will determine the question, whether these goods are yours, or no.

Turner. I will submit to the Court, I will not be refractory: here is security, if you please: if not, I am content.

Ld. Hyde. If you want any thing, either money or clothes, or any thing else, you may have them.

Turner. My Lord, the greatest thing will be some writings and papers which will concern me at my trial to clear me then.

Ld. Hyde. Do this; nominate one person, the Sheriff another to go with him, and what writings you will have brought, they shall take a note of them, and bring them to you.

Turner. I have divers writings of gentlemen's estates, bonds and things in my hands, and the papers are amongst them; and I do beg I may, with the keeper, go myself now.

Ld. Hyde. I cannot, nor the Court, give you leave; you stand indicted for Felony and Burglary.

Turner. Let my sons go, my Lord.

Ld. Hyde. They are indicted too, and are not bailable; if Mr. Sheriff (who is answerable for you) will send any with them, he may.

Sir R. Ford. I shall be willing to serve you, Gentlemen, so far myself, if your lordship will spare me from further service here, to go with such person as he shall appoint.

Ld. Hyde. We leave that to Mr. Sheiff's civility: we can give no rule for it.

Turner. I may be cut off of my life, if I want my papers.

Ld. Ch. Just. Bridgman. Doth your life depend upon this evidence in matter of fact?

Turner. My Lord, I have been so strangely handled in this business, I know not where it depends.

Sir R. Ford. If he will say in what trunk or chest they are in, they shall be brought to the Court. [Thereupon Mr. Turner offered to send a pillowbeer, and the Sheriff said he should have the writings.]

Ld. Hyde. Provide yourself for to-morrow, Mr. Turner, we will then go on.

Turner. I have an humble request to your honours and honourable bench: I would beg an order to bring in some witnesses, who are Mr. Tryon's friends now; though mine lately; divers would come in, but send me word they dare not, except they are summoned by an order of your lordships.

Ld. Ch. Just. We will help what the law will do, but this cannot be done; those that will come in voluntarily, may; the law will not admit us to summon any witnesses: you see when any come against the king we cannot put them to their oaths, much less can we precept them to come.

Turner. Pray, my Lord, let some of the Sheriff's officers wish them to come, not from the Bench.

Ld. Ch. Just. We cannot direct any thing in it.

Turner. I desire the party himself may be here.

Ld. Ch. Just. We cannot compel him.

Turner. Then I have no witness in the world; this is a sad thing, that the prosecutor, being able, will not come; I hope you will advise him to come.

Ld. Ch. Just. The law is open, the same to every man, you shall have that that is due to any man, you cannot have more, and less you shall not have; if he be bound we will call him.

Turner. What if he will forfeit his recognizance.

Ld. Ch. Just. We cannot help that, but we think you need not fear his not coming, he intends to be here.

And afterwards the prisoners were conveyed back to the Gaol.

16 January in the Morning.

The Court being sat, and proclamation made, the Jury was called, viz.—W. Bookey, Thomas Seawell, W. Allen, John Port, Francis Coles, Robert Masters, Thomas Hickson, John Andrews, John Jacob, David Bolger, Henry Hague, Lewis Tayte. Who severally answered to their names.

Clerk. Set up James Turper, John Turner, William Turner, Mary Turner and Ely Turner; [Who (with some felons) were accordingly set to the bar.] You, the prisoners that were last called to the bar, those men that you shall hear called and personally appear, must pass between our sovereign lord the king and you for your several lives and deaths. If you or any of you will challenge them or any of them, you must challenge them when they come to the book to be sworn, before they be sworn.

Silence commanded twice.

Clerk. William Bookey, look upon the prisoner; 'You shall well and truly try, and true deliverance make between our sovereign lord the king and the prisoners at the bar, whom you shall have in charge according to your evidence. So help you God.'

And all the rest were sworn, save only Lewis Tayte, against whom he excepted, there being some little difference at present between them; but my Lord Chief Justices told him he need not give any reason for it, he was free to except any without cause. Thereupon Capt. Edward Micoe was sworn in his room. Count these, Crier.

William Bookey, &c. Twelve good men and true, stand together and hear your evidence.

Clerk. Crier, make proclamation. O Yes! If any man can inform my lords the king's justices, the king's serjeant, or the king's attorney, before this inquest be taken between our sovereign lord the king and the prisoners at the bar, let them come forth, and they shall be heard; for now the prisoners stand at the bar upon their deliverance: and all others bound by recognizance to give evidence against any the prisoners at the bar, come forth and give evidence, or else you will forfeit your recognizances.

Clerk. Crier, call Francis Tryon, William Hill, Fred. Ixam, John Garret, Jacob Watcher, Eliz. Fry, Ann Bull, John Guernsey, Francis Millington, John Alsop, Peter Culley, Ralph Tasker, William Daws, John Rouse, Richard Roberts, Nath. Clarke, Robert Cole, Edward Cole.—They all came into the Court.

Clerk. James Turner, hold up thy hand. [And so the rest.] (Here the Indictment was read again.) Upon this indictment they have been arraigned, and thereunto have severally pleaded Not Guilty, and for their trials have put themselves upon God and the country, which country you are. Your charge is to enquire whether the said James, John and William Turner, or any of them, be guilty of this felony and burglary in manner and form as they stand indicted, or Not Guilty: and whether the said Mary Turner and Ely Turner are guilty of the felony, as accessaries to the said John. If you find them Guilty, you shall enquire what goods and chattels, lands and tenements, they or any of them had at the time of committing this felony or burglary, or at any time since: If you find them Not Guilty, you shall enquire if they fled for it; if you find that they did fly for it, you shall enquire, &c. as if you had found them Guilty. If you find them Not Guilty, and they did not fly for it, say so, and no more, and hear your evidence.

But if you acquit James, John and William Turner of the felony and burglary, then you shall not enquire after Mary and Ely as accessaries.

Sir Thomas Aleyn sworn. The Evidence that you shall give, &c.

L. C. J. Hyde. Pray, Sir Thomas Aleyn, tell your knowledge to the jury.

Sir T. Aleyn. May it please your lordships, and you gentlemen of the jury; Upon Friday morning last was sevennight, I heard of this robbery at Guild-Hall, and the person robbed being my acquaintance, I went to visit him in the afternoon; and coming there, not thinking but the business had been already examined, several persons with Mr. Francis Tryon put me upon the business to examine it. I went and examined the two servants, the man and the maid: upon their examination I found they had supped abroad at a dancing-school, and had been at cards, and came home afterwards; but before they came home, they heard that an ancient gentleman, one Mr. Tryon, was robbed, and then they hastened home. I examined them further, whether they used to go abroad after their master was in bed? The man confessed he had been abroad twenty or thirty times at col. Turner's house at supper, about a year since. The maid denied they had been there at all: but it is true the man's saying he supped there (though it was false) was the first occasion of suspicion of col. Turner. When I had examined these two, I went to the examination of Turner, Where he was all that day, where at night? he told me, at several places and taverns, and in bed at nine of the clock, and was called out of his bed: but having myself some suspicion of him, I wished him to withdraw. I told Mr. Tryon, that I believed if he was not the thief, he knew where the things were. The old gentleman said, He could not mistrust him, he had put a great confidence in him: but I desired him to give me leave to charge him with it; and thereupon I called him in, but he denied it; but not as a person of his spirit, which gave me some cause of further suspicion. I desired to search his house; nay, told him I would whether he would or no. He desired to go home; I told him, if he would go with them (some persons there) he should: but you shall not speak with your sons or daughters, or servants; they shall be examined by me. They searched his house, the marshal and constable, they said they could find nothing. The old gentleman was very unwilling to charge him with felony; some friends there were as well satisfied as I was, that he was guilty of it; and they brought me a paper that he would charge him; and thereupon I wished him to read that paper, told him I could do no less than send him to Newgate. Says he, you will not undo a family, will you? Will you not take bail? No, I cannot. What proof have you material against me? I will give you as good bail as any man; give me leave to speak with Mr. Tryon.

I did give him leave : he had no sooner spoke with him, but Mr. Tryon would not charge him, he promising to endeavour to find the thief. I took Mr. Turner on one side, and told him, I did as verily believe if he was not the thief, he could find him out, as I believed I should go home to my wife and children ; and I said, That if an angel from Heaven should come, and tell me otherwise, I could hardly believe it. This passed on this night : I could not sleep all the night, still it was in my thoughts that this man was the man that had done the robbery. Next morning after nine, there came a gentleman to me, a person of quality, a merchant ; if your lordship desires, I shall name him.

L. C. Justice. Pray name him.

Sir T. A. It was alderman Love, my lord : he told me that he thought I was a friend to justice : If I would go presently into the Minories myself, I might discover the person that robbed Mr. Tryon ; if I staid, or sent others, the birds would be flown : Mr. Turner has this morning removed several hundred pounds. I went presently with a footboy. When I came to Bishopsgate, meeting with major Tasker, knowing not whether I went without the Liberties, said I to him, Are you in haste ? Pray go along with me, and he went with me.—This gentleman, alderman Love, told me I should meet with a maid-servant of his that knew me, though I knew not her : she will meet you at such a corner, and go with you. When I came without Aldgate, I met with two maids that were the persons to shew me the place : the maid told me these were the maids. I bid them come behind me. At the further end of all the Minories I went into the shop, and found col. Turner with his hands in a chest : I charged him to take nothing out, and not to stir himself. There was two wallets, one of 100*l.* and the other 200*l.* I took the keys from him, laid them upon the compter : I went with him into the next room, which was the kitchen ; and in another chest was two wallets more : and now the gentleman was speechless. I told him it was just as I told him the last night, that your roguery would come out ; what (said I) is become of the rest of the money ? Says he, Your haste will spoil all. I called in the maid, to examine her : but she was fearful, and so trembled there was no examining her before col. Turner. But in conclusion, said I, Col. Turner, if you will tell me whether this be Mr. Tryon's money, I will do you all the favour I can. Says he, I cannot say it is his money. I called for a constable, and made a Mittimus to send him to Newgate, thinking he would discover the truth. Said I, Will you give me your examination ? He did : It is in court. I asked him whence this money came ? He told me it was removed by himself, his wife, and children this morning.

Turner. My son and I, I told you.

Sir T. A. I asked him where he had received it ? He told me at a goldsmith's, 14 days since. He did not remember his name. I asked why he should remove his own money ? His answer was, He did remove it for two or three days, till this foolery was over. When I saw I could get nothing further from him, I discoursed with him touching the remainder of the money and the jewels. Says he, Sir Thomas, do not trouble yourself, you will lose the jewels and the rest of the money by this course ; and, says he, I am now in pursuit of them : If you will give me leave to go to the old gentleman, I know all will be well. I was not content to let him go : But presently we called a hackney-coach, and myself, and him, and major Tasker went, and carried that money to Mr. Tryon. When we came there, I told Mr. Tryon I thought we had brought 500*l.* of his money ; and I did not doubt but I had brought a person that could tell of the rest of his money and jewels. Col. Turner desired to speak with Mr. Tryon himself in private. I gave him leave. He calls me a little after : Sir, says he, Mr. Tryon and I am agreed ; I must have this money delivered to me again : I have assured him he shall have all his money and jewels again by 3 this afternoon. I told him I could not agree that he should have the money back again, pressed him that he would stay there, and send for the rest of the money and jewels. But he would (if I did not) trust him : Mr. Tryon would have the rest of his money and all his jewels again.

Turner. I said, I would endeavour it.

Sir T. A. If he had said he would have endeavoured it, I would not have parted with him ; but he said he should have the money and jewels, &c. I told him I would meet him at that time at Mr. Tryon's. Then I took Mr. Tryon, and said, Whatever promise you have made in private, you must excuse my assenting to any thing against the law : But do not tell him of it, lest you lose the jewels : I must commit him to Newgate, and I must bind you to prosecute him. He desired me I would not come so soon as 3, not till 4 or 5 of the clock, and all would be brought thither. I staid till about 4. In the interim, I heard some particulars, what these maids would testify ; which testimony had I received before I had parted with him, I would not have parted with him for any consideration. But when I came thither in the afternoon, I heard col. Turner was arrested, and was then at the Hoop-tavern with the officers. I sent immediately the Marshal and his men to bring him to me. The officers and he came ; and then col. Turner told me, I had brought all these things, but the officers prevented me ; I was a very unfortunate man : Give me but leave till to-morrow morning at 9, and you shall have all. Said I, I have now heard more ; and you must produce the money and jewels, if you expect any favour from me, or I know what to do. He pressed very hard an hour, or almost two, that he might be trusted to go for them ; if he did not go, Mr. Tryon would lose the rest of his money and jewels. I told him I had rather they should be all lost, than I should forfeit my discretion and reputation. And thus he kept us till 7 or 8 at night. At last he would have gone with one person. I told him, no: If there were enough to secure you, I might give leave. With he, the party will not see more than one: His life would be in danger. Whither would you go? I would go, saith he, (to my best remembrance) to Tower-Hill or Whitechapel. I should have met him at 5; and now I must meet him about 9. I will call in the officers: They will tell you, your being upon a Judgment, they will not part with you without the Liberties: Nor will I give leave, because the Sheriffs will blame me. The officers said they could not go without the Liberties, for it would be an escape in law. Pray give me leave to go near those places, and I will send. Nay, then you may as well send from hence. He begged leave to go to the Hoop-tavern, and send for his wife; which I did grant. And there he did send for his wife. They brought me word he had sent his wife for the jewels and the rest of the money. He sent to me not to think the time too long, for he had notice his wife was coming. I directed the Marshal, when his wife came, he would secure her. About 11 they brought his wife; who told me she had delivered the jewels: they thought they were in two bags. Then he came to me, and desired to speak with Mr. Tryon in private, and told me Mr. Tryon's soul was pawned to him, and his to the thief, that no discovery should be made. But when I examined his wife what money went from her house that morning, she said she knew of none. Where had you the jewels? She knew of none: But she had a couple of bags that she was sent for: Near Whitechapel or the Tower a person should meet her, and ask what she did there, and she should say she walked up and down for something that should be given her by a person; which, if he did, she was to bring it to him that sent her. He did deliver the two bags, which she delivered to her husband; but what was in them, she knew not. There was sir Thomas Chamberlane, Mr. Millington, myself, and col. Turner, with Mr. Tryon. The two bags was laid upon a dresser. He told us they were now come; and having performed his part, he hoped Mr. Tryon would perform his. Have you performed your part? Have you brought the jewels and the remainder of the money? He told us the money was not brought: For the 600*l.* I shall give Mr. Tryon my bond, to pay him at six months. We pressed to see the jewels: We ran them all over. But I should have told you one thing: She brought a cat's-head-eyering upon her finger. This the gentleman was like to forget: He delivered it to me, to deliver that with the rest. When we had told out the jewels, we crossed them out upon the printed paper as they were called. She said all that was in the paper, except one carcanet of diamonds and jewels, valued at 200*l.* that is fallen behind the chest, or aside. You have 2,000*l.* worth of jewels over what is in the paper; but that carcanet shall be forthcoming. He now pressed that no prosecution might be, for two souls were pawned, (as I said before) and desired an end of the business. I told him further, and pressed him: Said I, I have staid a great while, and would stay longer, if he might have the 600*l.* and the carcanet. But when I saw there was nothing more to be got from him, now (said I) what would you have this poor gentleman to do for you? What he hath promised you, I know not; he is a stranger to the law: If there had been but you two had it, and it had not been published to the world, and the neighbours public examination taken, somewhat might have been between yourselves. But would you have this gentleman bring himself into danger? He will lose all his goods again; for he will be indicted himself. What will he be the better for discovery, when he must lose his jewels and money, and be liable to a prosecution, as you will be, were he so ignorant? Do you think that I understand the law no better, being a justice of peace, to bring myself into danger? All the kindness I can do for you, is, (to be short) I must send you and your wife to Newgate. 'How say you, master Alderman?' Then I had better to have kept the jewels. Those were his words; to the best of my remembrance he said so.—My lord, I asked him several questions: Why he should give a bond for 600*l.*, if he was not concerned in this business? But he knew not what to answer. Saith he, Will you not take bail! Said I, I can take no bail: I must send you to the common gaol, and then I am discharged. Pray send me to the Compter. No, I cannot. Do you think I would make an escape? I cannot tell; but I would not bring myself into danger. He prayed me I would give him leave to go home. I must make my warrant: If the marshal and constable will do any thing, I shall not direct them. He desired his wife might go and fetch some linen.

L. C. J. Bridgman. What day were the jewels delivered?

Sir T. A. Saturday.

L. C. J. Bridgman. Thursday was the robbery, Friday he was examined, Saturday the money was removed, and that night the jewels were brought, and he committed.

Sir T. A. If I have said any thing that he is not satisfied wherein I have not true spoken, let him ask me; I shall not do him the least wrong.

L. C. J. Hyde. Do so, Mr. Turner.

Turner. Do your honours understand of sir Thomas the time the robbery was committed? I shall ask him some questions.

Sir T. A. I have only one word more to say to you: That before he went to the Hoop-tavern, Nay, said I, col. Turner, be ingenuous whether this was not Mr. Tryon's money that he removed? And he confessed it was.

L. C. J. Hyde. That money was removed from his own house?

Sir T. A. Yes; but his wife, children, and maid denied it.

L. C. J. Hyde. Mr. Turner, will you ask him any questions? What are they?

Turner. I would ask all this back again: You are upon your oath, Mr. Alderman.

L. C. J. Hyde. You need not tell him that he is sworn; the court and jury understand it so.

L. C. J. Bridgman. Go on, Mr. Turner; ask your questions.

Turner. My lord, I demand of sir Thomas Aleyn whether I did not tell him at the first there was a wicked young man had belied my house and family, saying, that he supped there that night, when he had not supped at my house these 12 months.

Sir T. A. I think I have done him that right already. He desired me to examine that young man, who said he supped at col. Turner's; but I found he had not been, nor was not there.

Turner. Upon Friday night, when the alderman pressed me concerning the thing, I told him I had some suspicion of some persons, who formerly should have robbed Mr. Tryon a year ago, and I employed Mosely the constable and Mr. Tryon's man to go to Ratcliff, and I went another way. Pray ask sir Thomas whether I did not promise to do all I could.

Sir T. A. I pressed him hard; he said he would endeavour it.

Turner. Whether did not I tell him that that money was carried there on purpose to gain the other fellows that had the jewels? Said I, If this money be taken away, he that hath the jewels will not bring them, and the remainder of the money; but that this money must bring him to it, that they might share it.

Sir T. A. There was not one word of this: his Examination was contrary. He told me 400*l.* was received of a goldsmith, he knew not his name, and 200*l.* was in his own house; and that he removed it for two or three days, till this foolery was over. He said it was his own money. I said, an honest man need not thus remove his own money.—One thing I have omitted: when I was examining of him in the Minories, word was brought me his son was fled away at the back-door. I bid them run after him; but they said they saw him leap over a great ditch; he was not heard of till yesterday, though I sent out my warrants for him.

L. C. J. Hyde. Yourself (as sir T. Aleyn swears) said you knew not of whom you had part of the money, but the other was your own, and yet afterwards that the money was Tryon's; why did you say so?

Turner. I will tell you the reason; I would not have my business spoiled, and did feign those answers. My lord, I do demand of him whether Mr. Tryon and I had not made a bargain in the morning, whether or no if he might have his goods the person should be free, and that he had agreed no blood should be spilt; that he had rather lose all his money and jewels, than to forfeit such an asseveration which the thief had bound me that I should swear to him, That by the blood of Jesus Christ that was shed for him and all sinners, his life should be free.

L. C. J. Hyde. You are beside the business.

Turner. My lord, I ask alderman Aleyn whether I did not tell him this?

Sir T. A. I told your lordships two stools were pawned, as he said before.

L. C. J. Hyde. Do not spend your time thus; the question's short, Whether you are guilty of robbing, or breaking the house of Mr. Tryon, or no?

Turner. I am as free as any man here.

L. C. J. Hyde. They will not believe your own words.

Sir T. A. I think I have done him no wrong by this evidence.

Turner. I hope, my lord, I shall have the benefit to call him again for a witness for me.

L. C. J. Hyde. You may ask him now.

Turner. No, when I come to my defence.

L. C. J. Hyde. Yes, yes.

Turner. Oh your honour's most humble servant; I am very sorry I have put him to this trouble.

Mr. Tryon, his Servant, and Mr. Garnet sworn.

L. C. J. Hyde. Mr. Tryon, pray, (as you are able) give an account of this business.

Tryon. My lord, about 11 of the clock, or something past, upon Thursday night last was a seven-night, two men came into my chamber when I was fast asleep, one on the one side, and another on the other side of the bed: one had a lanthorn that opened on one side, and waked me: when I saw him, I was much astonished (as I might well) knew them not, said, My masters, who are you? I was newly out of my sleep; being an ancient man, I apprehended another man for the party I spoke to, but was not the man, and named him by his name, What do you do here at this time of night? What is your business? Said nothing to me; one, took both my hands the other with a little cord bound me very hard, insomuch here yet is the dents of it; and bound my feet, gagged me, and used me barbarously, most inhumanly; I must suffer it, because I could not tell how to avoid it. When they had done, then told me this withal, You shall not lose a hair of your head. I knew not their intentions, I feared what it was, for when they had done this, they left me; I had nobody could come to me in my house, my servants I knew not upon what grounds they were forth at supper when I a-bed, which was of ill consequence. After I had been an hour in this manner I rolled myself out of my bed, and fell down; and saving your lordships presence, a chamber-pot fell, broke, and I fell upon it, and very much hurt myself upon the pieces of the pot: and so with much ado, it pleased God, I know not how myself, I got to the chamber-window which lay to the street; I called out, Murder! and Thieves! My neighbours said, I called with so strong a voice, they wondered to hear me. Quickly after, many of my neighbours came in, and one Mr. Peter Vanden-Aucher, a Dutchman, that selleth Rhenish wine, comes in and unbound me; and so after I was unbound, I went down to the warehouse as I was, without clothes about me, only my waistcoat and shirt, and saw that they had been there. I considered those that had done the thing, were very privy to my house; they knew where to fetch the key of my cash, in a drawing-box, taking the money there, which was about one thousand and odd pounds; some plate there was, they did not meddle with it.

L. C. J. Hyde. How came they by the jewels?

Tryon. I forgot something concerning some jewels; these jewels were in a drawer under my table in the computing-house, he was privy to that, because he did frequent my house very long, and was very familiar.

L. C. J. Hyde. Who was privy to all this?

Tryon. James Turner.

L. C. J. Hyde. Mr. Turner, would you ask Mr. Tryon any questions?

Turner. By and by, when I come upon my proof.

William Hill, Mr. Tryon's man, sworn.

Hill. All that I can say, is this: when I went out, I locked the door double, and those things were there then.

L. C. J. Hyde. About what time?

Hill. Seven or eight of the clock.

L. C. J. Hyde. Was he a-bed then?

Hill. Yes, my lord. When I came home again, I found all these things gone; going down into the computing-house, we found some jewels gone, and some left, and those were inconsiderable to those that were gone; the best were culled and gone. On Saturday colonel Turner was arrested with two serjeants, and sent the boy at the Hoop-Tavern for me: I took two friends with me, Mr. Gurney and Mr. Pilkington; he prayed me to speak to my master that he would give bond for him, that the serjeants might discharge him, and he haste about his business, or else it would be spoiled. Proceeding into some discourse, I was saying to him, it was a great providence that I and the maid was not then at home, for if we had we should have been killed. He answered, saith he, No; they would only have bound you and the maid. I asked him, how it was possible to get in? He answered, one went through the entry in the day time, and there lay till night, went up stairs, found a candle, lit it, went up to his chamber, took the key and went down and let in others.

Turner. This story I was informed, I told him.

Hill. I asked him how he came to know it? He said he examined them.

Ld. Bridgman. Did he never tamper with you about making Mr. Tryon's will?

Hill. Yes, my lord, he came to me about a year ago, I went with him to the Cock behind the Exchange, it was in a morning; he took me privately aside, told me the old gentleman your master is very sickly, cannot live long, had a good estate, or to that purpose, and it was pity he would never make a will, and such an estate should go to the building of Paul's. Saith he, I have pressed him several times touching making his will: he said he had done it, when we both knew he had not, and I believe he will not make one. He told of one that could counterfeit a hand.

Ld. Bridgman. Was it not Grainger.

Hill. Yes, my lord; that that man could counterfeit a will, and I and Mr. Garret, and another good-fellow should be the three executors, and a third person overseer, and that would please the old-man. I answered, I would not have to do in such an unjust thing for all the world.

L. C. J. Hyde. Did you go to Turner's to supper that night this robbery was committed?

Hill. No, my lord, to Mr. Starkey's in Fen-church-street; the maid went along with me.

Ld. Bridgman. One question more: you said you came in and found the doors open, did you come in before the neighbours?

Hill. No, my lord, I had not known of it, but that one gentleman at supper went home with a gentlewoman in Leadenhall-street, and hearing there was such a robbery in Lime-street, I run with a great fright, came in and found the doors open, and found the neighbours within.

Turner. The thing understood touching the will, hath another face: his uncle was an acquaintance of Mr. Grainger, his uncle that bound him apprentice, that lived in Cripple-gate, now in Cornhill. This Grainger had counterfeited a will touching my lord Gerrard, and somebody else, about an estate. Said I to this young man, You have an uncle acquainted with a notable fellow, one Grainger, and your master making no will, speaking merrily, this fellow is able to make it for him. Ask him if I did not tell him his uncle was acquainted with such a person.

Hill. You told me so indeed.

Ld. Bridgman. Hill, by the oath you have taken, did he not persuade you to endeavour that you and he and Grainger should counterfeit a will?

Hill. He did, my lord: he told me, That I, Mr. Garret, and another good-fellow, should be three executors, and another person overseer, and that this Grainger could do it undiscernibly. I answered him, I would not meddle with it for all the world.

Turner. Go, go, go, this is malice; for it was mere jesting with him.

Elizabeth Fry sworn.

Fry. Mrs. Turner came to my house on Saturday morning last, at 6 in the morning: she knocked me out of my bed. I asked, who was there? she said, a friend. Who are you, said I? come and see, says she. I said, Who, Mrs. Turner? she said, yes. I went and dressed me, and let her in. She said, There was a friend of hers, a merchant, newly broke, he had a wife, and seven or eight children; they desired to secure the money till they had taken their oaths the money was not in their house. She said, her husband and her son Ely was coming with it. I went and lighted a candle, there was she and her son Ely with the money. She asked me, if I had a spare chest? I said, yes, there was one within. She went in, opened the chest, and she put in the wallets of money, I know not how much, my lord. I asked her if there was any more to come? she said, yes, her husband was coming with more. She went to the door and let it in, but I know not who brought that.

Ld. Bridgman. Did not Mr. Turner come in?

Fry. Yes, my lord; he opened the bags, and asked his wife touching the seals. She said, the gentlewoman that owned the money had desired me to pull them off. They offered me 20 shillings for my kindness in it, told me they had power to give it from the gentlewoman; desired me if my sister or any should ask about it, bid me conceal it, because the discovery would ruin the poor gentlewoman and her children, but rather to say that they desired me to let some linen lie there.

L. C. J. Hyde. Were the bags sealed?

Fry. I saw none sealed.

Ld. Bridgman. How many wallets were in the shop?

Fry. I saw but three, and they put one into a chest in the shop, and two in the kitchen.

L. C. J. Hyde. At that time when the money was brought, was there any discourse of 1,100*l*.

Fry. To my best remembrance it was so.

Turner. Not a word of the sum.

Fry. There was five wallets brought into my house, three in the shop, two in the kitchen.

L. C. J. Hyde. Had they bags at each end?

Fry. Yes, my lord.

Sir T. Aleyn. You hear what the wench says; she says, there was five wallets, three in the shop, two in the kitchen: I took two in the shop, and only one in the kitchen.

Fry. My lord, I have two apprentices, little girls, when all the people were in the shop, said out aloud, That they saw Mrs. Turner go out of the shop with something in her apron, covered with a red cloth, while I was above, my lord.

Turner. Who should convey it away?

L. C. J. Hyde. Your son was there.

Turner. Pray, my lord, ask her which is Ely.

Fry. That is, (pointing to Ely).

Turner. It was false; this Ely carried none; the boy knew nothing of it; both my sons are dear to me, and if either more than the other, it must be my eldest; and yet I must say, it was John my eldest son that carried the money, this boy was at home; she hath forsworn herself.

Fry. Your wife told me that Ely was to bring some.

Mr. Gurnet sworn.

My lord, I met with col. Turner on Saturday morning after the robbery; he told me, says he, I have been as good as my word, I sent my son to make some discovery of this business, and I did not doubt but to clear myself of it, and make a discovery: this was on the Exchange. Says he, I have met with them. With what? With the jewels and money. Where are they? I have brought 500*l*.; the rest, with the jewels, I shall have at 3 o'clock this afternoon: will you be there? Yes, said I, who were they? They were friends. Friends! what and use him so barbarously! O, says he, they were two strangers, they went beyond their commission.

Major Ralph Tasker sworn.

On Saturday morning I met sir T. Aleyn; passing by, he called me; says he, there is a business in hand, pray go along with me. We went along through Aldgate and into the Minories, and passing along the Minories, these two maids we overtook, and asked them where the house was; they shewed us, we went in, Mr. Turner was there, his hand in the chest, sir Tho. Aleyn staid it: we seized the money; there was two bags of buckram, I conceived there was 200*l*. in either of them, and another in the kitchen, sir T. Aleyn desired me to secure them. I saw a fellow play bo-peep in a back-room, and presently was a noise, he was fled and gone; his son they said it was. Sir T. Aleyn pressed very hard to Mr. Turner, and desired to know whose money that was. Says Turner, By the Eternal God it is my own money, with many other protestations. A constable was sent for, and we carried the money and Turner in a hackney-coach to Mr. Tryon, and there left the money on a table with Mr. Tryon: they had some discourse; Turner came forth and said, The old gentleman and I are agreed, I will trust the money no longer with you, but with the old gentleman himself. Said I, let me be discharged of it, do what you will with it.

Ld. Bridgman. Did you see the bags out of the wallets?

Sir T. Aleyn. We saw one which was sealed, I think, with the bishop of Chichester's seal.

Ann Ball sworn.

On Saturday morning Mrs. Turner came to this maid's house, and desired to come in; she stept out of bed, and asked who was there? she said, a friend. She went to the door, and asked who was there? Mrs. Turner said, Open the door, and you shall see. Opening of it, she came in: who is it, Mrs. Turner? Yes, says she. What would you have? I have a little money I would leave here: This she came and told me. She lighted a candle; I saw Mr. Turner and his wife come in, I heard a great noise, I lay still, but heard not what they said. When they were gone, the maid told me what they had brought into the house. Said I, I thought it had been pewter: said I, if you keep this money, we shall be utterly undone, if you do not tell some people of it. She went to her sister to make her acquainted with it.

Ld. Bridgman. You saw Mr. Turner and his wife come in?

Bull. I did, but knew not what they did there: she did go to her sister, and so it came to sir T. Aleyn by accident.

Ld. Bridgman. Now for the seal, who were those that saw the seal?

Frederic Iram sworn.

My lord, and gentlemen of the Jury; being at the house of Mr. Tryon on Saturday in the evening, I was desired, with others there present, to see the bags taken out of the several wallets; three, I think. I saw them taken out; three had no seals on, one was very much defaced, and the other had a seal, which being questioned to be the seal of the bishop of Chichester, it was compared with the seal of a letter which Mr. Tryon brought down, and declared to be a letter received from the bishop of Chichester, and those two seals agreed: the bags being here in Court, will be a further evidence. The Letter was produced by Mr. Tryon, and owned by him to be the bishop of Chichester's, and they agreed.

Mr. Hanson the goldsmith, sworn.

[The bag sealed was shewn him.]

Ld. Bridgman. Have you seen the letter?

Hanson. Yes.

Ld. Bridgman. Doth that seal and the seal of the bag agree?

Hanson. Yes.

Ld. Bridgman. Mr. Tryon, whose letter was that?

Mr. Tryon. Dr. Henry King's, bishop of Chichester.

Ld. Bridgman. Open the letter, and see whether that be the letter you received from the bishop of Chichester.

Tryon. Shall I read it?

Ld. Bridgman. No.

Tryon. It is his hand and seal.

Ld. Bridgman. Shew the bag and letter to the Foreman of the Jury: [which was done and most of the Jury viewed it.]

Ld. Bridgman. You observe this evidence, this was one of the bags that was taken in the Minories, that col. Turner was then removing. Mr. Tryon had 600*l.* of the bishop of Chichester's in bags sealed; it appears by the letter to be his seal, and these gentlemen swear this was one of the bags then pulled out of the wallet, and sir T. Aleyn has had it in his custody since.

L. C. J. Hyde. One thing more observe, he asked his wife when the money was brought into this woman's house, Have you taken of the seals? his wife said, The gentlewoman directed her to take them off.

Ld. Bruggman. Some were taken off, but it seems this was left on.

[Here Turner spoke somewhat to the Jury.]

L. C. J. Hyde. Pray Mr. Turner discourse not with the Jury, your whispering will do you little good: though I think they are honest men, and will not be guided by you, yet we expect the same carriage from you as from other prisoners; you shall have all the justice that may be.

Cole the Serjeant sworn.

L. C. J. Hyde. Speak your knowledge.

Cole. On Saturday in the afternoon about 5, my brother and I arrested col. Turner in an action of 700*l.*

L. C. J. Hyde. At whose suit?

Cole. At the suit of Thomas Lyon, who with others was bail for him.

Turner. It was only hearing of this foolery that caused it.

Cole. My lord, we went to the Hoop tavern, he sent for Mr. Tryon's man, that he should engage for this account, that he might have his liberty to look after master Tryon's business. Soon after came the constable, and he charged us to assist him to go before sir T. Aleyn. By and by I was saying, Col. Turner, how could his house be robbed, and none of the doors broke? O, said he, I took a man in the Minories, who has discovered it to me: he told me, that one going into the cellar in the day time, lay there till night, then went up stairs, found a candle and lit it, went up to the old gentleman's chamber, took the key from his bed side, and went down, and let all the rest of the thieves in. —The young man being there, said, It was well the maid and I was not at home, we should have been killed. No, says he, you would not have been killed, only bound.

Turner. As the fellow told me:

L. C. J. Hyde. Did he say nothing touching Mr. Tryon's tooth?

Cole. He said, that the fellow putting his finger in his mouth to gag him, the old gentleman bit him; and he struggling to get out his finger, pulled out his tooth.

L. C. J. Hyde. You are very perfect at it, Mr. Turner, every way.

Turner. Ay, my lord, I examined him every way.

Cole the Yeoman sworn.

Cole. My lord, I can say only what my brother said before.

L. C. J. Hyde. Tell it.

Cole. I arrested him, &c. [And so related in the same manner his brother did.]

Ld. Bridgman. Mr. Hill, what do you know about breaking your own desk?

Hill. My desk was safe locked, and the key in my pocket; I lost out of that desk about 45*l.* of my own.

Ld. Bridgman. Where did it stand?

Hill. Upon a table in the warehouse; the jewels were in a drawer under the table in the counting-house.

Ld. Bridgman. How did you leave Mr. Tryon's door?

Hill. Double locked.

Ld. Bridgman. Who had the key?

Hill. I had.

Ld. Bridgman. Was there more than one key?

Hill. Always two.

Lord Bridgman. Who had the other?

Hill. The other key was in my master's chamber.

Lord Bridgman. Mr. Tryon, how was your own door opened?

Tryon. I called some of my neighbours, and Mr. Vanden-Anchor came up to me: It seems they had forced open the door with a crow of iron.

Lord Bridgman. The door of your chamber, do you mean?

Tryon. No, the street-door.

Lord Bridgman. How was your chamber-door opened?

Tryon. I never lock my chamber-door, but pull it too.

L. C. J. Hyde. Mr. Hill, the counting-house where the jewels were, was that locked?

Hill. Yes, and the drawer I think was locked; sometimes he does, and sometimes he does not lock it.

L. C. J. Hyde. Was the house doors open, or no?

Hill. Before I came, the neighbours had broke open the door.

L. C. J. Hyde. Mr. Tryon, were your counting-house and till, where the jewels lay, locked?—Tryon. Ever, my lord.

L. C. J. Hyde. That night?

Tryon. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. Hyde. Was it opened with a key, or broken open?

Tryon. I know not how it was opened, my key was among a bunch of keys.

Péter Vanden-Anchor sworn.

Lord Bridgman. When Mr. Tryon cried out, you came in, did you not?

Vanden-Anchor. Yes, my lord.

Lord Bridgman. How did you find him?

Vanden-Anchor. I was lately come home, my daughter heard a great voice of murder and robberies: I went out, and some of the neighbours were breaking open the door, and I was the first that went into the house; and so I went presently up to Master Tryon's chamber, and found him bound with this rope; and put it into my pocket, and searched about the house, and several neighbours came in.

Chaplain sworn.

I was at the door with Master Vanden-Anchor, we went into the ware-house and counting-house, and all open, cash was taken away without any breaking. Says Master Tryon, All my money is gone, a thousand and odd pounds: Several pieces of plate were there left. We went up with Master Tryon, and sent for a chirurgeon to dress his thigh: By this time his man came in; I asked him where he had been? says he, I have been at col. Turner's at supper. Where is the maid? says he, She is fallen into a swoon. Some maids came home with her; I asked her where she had been? She said, At one Chamberlin's a goldsmith's. Said I to her, The man says one thing, and you another. A little after comes in col. Turner, with his lanthorn, and his hair turned up under his cap, and there he made a great bustle. I went to Chamberlin's to enquire touching the maid; he said, they had been there with a dancing-master. I went to Master Tryon's again: we asked him, who he thought bound him? he named one Christmas, but I knew him not.

Lord Mayor. Did you not find any door, that you observed, to be broken?

Chaplain. No, but all opened with keys.

Mr. Christmas sworn.

My lord, I know little of the business. About two o'clock on Friday morning there comes a constable and other people, and knocked at my ware-house doors: the man's servant of the house rose up, and asked them who they would speak with? They said, they would speak with one Christmas. Hearing my name I rose up, I asked what was the matter? They said, they must have me to Master Tryon, he was robbed. If he was, said I, it doth not concern me. They told me, I must go to Master Tryon. I said, he was not a civil man to send for any at that time of night out of their beds. Then another constable came, and said he would break open the doors. Said I, I am not afraid to come to you, I am not the man you take me to be. Nothing would satisfy, but I must go; I told them I would: and then they took me into their charge, and carried me to the Exchange.

L. C. J. Hyde. Who besides the constable?

Christmas. Two young men that I know, one Bagnall's man, and Browning's man: they told a constable, I was a man of repute, and an honest man, and my word would be taken at the Exchange for many hundred pounds. After that they intended to carry me to Master Tryon; and the constable of Broad-street carried me to the Counter: There I was 'till 10 o'clock, and then the constable and Turner came to me. Turner asked me what justice I would go before: I told him it was indifferent to me; Sir John Frederick, or the next, sir Richard Brown, or before sir T. Aleyn, sir John Robinson, all one to me whom I go before; but I think it most convenient to go before sir T. Adams, because he lives in the same parish with Mr. Tryon. We went there, and no man charging me, sir Thomas discharged me, but desired I would go over to Mr. Tryon.

Ld. Bridgman. I observe this gentleman was of a pretty bulk, somewhat corpulent, and so is Mr. Turner.

Turner. My Lord, I humbly beg I may have a stool to sit down, I am troubled with the gout.

Ld. Bridgman. You may have one.

Mr. Millington sworn.

My Lord, I came to Mr. Tryon's on Saturday in the afternoon, about the evening; and being sent for to come with Mr. Turner, he told me of the arrest that was made upon him, and said, that he should not comply with his words, in bringing the jewels and remainder of the money. He desired me I would go and intercede, that he might have his liberty to go about the jewels: but I did not think it convenient to make myself concerned in it. He alleged, that if he did it not presently, the thief would be gone. It was hinted, that they that were with him, might go along with him, the marshal and serjeants: He said, if so many came, they would fright him away; for he said he was walking about Tower-hill or White-Chapel. But it was denied, and could not be granted that they should go, it being out of their liberties. He desired to go near those places, keeping within the liberties, and to send for them. Sir Thomas Aleyn told him, he might as well send for them thither. He desired to go to the Hoop-Tavern, and then some went with him to his house: his wife was private with him behind a partition; then he came put, and spoke publicly to his wife, says he, There is a man will be walking all alone, either at White-chapel, or on Tower-Hill, do you go there; if he sees you, he will ask you whether you want any thing, and will deliver you what I told you. We went to the Hoop-Tavern again, and about two hours after, the jewels were brought by his wife. That being done, we went to Mr. Tryon's, Mr. Turner carried the jewels; being at Mr. Tryon's the jewels were there opened: we found by perusal, that there was only a carcanet jewel wanting, of the value of about two hundred pounds; and Mrs. Turner said, the man told her, that that carcanet was fallen behind a chest, but did not doubt to procure it to-morrow. Afterwards, sir Thomas Aleyn told him now he could do no less than commit him to Newgate. Mr. Turner told him, then he had better have kept the jewels. The remainder of the money being asked for, he said he would be bound for it.

Mr. Mannock sworn.

Ld. Bridgman. What discourse passed between you and Mr. Turner at Newgate?

Mannock. My Lord, he told me Mr. Tryon was to give him 500*l.* to get the jewels and money, and that he had got him 500*l.* and most of the jewels: and that if sir Thomas Aleyn had not secured him, he did believe that he should have had them all: but Newgate was not a place to find them out.

Ld. Bridgman. Did he tell you of bringing any money from his own house? That the 500*l.* he delivered Mr. Tryon, was procured from his own house?

Mannock. He did tell me so, my Lord.

Turner. My lord, I own it, I shall unfold the riddle by and by.

Sir Thomas Chamberlain sworn.

L. C. J. Hyde. What know you, sir Thomas, of this business? Pray let the Jury hear you.

Sir T. Chamberlain. My lord, on Friday morning I was at the East India House, keeping court there for that company: afterwards I went to the Exchange, and being tired, I called in at the coffee-house, and there heard that Mr. Tryon was robbed. I went directly home, and dined: about three o'clock I went to Mr. Tryon's house, an old friend of mine, my father's servant heretofore, I went to visit him, and found a great many people about him; sir T. Aleyn, lady Garret, and the countess of Carlisle was there. I told him, Mr. Tryon, I understand you have been robbed. Yes, says he, I have a great loss. I found him very staggering what he should do. I said, you must now do like a man, or you will lose all: said I to sir T. Aleyn, if you do not help the poor man, being ancient, he will quite lose all. With that I went up above in the house, sir T. Aleyn was pleased to call me along with him, I was by at all the examinations; I did mistrust, and told Mr. Tryon in French, that no doubt but that gentleman was in the robbery: the reason was, that he being a frequent man in the house, knew every thing: he was there continually, coming for jewels and things, and no man could do it but himself; that was my judgment, I told sir T. Aleyn assuredly he had a hand in it. My lord, the while we were examining the servants, word was brought in, that he was hearkening at the door, and in the yards, which made me more and more mistrust him. We heard that the maid had been gadding abroad several times; I desired sir T. Aleyn to examine the maid how often she had supped at Turner's, she denied any time. The young man was examined, who said, they had been thirty or forty times feasted at col. Turner's. My lord, sir T. Aleyn has given you a just account, but he omitted one thing; he had a note sent him, which he had in his pocket, touching Mr. Turner's going about removal of the money into the Minorities; and before Turner came in, he examined Mrs. Turner upon that note: says he, you were there too, and carried the money. Says she, yes, I am a liar and a whore for saying so. Col. Turner came in and said, why do you torment and vex my wife; and falling a cursing, and swearing and banning, said she was with child, you will make her miscarry, let her alone. Sir T. Aleyn examined him where he had been that day, and that night; he told him of many taverns, and going to see his horse, and I know not what, but we found him faltering. When the jewels were brought, there being two notes, sir T. Aleyn had one, and I another. The old gentleman was so joyful to see them again, that lying by him, and handling them, he pulled two or three down with his sleeve. Says Mr. Turner, come, I know what belongs to them better than any of you, and read them over, and I will shew them you. There wanting one jewel, says he, that rogue that has the other money, hath this jewel, but I do not doubt but I shall find that out too. We put them all together, and sir T. Aleyn sealed them with his seal. For the bags of money,

I saw them taken out, and one being sealed with a small seal, I put on both my spectacles, I found a lion rampant at top in one of the quarters; said I, this is a seal of some great person; and then a letter was brought down, and being compared, I was satisfied in my conscience they were alike. Sir T. Aleyn told me he must make a mittimus for him and his wife: said she, do you send me of your errands? you shall send somebody else another time: I thought it would come to this. After much ranting and swearing (I thought the devil would have fetched him out of the room) he said, that he had better have kept the jewels, than to bring them forth, and to suffer for it himself, for he had pawned his soul, and would not reveal it; and said, that Mr. Tryon had likewise engaged the like to him. For the 600*l.* he offered his bond.

Lord Mayor. Pray repeat one part of your evidence again; that was, that somebody came to Mr. Tryon's house, from the house in the Minorities, charging Mrs. Turner to have been at that house.

Sir T. Chamberlain. I said, that before Turner came in with the jewels, Sir T. Aleyn had received a little note, wherein was affirmed, that Turner and his wife had been there; with which she was acquainted, and swore and took on, she was a whore, for she was not there.

Sir T. Aleyn. When I examined Mrs. Turner, she would own nothing. Why, said I, will you deny this which is so apparent? that you were there (the maid told you so now) you deny'd it when I charged you with it.

Mrs. Turner. I did not, it's false; what did—

Turner. Prythee be patient, dear Mal, come sit thee down.

Sir T. Aleyn. I asked Mrs. Turner whether she knew of any money carried to the Minorities that day; she said, she knew of no money at all, and said she was a whore that said it.

Mrs. Turner. They put it to me, that I knew who brought the money to my house, and that a woman acquainted them so; I said she was a lying whore that said so.

L. C. J. Bridgman. Mr. Hill, what time of night did you go out that night?

Hill. It was seven or eight o'clock.

L. C. J. Bridgman. Was the door lock'd?

Hill. Yes.

L. C. J. Bridgman. Did you carry the key with you?—Hill. Yes.

L. C. J. Bridgman. Was there any more keys?

Hill. There was another above in the chamber by my master's bed.

L. C. J. Bridgman. Did you find that other key when you came back?—Hill. Yes.

L. C. J. Bridgman. In the same place?

Hill. I know not that.

L. C. J. Bridgman. Mr. Hill, you have been acquainted with some transactions between Mr. Tryon and Turner; was he not employed about a mortgage?

Hill. Two or three.

L. C. J. Bridgman. Were not the names of some persons given to you to that purpose?

Hill. We have two or three mortgages my master lent him so much money upon: we heard of one man, but whether he gave order to Mr. Turner to take so much money upon the land, we know not.

L. C. J. Bridgman. Mr. Tryon, have you inquired after the persons?

Tryon. No, my Lord; I did believe all was true.

Garret. I have inquired after sir Theophilus Gilpin, but cannot find that he has any estate in England.

Turner. My Lord, Gilpin only assigns a judgment of Wescott's.

L. C. J. Bridgman. Then if Wescott be good it is sufficient; you should enquire after him?

Sir T. Aleyn. My Lord, John Turner, his son there, fled away from me, when I came to the house in the Minorities.

L. C. J. Bridgman. Why did you fly away?

John Turner. I did not, sir.

Sir T. Aleyn. No! You ran away as fast as you could; you got over a ditch.

John Turner. My Lord, a woman cryed out, 'Get away and save your life!' and I not knowing what the matter was, I went away.

Col. Turner. Poor boy! he thought thieves had been coming, and affrighted him.

Sir T. Aleyn. As to Ely Turner, I examined him upon the Sunday, the day after his father was committed; he would not confess the carrying of any money, and the maid swearing it, I committed him also.

Col. Turner. What's that of Ely? upon my soul, the boy carried none.

John Turner. I carried what was carried.

Col. Turner. My Lord, one son is as dear to me as the other, but if either be more, it must be my eldest; but yet I must say, it was John my eldest son that carried the money.

Sir T. Aleyn. My Lord, W. Turner was brought before me on Tuesday or Wednesday: sir R. Brown sent out his warrant for him, being a person of evil name, and likely to do such a fact; being taken, he was brought before me. My Lord, when Mr. Tryon looked upon him, he suspected him: I examined him when he saw Col. Turner; he said, not these three years, not to speak to him; and yet one at the Cock behind the Exchange said, this W. Turner staid for Col. Turner at his house two hours; that Col. Turner came in, paid for the pot of drink, and for ought he knew they both went together: thereupon I committed him. In the afternoon I ordered this person to send his servant; one came and made oath that he came in, and inquired for Col. Turner, asked for him, staid two hours for him; that they went both out of the house together: and this was on the Wednesday the day before the robbery.

William Dawes sworn.

All that I can say is this: William Turner was at my house on Wednesday was seven-night last; comes in, and called for a flagon of beer; there comes in a customer of mine, says he to me, What do you wish such a fellow in your house? Have a care of him, he is a dangerous fellow. Presently after col. Turner came in, and paid for a flagon of beer, and went away.

Col. Turner. I drank not with him, did I?

Dawes. Not that I saw.

L. C. J. Bridgman. Sir T. Aleyn, did not this Wm. Turner deny that he had seen col. Turner lately?

Sir T. Aleyn. He said positively he had not seen him these three years, so as to speak to him; said, he was grown too high for him.

John Rouse (Dawes's servant) sworn.

L. C. J. Bridgman. Do you remember when Wm. Turner was at your master's house? which is he?

Rouse. That's he (pointing to William) he was there upon Wednesday the 6th of this month.

L. C. J. Hyde. Did James (called colonel) Turner come there then?

Rouse. William came, and said he staid for the colonel; and by and by the colonel came.

L. C. J. Hyde. When he came, what did they?

Rouse. He went to the bar, and paid the reckoning.

L. C. J. Hyde. What time of the day?

Rouse. About twelve or one o'clock.

L. C. J. Bridgman. Did you ever see them both there before?

Rouse. No, I never saw them together before, but several others have enquired for col. Turner at our house.

L. C. J. Hyde. By the oath you have taken, did Wm. Turner say he staid for col. Turner, and that after col. Turner came, he paid for the drink, and they both went away together, and this on the Wednesday?

Rouse. Yes, Sir, it was so.

Col. Turner. My lord, I left him there; he followed me to the Exchange about his arrears, as twenty poor gentlemen do.

Mr. Garret, Mr. Watcher, and Mr. Peter Cully, sworn.

Mr. Cully. I was at Mr. Tryon's this day seavennight; as I came from him, I met Sir Tho. Aleyn, Col. Turner, and Major Tasker coming up stairs; they asked who was there with Mr. Tryon? I told them nobody. Turner desired earnestly they would stay a little; for (says he) before God you will spoil all the business by and by. After he had been a little time with Mr. Tryon, he comes forth again, he takes up the bags of money, says he, These belong to me, this is not Mr. Tryon's money: He carries it to the old gentleman; he comes into the room, says he, Gentlemen, you may be all gone, the old gentleman is satisfied, his money and jewels shall be forth-coming by 5 o'clock this night; persons of quality are concerned in the business, and the old gentleman will not prosecute. I asked col. Turner, Why was the money carried from your house to the Minorities? He said there was none, and did affirm it with an oath. When the bags were taken out of the wallets, upon comparing of a seal of one of the bags with the seal of a letter produced, I found them the same. That's all I can say.

Mr. Watcher. My lord, last Saturday between twelve and one o'clock came col. Turner on the Exchange, and said that Mr. Tryon should have all his money and jewels by three o'clock that afternoon; and if any man could say, that he lost sixpence of his money, or sixpenny-worth of his jewels, he had two fellows in custody that should suffer for it. And asking him why the money was that morning removed from his house to the Minorities, he said with a great oath, the money was never in his house.

Mr. Garret. When col. Turner brought home the money, he took up one of the wallets, and said, 'Jack, take notice, this is my money.'

L. C. J. Hyde. Where was this?

Garret. In my cousin Tryon's house; and that he only left it with my cousin Tryon. When we looked over this money in the evening, we found that seal that this gentleman (pointing to Mr. Cully) hath spoke of; it was a little defaced, but yet apparent enough.

Turner. I did say so, my lord; he speaks truth.

Mr. Pilkington sworn.

I can say no more than hath been said already: I shall repeat it. Being at the Hooptavern with Mr. Tryon's man, and others, with the officers, we were discoursing of his robbery; and I was saying, That I admired he being so ancient a gentleman, they would use him so barbarously as hath been related. Said col. Turner, In that they went beyond their commission, they had no order for it. And being asked how they got into the house, he said one got into the cellar in the day time: [And so related it in the same manner as several witnesses before.] Being asked how his tooth came to be beaten out? Says he, It was not with a blow; but the man's finger being in his mouth, he closed his teeth, and struggling to get out his finger, his knuckle thrust out the tooth. And then Mr. Tryon's man saying, If he and the maid had been at home, they should have been killed: No, said Turner, you would only have been bound.

L. C. J. Hyde. Now, Mr. Turner, you have heard your Charge; you will do well to make an Answer to it; you see what is laid to your charge.

Turner. Ay, my Lord: I shall clear it all, every syllable of it.

Mr. Martin's Coachman was called and sworn.

L. C. J. Bridgman. Tell the jury what you know: did you see any people about Mr. Tryon's house upon Thursday night?

Coachman. I did, my lord: I was come by from the play-house with my coach; I saw four men, two on one side of the door, and two on the other side; every one had a handkerchief tied about his neck, and every one of them had a good cudgel in his hand.

L. C. J. Bridgman. What time a-night was that?

Coachman. About eight or nine o'clock at night.

Lord-Mayor. Was their faces turned towards Mr. Tryon's door, as if they were to go in, or to knock?

Coachman. No, Sir, two stood towards Fenchurch-Street, and two stood towards Leadenhall-Street. I did suspect such a business; for they pulled down their hats over their faces.

L. C. J. Hyde. What kind of cudgels had they?

Coachman. Sticks somewhat bigger than walking-staves.

Mr. Tryon looking upon William Turner at the bar, said, This man, whose name is, (as I understand) William Turner, I do suppose to be one of the two that was in my chamber at the bed's side, and that indeed did strike out my tooth. I asked him, Why do you use me so inhumanly, like a beast, and not like a man? I am quiet; what would you have? Says he, Be still, you shall not lose a hair of your head.

L. C. J. Hyde. You believe that to be the man?

Tryon. I would be loth to charge him; but he is as like him as any I ever saw.

L. C. J. Hyde. Had they either vizors or masks on?

Tryon. Nothing, my Lord; bare-faced. One said to the other, It is but past 11 of the clock; else I had not known it: I was asleep, with surprise amazed, being an ancient weak man.

L. C. J. Hyde. As near as you can conjecture, is that the man?

Tryon. Yes, both of face and pitch.

Lord-Mayor. Mr. Tryon, did you observe those persons that were at your bed-side, whether they had handkerchiefs or cravats about their necks?

Tryon. My Lord, I did not take notice of that; I do not remember it.

L. C. J. Hyde. You hear your indictment: that you, and William and John, are indicted for the felony and burglary, for breaking and entering into the house of Mr. Francis Tryon, and stealing the particular goods and money, as you have heard: I would propose this to you, to make your defence touching your charge: Which is, first, that you and William met the day before; he came in first, and said he staid there until you came; you came, and paid the reckoning, and went away: you two were together the day before: what your business was, you can better tell than I. The night he was robbed, his servant being gone, the door was double locked. You knew all the private places, where the keys lay, all the rooms wherein cash, jewels, where every thing was: and it was not possible this burglary could be committed but by one that knew those things.

Turner. There are about twenty people that knew as much as I; his servants, and such as had been his servants.

L. C. J. Hyde. It falls out that the self-same night after this house was robbed, in the morning early, you, your wife and son, go to remove store of money out of your house.

Turner. It was two nights after the robbery: pardon me, my dear Lord.

L. C. J. Hyde. When you carry this, you go with a false story, That a merchant was broke, and you must needs have some of the money for his wife and eight children; and this money was to be set aside for them.

Turner. It was so, my good Lord.

L. C. J. Hyde. You would do well to hold your peace a while: your wife and you disowned you removed any money; yet afterwards when the money was brought there, and taken upon suspicion, (you taken in the very place removing the money) you owned it to be your own: that then it appeared that one of those bags was sealed with the bishop of Chichester's seal; and at the time of the burglary, there was 600*l.* in bags left with Mr. Tryon, sealed with the said seal; and one of those bags you brought back was taken with you, and owned to be your own, and had the same seals.

—That is proved by four or five witnesses, compared with the seal of a letter of the bishop. Your son, on their coming thither, he takes footing and leaps over the ditch to escape, which is a good just ground of suspicion that he is guilty of somewhat that he would not abide to answer. Yourself and wife take upon you to know every thing: you knew how the usage was; that there was a purpose they should not be killed; that he was gagged; that they exceeded their commission; if the man and maid had been at home, they should have been but bound. All particulars you take upon you to know, and to confess the whole and the manner of it; nay, tell the story how they came in.

Turner. As I was informed.

L. C. J. Hyde. Lay all this together, unless you answer it, all the world must conclude that you are one that did this robbery.

Turner. I shall answer it: I hope to give all the world satisfaction. Pray call Mr. Vandeputt, Mr. Covell, Mr. Esnow, Mr. Cook, my maid, and the lord marquis of Dorchester's servant.

L. C. J. Hyde. Tell us to what purpose.

Turner. To clear every particular.

L. C. J. Hyde. Open it.

Turner. I shall first prove that upon Thursday night, the time of this supposed burglary, that myself, my wife, and all my family, were in bed, fast asleep, and innocent, not knowing any thing of this business. This I shall prove; if not, let me hang and all my family.

L. C. J. Bridgman. All this may be true, and yet this not to the purpose.

Turner. Then I cannot be guilty of the burglary.

L. C. J. Bridgman. If you will lay and plot such a robbery, though you are not there, yet you are guilty of it* ; for it is ordinary that the main setter will not be present at such times, but will be then in bed, that people may take notice thereof. But satisfy the court by what means you came by this money and jewels, and then call your witnesses.

Turner. I shall go on by degrees, and satisfy you as to the whole.

L. C. J. Hyde. My lord Bridgman hath put you upon the right business: Do that in the first place; make it appear how you came to know so exactly the whole carriage of this business, and how you came by the money and jewels.

Turner. I shall do it, my lord. The constable coming for me, by direction of Mr. Tryon, to assist him, I came to him: saith he, some villains have been here, and have robbed me this night; which made me weep. Said I, these are wicked people: I gave you notice how you should have been robbed about a year since; but that was prevented. And saith Mr. Tryon, for God's sake assist me in this, and I shall be thankful to you. Sir, said I, did you see the faces of them? Said he, It run in my mind very strongly that one of them is Christmas. Said I, who is he? Saith he, It was Hanson the grocer's man. I know Hanson, said I. Mosely, go and knock up Hanson, and know where Christmas is, and bring him to Mr. Tryon. Mosely took two or three men, and went to Thomas Hanson, in Mark-lane, and there found at a bricklayer's house where Christmas lay: He was a little refractory to rise. Another constable coming, he came down; and then they sent Christmas to the Compter. Mosely came and told us he was in the Compter. I sat with Mr. Tryon that night. But, my lord, pray observe how my name came into question: the young man and maid being out, came home late, the constable was there then: Friends, saith he, where have you been? saith he, I have been at col. Turner's at supper; which was a notorious lie, and brought me here in question; God forgive him

* But it seems that if this had been the fact, he should not have been convicted as a principal in this offence, but only as an accessory before the fact. "That, which makes an accessory before, is command, counsel, abetment or procurement, by one to another, to commit a felony, when the commander or counsellor is absent at the time of the felony committed: for if he be present, he is principal." 1 Hale's Pleas of the Crown, 616. But if in aid of the others he had stood to watch in some adjacent place, while they entered, &c. he would have been guilty of the burglary. See 1 Hale's Pleas of the Crown, 439, 555, 1 Hawkins Pl. Cr. 268. Ed. 1798. NB. The marginal reference in the last mentioned book to Kelyng, 111, seems to be not at all to the purpose. For more learning concerning accessories, see the Case of Mac Daniel and others, A. p. 1754, infra. See also Foster, Disc. 9, ch. 1, §. 4.

for it. Away comes the constable, by direction of Mr. Tryon, and Hill's lye together. He came to my house; we were all asleep. I rose, and asked, Who is there? It is I, said Mr. Mosely; Mr. Tryon is robbed; pray come down. I came down, and opened my door. Saith he, Was Mr. Tryon's man and maid here at supper? When? said I. To-night, said he. I have had no suppers these nine months, said I: This William is a very rogue. Whereupon the constable replied, Are your sons within? Yes, in bed these two hours. Do you suspect any thing by my sons? he went and looked, and saw my wife, he finds my sons fast asleep; the one indeed was awake. Pray, said I, see that you know them again. Upon my honour, my lord, this boy (pointing to Ely) was asleep.

L. C. J. Hyde. Upon your honour, sir! pray speak by your honesty.

Turner. Lapsus lingua, my lord: It is my usual phrase. I hope I shall appear to be a good inan. This child was awake: he saw the maid, my daughters: searched every room, searched every place that was to be imagined to be searched. Saith the constable, I am very glad that your servants, your children, and you are in this condition: I will acquaint Mr. Tryon, what a rogue this Hill is, how he hath belied you. Nay, said I, pray take me with you; and so I went with my hair put under my cap. When I came to Mr. Tryon's, I asked him who had been there? Pardon me, my dear lord, if I were guilty, I should not speak any thing to excuse it. When I had understood this, I gave the constable five shillings, and desired him to search about this business. I went to Mr. George Day the goldsmith, and gave him a note of those things, to be printed, that they said they had lost. Friday came; and at night sir Thomas Aleyn was pleased to argue it with me: I told him and the gentleman these must be some rogues that know the house; which put me in mind of a former crew that was to rob him a year since.

L. C. J. Bridgman. We would be glad you would speak to the purpose.

Turner. I did charge the constable and Mr. Pilkington that they would get up before day; and that they would go to such and such places where the constable and I had privately spoken of, to Ratcliff, or Ratcliff Cross. The constable and Mr. Tryon's man had been there; but the man and his wife was gone into London; But afterwards, by inquiry, the boy said they were gone into Hertfordshire a week before. This boy is in two tales: here is some, pray God these people be honest.

L. C. J. Bridgman. Go on.

Turner. Your honour's servant, my lord. Afterwards I went beyond the little postern between the two Tower-hills, near the Tower-ditch: There is one John Wild, who had been formerly here in Newgate; he should have been transported. This fellow coming into my mind, I having before been to take him in East-Smithfield, I had news he used Whitechapel, East-Smithfield, and Tower-hill, and had lodgings by the Blue Boar by the little Postern, and at Noah's Ark, and at the Lion-in-the-Wood, the corner house at Tower-ditch. This house about Tower-ditch and the Nag's-Head at Whitechapel were the two places where I found those persons about a twelvemonth since, that should have robbed him. Going now from house to house, I passed a fellow in black, in a large coat, such another man as this, (pointing at one that stood by:) he was in a black loose coat, and he was trimmed with ribband at the knees. This person I passed him, and he passed me; and then I out-went him: and meeting him on the other side, I was confirmed it must be one of these fellows I looked for, one Wild or White. Passing the second time, I ran to him, thrusting to him. What mean you, Sir? said he. Said I, I mean to lay flat felony to your charge. Do not you know me? No, said he, with a great oath. Then I know you. Who is it, colonel Turner? said he. I said, Ay. Saith he, What do you mean? Said I, Mr. Tryon's house was robbed, and you are the person that I will lay flat felony to; you should have been one of them that were to rob him a year since, when colonel Ashton betrayed you all. He began with some hard oaths: Be quiet, said I, I will call out; you are an undone man: I will lay this felony to you.

L. C. J. Bridgman. What night was this?

Turner. The Friday night following, about 12 o'clock at night. I shifted my hold from his collar to the waistband of his breeches; I thought I had him secure. Said I, Wild, do not deceive yourself, play not the fool; if you will save your life, let me see where those goods and monies are, else you will go to pot. Saith he, Pray speak lower; we shall be heard. Well, I will speak lower. We walked to the hill. I had fast hold of his breeches all this while; and yet I was afraid he might have some dagger, and stab me: Said I, Be brief, you are alone; either resolve me, or I will call out. Then I will tell you, said he: Colonel Turner, I understand you are a person of honour, and a gentleman that will keep your word: and if you will upon a serious vow and promise save my life, I will unfold the business: but if you will not, with a great oath, saith he, you shall hang me, and lose all the jewels. Said I, What will you have of me? Saith he, You shall swear to me, 'That by the blood of that Jesus Christ that died for you, and I, and all sinners, that I shall have my life free, in case I discover the thing to you;' and then I will tell you more: if you will not I will tell you nothing, do with me what you will. Saith I, Wild, I shall stand with you so long, that I shall have my throat cut. Upon my salvation, saith he, stopping down upon his knees, saith he, Let me never rise up, if I am not just to you; and not a hair of your head shall be touched. Said I, Come, stand up: I do declare to you that I will endeavour with old Mr. Tryon: tell me where the things are. They are not far off. Where are they? They are at two places: but do you swear to me. He did, in short, make me say the same words that I have repeated, and that I would get Mr. Tryon to engage himself too by the same oath. I did swear to him, thinking my life in danger, and thinking my friend's goods likely to be lost; and did and do intend by the help of God to make good my oath. Saith he, Walk with me. He whistled once, the second time, and at a pretty distance a third time; and within a little while came another fellow to him, at the further end, by the Horse-Shoe tavern. He comes. Saith he, Art thou come, Tom? I think he called him White. Ay, saith he. What shall we do? We are all undone; my face is known. But I have lit in the hands of a gentleman who will save my life; but for you, he knows you not. Saith he, the money must be returned; go and fetch that money. Said I, Shall not I go with them? No, said he. And truly, my lord, I was very glad to take him at his word: If I had gone, I might have had my throat cut. There was this 500*l.* brought at twice, three and two. They went again, and brought, as I take it, two and one; so there was three and two, and two and one.

L. C. J. Bridgman. Who brought it?

Turner. White. All this while I had the fellow by the breeches, and would not part with him. It was from a little past twelve till four bringing, and was left on the causey, and went away and fetched the other. This fellow and I, all alone together, had this discourse: Said I, What desperate villains were you to go and use the old gentleman in this manner, fourscore years of age! You beat and abused him; you are strange mad fellows: why could you not let him sleep in his bed? he was asleep when you came in: you were the maddest fellows that ever was. Saith he, Some of you have stabbed him. I think you deserve ten thousand deaths for laying your hands on him, though you did not take sixpenny worth of his goods. Saith he, There was no intention of hurting him: upon my soul, there was no order or commission. Saith I, How got you in? Saith he, The door stands open half a day together, almost: one got into the cellar, and stood till all was a-bed: he went into the kitchen, found a candle standing lighted, and went up into the old gentleman's chamber, and there he found the key of the door, came down, opened the door, and let the rest in. How many was there of them? Saith he, three or four. Said I, What did you do; and what would you have done? We would only have bound them. How got you the treasure? By a key out of the old gentleman's pocket: I think there is no hurt to the old gentleman; I would not for all the world there should. You shall have the things again: and pray keep your word with me. About 4 o'clock in the morning they brought the money. Now, said I, what shall we do with it? I can do nothing with it: you must carry it home to my house. These two fellows carried one three, and the other two bags.—We went through Aldgate with the money, and so to my house: my wife, nor sons, nor no soul, God is my witness, knew any thing of this business but myself. I knocked at the door: This young man (pointing to John) came down, and he unbolted, unlocked, and unlatched the door. My parlour and kitchen is all of one floor: They followed me in, and threw down the money. He bringing the candle to me; No, said I, do not bring it. Said I, Wild, what shall I do for the jewels and the rest of the money? You shall have them brought you where you will appoint to-day. I will have them brought hither. Saith he, That cannot be. I have forgot myself: This money must not lie here: you must remove it from hence: For the other youths that have the rest of the money and jewels, will never be brought into the city. If you will remove it into the Minorities, my life for it, you will have it all. I will pretend there we will share it. You must not let it lie at all, but carry it presently thither. I will tell what I will do: Have you any acquaintance about Tower-hill, where you will leave it? No, said he. Nor I neither, said I. I went up stairs to my wife; Mall, said I, have you any acquaintance about the further Tower-hill? I durst not trust my wife nor sons: for I thought their tongues might be too long, and left them in perfect ignorance. Truly, I must clear them. Mall, said I, there is a gentlewoman, whose husband is failed, (this was a feigned story, my lord) it must be secured about Tower-hill: She was pretty well awake. Saith she, There is the commissary-general of the king, his daughter Betty Fry keeps a shop of linen at the lower end of the Minorities. Do you think she will be private, and let it lie for four or five hours? Undoubtedly she will, saith she. Prythee get up, and put on thy clothes, and go thither. Wild, where shall I find you about 8 or 9 o'clock? I will lodge this at the seamstress's shop, upon the right hand at the farther end of the Minorities: Tell me where I shall meet you, and we will have this money carried there; my son, and I, we will have it lodged. Saith he, You shall have me walking within three doors of the Blue Pig; so he called it, Saith I, What mean you? Saith he, It is a little sign, no bigger than a pig, but it is called the Blue Boar: There you shall have me walking in the under or upper causey. My lord, I took this boy, (pointing to John) who knew nothing: I told him it was a friend's money. I raised my wife: Mall, said I, come away. My wife went before; the boy and I took the money: I carried two, and he three. My wife went and knocked up the maid, the door was open when we came; God forgive this maid that swears it was this son, she is mistaken; upon my salvation, this boy was abed and asleep. When the money was there, I staid by my wife; said I, what have you done with this money? I did not tell my wife any thing. I came home, coming home, there was my son and wife. I drank a cup of cyder (for I kept a hog'shead of cyder in my house); as soon as I drank it, I went out of doors immediately: Said I, to this youngest son, Stay at home, I shall have occasion to use you by and by. I went to Mr. Tryon's; coming there, I found Mr. Gurney the merchant: Said I, Mr. Gurney, I have good news, I have some hopes of strong presumptions, that Mr. Tryon will not lose one pennyworth of his goods. Marry, said he, I am glad of that. We went up to Mr. Tryon's, we found him sitting by a little charcoal fire, as much as you may cover with your hands: he told us he had been ever since three of the clock. We asked him, what he would have to comfort him: he told us, he had something. Mr. Gurney after some discourse took his leave of him, so I sat down (Jesus! what a noise is here in the Court. My lord, I can hear but with one ear). I say, I sat down at the bed-side of Mr. Tryon, he on the stool: Mr. Tryon, said I, I have good news for you. Saith he, Hast thou? I am glad of it with all my soul. Sir, said I, I am informed you will not lose any of your goods or money, there is but 38s. spent of all your money, the rogues took but 40s. out, and Wild told me there was 2s. saved: I dare boldly say, by three of the clock in the afternoon you will be master of them again. I would be glad of that, and will give you 500*l*. But, sir, said I, there is a tale hangs by this: You know you should have been robbed about a year since; and I have apprehended Wild, who was one of the intended thieves: then, he hath made me swear. By the blood of Jesus Christ, &c. that he shall have his life, if you have your goods: He hath engaged me that you shall likewise swear by the like oath, or else you shall hang him, and so lose your goods. Said I, I have a great part of your money, but the jewels and the rest of your money is wanting. The old gentleman was almost overjoyed: This is not true, said he. Said I, I do declare this is true in the presence of God, make no words of it; if the business be discovered, we shall lose the jewels. Well, said he, I will be ruled by you, colonel; and the Lord God make me thankful I have such a friend in the world that hath done this for me, I shall never make you amends: and thereupon he entered into the same oath, That by the blood, &c. the blood of the man should not be spilt though he lost both money and jewels. I discoursed with him, I told him over and over again, left him satisfied that I would be with him again, and bring him more tidings, but by 3 o'clock I doubted not but he should have all. Then it was almost 8 at night; away went I to Tower-hill to look my merchant John Wild, he was here in Newgate formerly: there found I him walking by the Blue-Boar, carelessly walking there, with his coat under his arms. Said I, How now, what news? I think I have now pleased you, saith he. What have you done? said I. I have lodged the money hard by, and all is right. What have you done? Is all right on the other side? All shall be well: But where have you lodged it? Here at a seamstress at the corner of the Minorities: said he, The money must be removed, there are salesmen thereabouts, and the fellow that hath the jewels he is known, he will not come thither; remove it towards the wafer-side, any where and the things shall come, my life for it. They had a cat's eye ring, they were such wise lapidaries, they called this a hundred pound ring, when it was not worth five pound. He gave order that the money might be again removed to the other end by the Horse-shoe tavern. I run home, fetched my son; said I, Wife, we must have away the money. My lord, he told me he would have away the money to the Half-Moon tavern in St. Catherine's or the corner tavern at the Iron-gate; said I, Are not you resolved? Well, said he, it shall be carried to St. Catherine's, he would meet my son at the Noah's-ark at Tower-ditch: let my son but hand the money over that path, and he would hand it to the other. We did carry it, carried it again. At this second carrying comes sir Thomas Aleyn, he had heard some cry of money left, he comes with a great company of people after him, and the foolish wench said to my son, Mr. John, fly for your life. John being surprised and affrighted, he went out of the back-door, went over the ditch, and went to my house. Sir Thomas Aleyn had also sent to secure my house. When the lad came home into the street, my doors were shut up: (Gentlemen of the Jury, do you understand?) The boy seeing such a rout at the door, saith the people, Mr. John, your father's house is shut up about Mr. Tryon's money. He walked by the street, and went into Bishopsgate-street, and Cheapside, into Paternoster-Row, and so into Fleet-street: I did not hear of him till Saturday, in the afternoon.

When sir Thomas Aleyn came, saith he, Mr. Turner, here we have catched you and the money. Said I, if you be hasty and passionate, as you were last night, you will spoil all the whole business. Tell me, saith he, whose money it is? Said I, it is my money. The truth is, the old gentleman hath promised me 500*l*. it is the naked truth; I would not have sir Thomas Aleyn have the honour of gaining it, but I would have the honour of gaining it my way.

Sir Thomas would know whether it was my money, I told him I had received part of it at a goldsmith's; so I put sir Thomas off. Come, come, said he, we will carry this money to Mr. Tryon. Said I to Mr. Tryon, Here is part of your money, you know what I told you even now. Ay, saith he, God be thanked, before sir Thomas Aleyn. I asked him, what his promise was, and told him how the passage was in short; and the old man did acknowledge that such a promise was made, and would have down upon his knees. I passed my word to him, that by three o'clock I doubted not but he would have his jewels, and the rest of the money. Saith sir Thomas Aleyn, go (whether he said live and prosper, I know not) go, God bless you; and upon my honour, (I think that was his word) the old man shall make good his word. Ay, but sir Thomas, what will become of me and you, by this business, for I understand the law? How will this business be daub-ed up? You will be fined, sir Thomas; I must break my word, he must be apprehended, or I must suffer. Saith sir Thomas, do not trouble me with that, get but the goods, and the old man's word shall be made good, leave that to me. More than that, he said, He would make up the business, or he would smother it. My lord, you have a great deal of patience, I am humbly bound to you, here is nothing but the naked truth step by step, as I trod it. Afterwards Wild came and said, All will be well. Said I, What have you done? Are you sure, saith he, the jewels nor nothing shall be stirred? Said I, You see all is spoiled; sir Thomas Aleyn is come where we had lodged the money, the thing is known, do not they hear of it? Yes, they hear as well as you, and know what is done, and some have eyes upon you. Said I, they will run away with the jewels. No, you shall meet about three o'clock; nobody knows me but you, your wife, and your son, who saw me this morning at three o'clock, either by the Blue-Pig at Tower-Hill, or Nag's-Head over against White-Chapel church.

It is agreed, for God's sake look to it, your life and mine is concerned; if the jewels be lost, I will persecute you to the death, look they are preserved, and not purloined. Saith he, The bags were never opened. I parted with him, he was to look for me at three of the clock: coming home about Change-time, who should I meet with but Mr. Stubbs, who told me that it was all the news upon the Exchange, that you have been in the robbery. Said I, Do not trouble your head, I have discovered the business. Then said Stubbs, You know I and Thomas Lyon are bail for you. At that time I satisfied him. Afterwards that day I met with Mr. Cole the officer; said he, Colonel, I arrest you. For what? for more fooleries yet? Thomas Lyon will not be satisfied. By six o'clock this business will be all over: nothing will serve your turn but violence, violence, no force, no law. I was forced to go to the Hoop-tavern. I got them to send for Mr. Stubbs and Lyon; they came: said I, What will you have? I am in prosecution of a business for Mr. Tryon, you will undo it with this six-penny business: say what security you will have, and you shall have it: said I, Mr. Tryon and sir T. Aleyn shall give you their security, to save you harmless for being my bail. Said they, Hold Mr. Tryon, we'll do it; we are content; they went away, and told me they would get a bond, and come presently: but what was this presently? I will warrant you they staid two hours; it was seven o'clock at night before I parted with them. I was fain to send the little boy for Mr. Hill, Mr. Pilkington, Mr. Millington; this was either a curse from God sent upon me, or a plot of roguery that the money should be lost. They came not back till seven o'clock, and then without a bond; and I fell a little violent: but I was telling them how these rogues told me the whole carriage of this robbery: when it came that Mr. Tryon and sir T. Aleyn heard that I was in custody, he sent a constable with a warrant to bring us all before him. When we came there, I desired sir Thomas to let a gentleman go with me; I will break my oath with the fellow, and we will apprehend him, and make him bring the jewels. Sir T. Aleyn told them, if they would all go together, they might; but to go out of the liberties, he could not let them go: I have you, and I will keep you, and do find him if you will. How now, sir Thomas, said I, are you come to that? have you fooled me all this while? if faith, I thank you, for you have trepanned me very fairly; if any thing miscarry in my honour and reputation, or blood, you are in the fault: here I do declare, said I, if you will let me go, I will take him. Then sir Thomas did incline to let me: what say you, officers, will you go out of your liberties with this gentleman? Sir Thomas, said I, there is no liberty or privilege for felons; I will seize a felon myself in any ground in England without warrant. I do remember this Wild did condition, that in case I could not come, I should trust no man living but myself, because he had had my soul pawned to him. I asked him whom he would trust: He said, if I could send my wife, describing her to him, that she was a full short woman about forty or fifty years old, she had a long black scarf on; then let him alone if I cannot come, I will send such a woman, and send the things by her, and preserve your life. I told sir Thomas this story. My wife came to me publicly, I did not whisper with her—

Mrs. Turner. Nay, look you, husband—

Col. Turner. Prythee, Mall, sit down: you see, my lord, my wife will interrupt me with nonsense. Prythee sit thee down quickly, and do not put me out: I cannot hold women's tongues, nor your lordship neither.

Ld. Bridgman. This is not a May-game.

Col. Turner. My lord, it is a serious business, and I hope God will bless it. Pray, said I, Mall, go; as you love and honour my life and credit, or any thing that concerns me, I beg you to go. Then I will go, saith she; whither must I go? You must go to the further Tower-hill, six doors beyond the little postern: now it is so much o'clock, from five to seven he will walk there. A fellow will come to you in black, that man that in the morning took the money from Jack, he will know you, and once in a quarter or half an hour he will come to you. If you do not find him in half an hour, stay no longer, but pack away to White-chapel, ask for the Nag's-head in White-chapel, and once in a quarter of an hour you will have a man come to you, and take notice of you, and ask you who you are; and you must say, that you walk for one to give you somewhat: he will deliver you somewhat, and whatever he delivers you, bring it hither. Said I to them, You may send if you will, and dodge my wife, and catch him that way; they would not. I sent my poor wife away, and, saving your lordship's presence, she did all bedirt herself, a thing she did not use to do, poor soul: She found this Nag's-head, she sat down, being somewhat fat and weary, poor heart! I have had 27 children by her, 15 sons and 12 daughters. Seven or eight times this fellow did round her—

Mrs. Turner. Let me give that relation.

Col. Turner. You cannot, it is as well: prythee sit down, dear Mall, sit thee down, good child, all will be well. When she came back, she came with something in her apron: What are you sped, saith he? I know not what: a man came to me, and asked me who I looked for; I told him, I looked for any man that would give me any thing. Are you col. Turner's wife? and upon her answer he gave her these bags into her apron, and was gone a matter of a yard from her: steps back again, that is not all, here is a diamond ring worth 100*l.*, give that to your husband. And this diamond ring proves a cat's-eye ring, and worth but 4*l.*

Mrs. Turner. Well, and did not I bring these—

Col. Turner. Look you, my lord, this woman will put me out. My lord, she did deliver all these things, and went home. I did take out these goods: Now, said I, Mr. Tryon, you see all is come, (sir Thomas Chamberlain was there) I have performed all my part, look to the rest, that you perform yours. Some people report, that there is other jewels of my own; my lord, they are all his own, and he will not disown it, and I do not expect my 500*l.* for what I have done, according to his promise, 'That as Jesus died,' &c. and the man should not be prosecuted, nor lose a hair of his head, if he lose his whole estate: and I do expect my money, not such a reward as this. After which I was committed by sir T. Aleyn, and so was my wife. Now pray let me call my witnesses, and if I cannot make it good, that I am clear, let me be hanged. My lord, I shall humbly intreat that Mr. Vandeput may be called, Mr. Cowel, and the others.

Ld. Bridgman. What do you prove by them.

Turner. To prove part of this business, That I did assure Mr. Tryon of his goods: and to my reputation. I forgot one chief thing, I am not a man in debt, take notice of that, no man in the world hath my bill for 5*l.* There is only this contest between Mr. Vanburgh and myself which is left to arbitrators, and the lord-mayor is umpire: It is known I have an estate, and there is one thing remarkable, gentlemen of the jury, I could have had all these jewels at any time in trust; I could have broke as well as others, and paid 5*s.* in the pound: I lately made payment of 2,600*l.* for goods, and can have 20,000*l.* credit any day upon the Exchange: Why I that had this credit, that might break for so much money, why should I put my neck in a halter? These are very strong arguments for me, that I am not such a person.

Ld. Bridgman. I will tell you what you have done: You have made a very long story, and have taken up the time of the court these two hours in a narrative; and when all is done, answer me, Have you any witness to prove all this discourse passed between you and Wild?

Turner. I have by, witnesses to prove I said this, that there was such discourses between us.

Ld. Bridgman. No doubt of it; and so will many a man at Newgate frame such a story as this.

L. C. J. Hyde. You have told a long story about Wild, that you took him by the throat, and that you were alone; what weapons had you.—Turner. None, my lord.

Ld. Bridgman. Had you a lanthorn with you.—Turner. No, my lord.

Ld. Bridgman. What time of the night was it?

Turner. Twelve o'clock, my lord.

Ld. Bridgman. You staid till four, so they were four hours a bringing of the money?

Turner. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. Hyde. You took a man in the dark by the throat, that man that was guilty of such a thing, as when that you did let him go to call his companions, to bring the money, bring fellows to you single; I would be glad to know, whether in this case they would not have knocked you on the head, and killed you?

Turner. My lord, Wild had engaged his soul, and I my soul to him, that if I would not discover him, I should go away free.

Ld. Bridgman. Great security indeed!

Col. Turner called several witnesses, viz. Vandeput, Mr. Cowel, Mr. Legoose, Mr. Snow, and Mr. Mosely the constable. I desire my maid may be called: pray ask sir Thomas Aleyn what he hath done with my maid, he took her up with sir Richard Brown and two marshal's men: (pray, gentlemen, make not a laughing business of this) sir Thomas, pray where is my maid?

Sir T. Aleyn. I had this maid upon examination, I found cause of further examination, thereupon directed an officer to take her, and she is now in the garden.

Mr. Mosely the constable examined.

When I came first to Mr. Tryon, at Mr. Tryon's house, he was bound; then he asked where his man and maid was? he said he could not tell. By and by the man came in, and being asked where he was, he answered he was at col. Turner's at supper. Presently after we went to col. Turner's he came to the window, his wife and two sons were in bed.

Ld. Bridgman. Did Mr. Tryon give you order to come to him?

Mosely. Yes, my lord, he did.

L. C. J. Hyde. Mosely, you were constable, were you not? What discourse had you with Mr. Turner about a dangerous place that you did suspect, where some people may be to do such a feat?

Mosely. I never heard of any such thing spoken,

Ld. Bridgman. You say Mr. Tryon he wished you to call Turner to him; did he give you any order or direction to search his house? Who wished you to go up to the house to see whether his sons and daughters were in bed?

Mosely. Mr. Turner did, my lord.

Turner. He doth not say true, my lord: pray ask him, when he came to my door, and I opened it, if he did not ask whether Mr. Tryon's servant was there at supper that night? I said, no. Is your sons within, said he? I said, Ay. Pray let me see them.

Mosely. I came to Mr. Turner's house, and knocked at the door with some others with me; at last the colonel came out of his bed. I suppose he came out of his bed, being partly naked; he came down to the door; I asked him, where are your sons? They are in bed, says he. Said I, Mr. Tryon is robbed, he would have you come to him.

Ld. Bridgman. Did he desire you to go up?

Mosely. No, my lord; but I asking him whether his sons were in bed, he said, I prythee go up and see.

Turner. My lord, I would prove where my sons were on Thursday night at ten o'clock.

Lord Marquis of Dorchester's servant examined.

My Lord, till nine o'clock they were with me at my Lord Marquis's house.

Ld. Bridgman. What time came they thither?

Marq. Servant. Between seven and eight at night.

Col. Turner's maid examined.

Turner. Come, maiden, pray tell my Lord and the court when my sons came home this night.

Maid. Between nine and ten o'clock.

Ld. Bridgman. Were your master and his sons in bed all Friday night, or no?

Maid. Yes, my Lord, they were.

L. C. J. Hyde. Did your master go forth on Friday night?

Maid. No, he was at home and in bed all that night till 8 in the morning, and Thursday night before.

Turner. A silly soul, she knows not what she says.

L. C. J. Hyde. I will ask you again, was your master at home on Friday night?

Maid. No, I think he was not.

L. C. J. Hyde. Why did you say so before?

Maid. I cannot remember, Sir.

Ld. Bridgman. She knows her master's mind.

Turner. No, upon my soul, my Lord.

Ld. Bridgman. My masters of the jury, this is the use of the maid's testimony; she will say any thing, she is no fit witness, no trust to be given to her either one way or other.

Turner. Pray call Mr. Cowel, Mr. Legoose, Mr. Cook the Goldsmith.

Ld. Bridgman. What do you call these for?

Turner. To prove my condition, my credit and reputation.

Ld. Bridgman. The jury knows that already.

Mr. Cook. Thus much I can say, that I have known him some twenty years, I have had dealing with him to the value of several hundred pounds, I have trusted him, and have found him very faithful; I have seen in his possession jewels to the value of 8 or 10,000*l.* by which I suppose if he had been such a person, he might have done himself a kindness by breaking.

Mr. Legoose. All I can say, is, I have an acquaintance with this person, he was a solicitor, dealt honestly and faithfully in a business wherein I was concerned; he hath lived very well.

Sir R. Brown. Where you have heard one man say he is an honest man have you not heard a hundred say otherwise?

Mr. Legoose. There hath been an ill report that he hath been a person that lived high.

Turner. Sir R. Brown, no man in England can say black is my eye.

Sir R. Brown. Mr. Turner, you say you were upon Tower-Hill all Friday night; whither went you in the morning?

Turner. I came home between 4 and 5 in the morning.

Sir R. Brown. Your maid offered to depose even now, that you did not rise all that morning before eight of the clock.

Turner. Lapsus Linguae, if the girl be mistaken.

Ld. Bridgman. Do not trouble yourself with that, her evidence is of no force.

Mr. Jeffries. Col. Turner, I cannot say any thing that will be advantageous to you; my lord, and gentlemen of the jury, I have heard Mr. Tryon hath trusted him with jewels to a good value, and that Mr. Tryon had a very good repute of him.

Sir R. Brown. Pray what report hath he upon the Exchange?

Turner. I owe nothing there, Sir Richard nor none there can lay any thing to my charge, except it be that I am a cavalier.

L. C. J. Hyde. Mr. Turner, have you any more.

Turner. My Lord, I do want these Goldsmiths, they do not appear, they promised me they would.

L. C. J. Hyde. How can we help it?

Turner. I do humbly beg your honour and this honourable bench, that the old gentleman, my old friend, may declare what passed between us on Saturday morning.

Ld. Bridgman. Consider what you do, for here would you have Mr. Tryon swear against himself: hear what you would put him to, take it as you put it, though I do not believe a word of it. As you put the case, here is Wild commits a robbery, you come and truck with Wild, and agree with him that Mr. Tryon shall let him go, shall not meddle with him, there shall be no prosecution, so the jewels and money may be brought; would not you get Mr. Tryon to conceal a felony and felon, and he confess against himself he made this agreement with you? that Mr. Tryon did consent to it, that he promised you five hundred pound to shuffle up this business?

Turner. Hear me, pray; you put me out: I had not let this man go, I begged that they would go with me, sir T. Aleyn would not let us go, we would have taken him, I was sensible of the danger; it may be we might have had the felon and the goods too.

L. C. J. Hyde. No doubt, upon your own story, all this while you had no possibility of having the goods, unless the life of this fellow may be given you; so you were fain to agree, and plight your word to him, pawn your soul that he should be free, untouched, so he would discover the goods and money. Sir T. Aleyn, speak to that particular again.

Sir T. Aleyn. My Lord, and gentlemen of the jury, all this while you had no possibility of having the goods, unless the life of this fellow may be given you; so you were fain to agree, and plight your word to him, pawn your soul that he should be free, untouched, so he would discover the goods and money. Sir T. Aleyn, speak to that particular again.

Sir T. Aleyn. My Lord, and gentlemen of the jury, all this while you had no possibility of having the goods, unless the life of this fellow may be given you; so you were fain to agree, and plight your word to him, pawn your soul that he should be free, untouched, so he would discover the goods and money. Sir T. Aleyn, speak to that particular again.

Sir T. Aleyn. My Lord, and gentlemen of the jury, all this while you had no possibility of having the goods, unless the life of this fellow may be given you; so you were fain to agree, and plight your word to him, pawn your soul that he should be free, untouched, so he would discover the goods and money. Sir T. Aleyn, speak to that particular again.

Sir T. Chamberlain. I heard no such thing.

Ld. Bridgman. What did he tell you?

Sir T. Chamberlain. He would have gone with one with him, and pretended he could find out the jewels only.

Mr. Millington. There were some propositions made, he desired first I should go with him singly; I told him there would be no security, but if he would get a sufficient guard, I would go with him: but he went home to his wife, and never made mention of any party's name, but that there was a party he expected the jewels of.

Ld. Bridgman. Did he propose any thing touching the taking that man?

Millington. Nothing but that he had pawned his soul there should be no discovery of it.

Bridgman. Did he desire that you should go and take the man?

Millington. No, but that we might go and secure the jewels.

Serj. Cole. My lord, there was a great deal of danger; we are bail for 800*l.*; if he had been taken away, we are all undone: he only propounded of having the jewels, and nothing of the man.

Mr. Gurney. I understood you, col. Turner, only for the jewels, and not for the man.

Mr. John Marshall. My lord, he did move sir T. Aleyn that I might go with him to White-Chapel and about Tower-Hill. I told sir Thomas, it was very unsafe for me to go, being late, and out of the liberties; though I was a constable. I could not command assistance there; and intreated sir Thomas to excuse me: I thought it not safe for him. He did then repeat the engagement of his soul to the thief, and of Tryon's to him.

Ld. Bridgman. Did you ever hear him say, desire or propose, that you should go and take the thief?

Marshal. No, my lord, it was to get the rest of the jewels.

Alderman Smith. Do not you know that I spake to you again and again, and advised you by all means to let us know where this man is; that I would go myself, or any of these persons present? You utterly refused it, and said there was two souls pawned, and you would not discover it.

Turner. That was at first, afterwards I mentioned them all.

Ld. Bridgman. For what?

Turner. To take the thief.

Ld. Bridgman. You see not any man testify any such thing.

Yeoman Cole. Sir T. Aleyn called my brother and I both into the room to him, and the Marshal and his man; and said, col. Turner would have us go without the liberties for these jewels: I think, saith sir T. Aleyn, it is not safe to go out of the liberties. Mr. Marshal said the same. He desired us to go with him, but sir Thomas refused it.

Ld. Bridgman. This is a notable piece of cunning; when he was moved by Alderman Smith and others, all this while he names no man; but now he was under an action, he would have them go with himself out of the liberties, and yet never saith a word to take the man: He knew very well it was out of the liberties. Truly I think, if sir T. Aleyn had done it, I should not have taken him to be sir T. Aleyn. Did you desire any of them to go with your wife?

Marshal. He denied us to go with his wife; his token was this, the thief would meet no man.

Turner. My lord, to the business now. I am here indicted for burglary: It appears to your honours and the bench, that it was 10 of the clock when my sons came from my lord the marquis of Dorchester's house; said I, You knaves you, what do you out so late? Said they, It was past 9 before we had done, and my lord's gentlemen made us stay supper. They were all in their beds at a little past 10 of the clock. You hear what Mosely the constable saith, he finds us sleeping in the house; how should this burglary be laid on me? I am indicted here for burglary, and that I cannot be, for that I was at home.

L. C. J. Hyde. Have you done?

Turner. Ay, my lord.

L. C. J. Hyde. William Turner, what say you? You see what is laid to your charge; first, you are a person of loose life: there were two at his bed-side, he believes you to be the person that gagged him, and helped to bind him.

W. Turner. I was never in his house in my life, till with sir T. Aleyn.

L. C. J. Hyde. Where were you?

W. Turner. At home.

L. C. J. Hyde. Make that appear.

W. Turner. I have none here.

L. C. J. Hyde. He saith it was a man as like you as can be.

W. Turner. And I am as innocent as may be.

L. C. J. Hyde. John Turner, that which is against you is this: You on Saturday morning very early was busy with your father and mother in removing the money; and then when you had notice that you would be apprehended, you got away.

John Turner. Sir, I did not know who it was that was come, whether to apprehend, or upon any other score; but the woman speaking to me, 'Flee for your life,' or such expressions, made me go away I know not how.

L. C. J. Hyde. Did not you bring some money?—J. Turner. I did, my lord.

L. C. J. Hyde. How much was brought at that time?

J. Turner. I carried away two bags to Wild.

L. C. J. Hyde. Did you know him?

J. Turner. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. Hyde. Did you carry these to Wild on Saturday-morning? Did not you carry them to Fry's house?

J. Turner. We took them afterwards from the house where Wild appointed us to meet.

Lord Bridgman. At what time of the day did you carry them back to Wild?

J. Turner. Before sir Thomas Aleyn came that day, I was coming for more.

Lord Bridgman. To what place?

J. Turner. At Tower-Ditch.

Lord Bridgman. At what house?

J. Turner. No house, but I delivered them at Tower-Ditch.

Lord Bridgman. At what time of the day?

J. Turner. It was before sir Thomas Aleyn came, about 8 or 9 in the forenoon.

Lord Bridgman. Was there no people there? Who was there?

J. Turner. I cannot tell; I saw several other persons.

Lord Bridgman. Did Wild stand in the street?

J. Turner. Yes.

Lord Bridgman. How came you to know him?

J. Turner. By my father's direction; and I had seen the man at our house that morning when he brought in the money.

Lord Bridgman. Whereabouts? Was it near the quest-house? that is, the great house that stands in the middle of the way?

J. Turner. It was hard by the sign of Noah's-Ark.

Lord Bridgman. This is a likely story to be believed, that you should in the day-time, between 8 and 9 in the morning, meet in the Tower-Ditch that man that was a noted thief, that had been in Newgate; that you should carry for this man to receive two bags of money, see how it hangs together!

L. C. J. Hyde. How often did you go?

J. Turner. Twice.

L. C. J. Hyde. How much at a time?

J. Turner. A single bag.

L. C. J. Hyde. Had you a coat or cloke?

J. Turner. Just as I am now.

L. C. J. Hyde. Had Wild a great black coat? And what did he do with the money?

J. Turner. I know not: but I delivered one in the street, and then went and fetched another, and he staid ready for it.

L. C. J. Bridgman. Was this all the money that was brought in the morning, save that that Sir T. Aleyn brought away?

J. Turner. It was all, to my knowledge.

Sir T. Aleyn. Col. Turner confessed to me on Thursday morning that more came unto his house, but that rogue Wild took it away.

L. C. J. Bridgman. How much?

Sir T. Aleyn. About 200*l.*

Lord Mayor. How many turns did you make when the money was carried from your father's house to the Minories?

J. Turner. Twice.

Lord Mayor. Who went first?

J. Turner. We went both together.

Lord Mayor. How much was carried between you both?

J. Turner. The first time I carried 200*l.* as I can judge.

Lord Mayor. Who carried any more?

J. Turner. My father.

L. C. J. Bridgman. What did you bring the second time?

J. Turner. 300*l.*

L. C. J. Bridgman. William, one thing more: what was the occasion of meeting you and James Turner at the alehouse?

W. Turner. I did not meet him, my lord.

L. C. J. Bridgman. You came thither, and called for a pot of ale, and said you staid for col. Turner.

W. Turner. It is not right: I only asked if col. Turner used the house. By and by he came and paid for the pot.

L. C. J. Bridgman. You two went together: what was the occasion of your meeting together?

Col. Turner. Finding him there, I said I could not drink with him; and so we parted.

W. Turner. I called for a pot of drink: and having no money to pay for it, col. Turner coming by, I called him in, and desired him to pay for it, which he did.

L. C. J. Bridgman. The boy swore you said you staid for col. Turner; can you justify you were at home, or in any other place? It is a great suspicion. The old gentleman charged you to be very like the man; and you can give no account were you were; and Turner and you met together the day before.

W. Turner. I was at home.

Lord Mayor. William Turner, when did you shave your beard last?

W. Turner. Before Christmas.

Lord Mayor. Who shaved it for you?

W. Turner. A barber in Golden-Lane.

Lord Mayor. When his hair is shaved off his chin, the other man, whose name is Christ-mas, being a smooth chinned man, it is very possible that might beget the mistake in Mr. Tryon.

L. C. J. Hyde. You of the jury, it is high time to let you go together to consider your verdict: We will trouble you no more in this business to day. Here is an Indictment against James Turner, John Turner, and William Turner, for a burglary in breaking the house of Mr. Francis Tryon, in the night-time, and taking away a great deal of money and jewels; you have heard it particularly named. It is likewise charged, that Mary and Ely knowing of John to have committed this felony and burglary, did comfort and abet him afterwards. I shall speak to them two first: Mary the wife of James Turner, though it appears all along that she had a hand in this business, yet nothing appears at all but doing only that which her husband had directed; then by law she cannot be accessory for committing of felony. For Ely, the other accessory, I did not observe in the whole course of the evidence, any thing at all against him, that he was privy to any thing at all; for that of the carrying of the money, it appears to be John: For them two, Mary and Ely, nothing is fasten'd upon them. Then the matter is to James, John, and William Turner: I hope, and I am sure you are nearer, and you take notes of what hath been delivered: I have not your memories; you are young, and no persons better; you are men of understanding, I need not repeat particulars to you. Thus much I must say in general, that it is not always necessary: But for that I shall desire my lord Bridgman to declare it to you. A man may be guilty of a burglary, though he be not in the place, in the room where it was committed: Or thus if three or four men come together with purpose to rob a house; two go in and do the feat, and the rest stay without, to see nobody comes to prevent, or to receive, one or other coming to that purpose; those that are without the house are as guilty of the burglary, as the other that went in. No man will deny the law to be so. —Then weigh your evidence: It appears by the coachman that he saw four men, that had handkerchiefs about their necks; two upon one side, the other two upon the other side of the door. Though there were but two appeared to Mr. Tryon, yet there being four in company, and Mr. Turner himself tells ye, that by the story from his intelligence there were three or four. Whom they were, or whether there was any or no, God knows; but rather suppose it to be a story of his own framing: He walked up and down on Tower-hill, took the thief by the throat, and there kept him about two hours, and past four o'clock before they brought the second bag. Then weigh that particular knowledge that Mr. Turner had of all these things: That upon Wednesday before he met with this William Turner, a person you see, of what quality I shall not repeat, he cannot give account of himself what he is; and that night, when this robbery was committed, he says he was at home; they are his own words: He might have had witness to have proved this as well as Mr. Turner. But for James Turner, it is true it appears, and no doubt he was that night, at home: The constable went to his house upon the occasion of Tryon's man's saying he supped there, went to find whether he supped there; that was indeed false; But the constable and those that went there, found them a-bed. But then take the time when this robbery was done: It was between eight and nine, and he was found in bed at past ten, though indeed the thieves said it was eleven, as you might understand by Mr. Tryon: It must be left to you upon the proof. You see when he comes the next day, he undertakes to find out the thieves, and that only upon a suspicion; that there being a purpose to rob Mr. Tryon a year before, he goes to the same place now, he found Wild out then. He had very good luck; that because he lodged there a year before, he must have the same lodging now: It is a likely matter that thieves, as Wild is, should keep their lodgings thus constantly. There he finds him, takes him by the throat, and there they were while: There one comes, goes, and brings some part of the money. After all this, the next day, he must take his word to come again, and to bring the jewels. Observe but this: after which time as the money was received yet by a token, though he never saw the woman before, describing her a short fat woman, with a long black scarf, he must meet her, asked her what she wanted, and must give her jewels of that value: 'Tis one of the finest framed stories that I have heard, that this man should come to be thus privy after himself stood charged, and the jewels brought for all this; and yet he must know nothing of it. You observe the evidences, and their circumstances themselves: The witnesses he called in point of reputation, that I must leave to you. I have been here many a fair time: Few men that come to be questioned, but shall have some come and say, he is a very honest man; I never knew any hurt by him: But is this any thing against the evidence of the fact? But you have here the whole; I shall leave it to you.

L. C. J. Bridgman. Gentlemen of the Jury, my lord hath repeated to you the evidence: I shall repeat nothing of that; only one or two things I shall observe to you. First, In point of law: And I must agree in opinion with what my lord says. But in this case there will be something more considered; that is, Whether or no (for this is the law) if a man have a false key, (we are now upon the point of law) and we ought to be of counsel with him and you, to direct that which is right, if he appear plainly to be an accessory, you must find him guilty of this Indictment: For that you must consider circumstances, whether he broke open the house or no. Then you must observe Mr. Tryon's door was shut; it was not broke open by a crew: Therefore you may conclude that it is very probable they had a picklock: But that I must leave to you. Either they must come in by one being in the house, or by a picklock. But to say by one in that house, you have no reason to presume on that: If by a picklock, whosoever they were, they must be known, not strangers to the house: Not William Turner alone, but he that knew the house, and all the passages and doors; knew where the keys and jewels were. Then who probably should be in the house? It was not for a stranger to be in the house, only one that must know all. If that James Turner shall appear to you to have a hand in it, if you think he was accessory, you must find him guilty as principal.

Col. Turner. God forbid!

L. C. J. Bridgman. If he were amongst them, if the door be opened by a picklock, it is a direct burglary, as if broke open by an iron bar: But that must be left to you. In the next place, to prove the burglary, you see what a story he tells you, with all the circumstances, as if he had been there: He tells you from this Wild (if there be any such, you must take it upon his word) how the man's tooth came out, what he meant to do with the other persons, and all other things about that affair. Observe another thing of sir Thomas Chamberlain: Says he, We suspected him from the first: We could not examine any, but he would be thrusting in, and listening. I say, admit that you should be by the evidence persuaded he had a hand in the business, you must find him a principal: For nothing in the world more ordinary, if a man intend to commit such a felony or burglary, he will be sure to have witness to prove he was here, or in such a place, at the time when this robbery was committed. By all that I can guess, and I believe that I guess right, this robbery was between eight and nine o'clock at night. When the constable came to Mr. Turner, no doubt, as it was his wisest way, he was then in bed; but can prove nothing at all else. The truth is, upon all that he hath said himself, if it be true as he hath said, he hath made himself a direct accessory to a felony: For first of all, being examined before a justice of peace, sir Thomas Aleyn, he said himself that the money he carried, was the money he had of a goldsmith: Truly his whole story is a direct romance. This man must go upon the Friday night, about 11 or 12 o'clock: And there is a proverb of 'a blind man's catching a hare;' if it can be applicable to any thing, it must be to this: He must go between 11 and 12 o'clock at night without a lanthorn, a good way above his own house, and there he must walk and think some Mephistophilus should come and tell him who is the man: That he should take him by the throat, though he could call two more with one whistle, and there get him to deliver the money: Truly he was a very noble and ingenious thief. But all this you must take upon his own word. Now he knows the money was discovered, then it was a merchant's that had failed, and must be secured for the use of his wife and children. If you do believe all this that he hath said, he was neither principal nor accessory to this felony, but ac-cessary enough to Wild; but that is not the present business. It is whether upon all these circumstances, the money having been found with them, he being the man that brought the money, and his wife the jewels, whether you do believe the rest of the story he hath made for himself? If you believe he had a hand in the business, you must find him as principal. I shall desire a little further direction: Suppose it were as he says, That one was within, and he opens the door, and lets in others; if himself was one that did come in, I take it to be burglary in them all; it was an unlawful coming in. So that upon all these circumstances, first, whether you do believe that he had a hand in it, or no, or this fine story that is made; next, whether you do believe this was one that was there; you must believe him guilty as principal. But I leave it to you.

L. C. J. Hyde. To the last I say, if one comes in by day, with a purpose before-hand to rob the house by night, if he opens the door, which is almost impossible here, because the man swears it was double-locked, it must be opened with a key; if he opened the door, and the rest come in and rob him, that is burglary in them all.

Thereupon the Jury withdrew; and after near an hour's consultation, they returned to the Court, and took their places: Their names being called, they severally answered.

Cl. of the Peace. Are ye all agreed of your verdict?—Jury. Ycs.

Clerk. Who shall speak for you?

Jury. Foreman.

Clerk. Set James Turner to the bar. Look upon him: How say you? Is he guilty of the felony and burglary whereof he stands indicted, or Not Guilty?—Foreman. Guilty.

John Turner, William Turner, Mary Turner, and Ely Turner, were by the said Jury severally acquitted*.

* "Turner et les autres fueront indict, quia ils felonice et burglarit' infringe le meason de Francis Tryan in tiel Ward in Lond', et la depris argent et jewells, al value de 5,000*l*. et sur rien culp plead, et long evidence le jury trove Turner culp de burglary (pur que fuit apres pend in Cheapside) et lun de ses fils culp de felony (et les autres ils acquite) et le question fuit si ceo fuit bone verdict quant al felony vers sirs sur que serra demand, et semble per les deux chiefe justices et auters que neiny, car eoment jury puissoit aver trove tous culp de felony uncore ne poent treve lun culp de burglary et l'auter de felony sur mesme indictment et mesme evidence." Siderfin, 171.

Upon this Mr. East (Pleas of the Crown, chap. xv. sect. 28) observes: "In truth, such a finding shewed that the several prisoners were of a distinct nature, and therefore ought not to have been included in the same indictment."

Now true it is, larceny and burglary are offences of different kinds, nevertheless where an January the 19th.

In the morning the said William Turner was again arraigned and indicted for the felonious stealing of 4*l*. of the moneys of William Hill, servant to the said Mr. Tryon, and stolen in the said robbery of Mr. Tryon; but the trial thereof was deferred till the next sessions.

Afterwards, some of the Justices of the Bench having received intimation that lodgings were lately taken in Duke's-place by the said Col. Turner, William Turner, and others, for the carrying on of the aforesaid robbery; the said col. Turner and William Turner were severally examined by that worthy gentleman sir Thomas indictment is for in the night time feloniously, &c. burglariously, &c. with intent to steal, &c. breaking and entering the dwelling house, &c. and there stealing, &c., any number of persons may be tried and convicted under such one indictment, of these two offences of different kinds; or some of the persons may be convicted of both or either of the offences, and the rest acquitted of both; It may therefore perhaps not be found easy to give a perfectly satisfactory and consistent reason, why some of the persons may not be found guilty of one of the offences, and others of the other.

"At the same sessions [for Newgate, April, 1664] there was this question, one James Turner and William Turner, at Christmas sessions last, were indicted of Burglary for breaking the house of Mr. Tryon in the night, and taking away great sums of money; and thereupon James Turner was found guilty and executed; but William Turner was then acquitted. And now there being great evidence that William Turner was in the same burglary with James Turner, and there being 4*l*. of the money of one Hill, a servant to Mr. Tryon, stolen at the same time, which 4*l*. was not in the former Indictment, they would have indicted William Turner again now for Burglary, for breaking the house of Mr. Tryon, and take thence 4*l*. of the money of Hill's; but we all agreed that William Turner being formerly indicted for Burglary in breaking the house of Mr. Tryon, and stealing his goods and acquitted, he cannot now be indicted again for the same burglary for breaking the house; but we all agreed, he might be indicted for felony, for stealing the money of Hill. For they are several felonies, and he was not indicted of this felony before, and so he was indicted. And afterwards I told my lord chief justice Bridgeman what we had done and he agreed the law to be so as we had directed." Kelyng, 30.

But it now seems that William Turner might have been again indicted for burglary, viz. breaking, &c. and taking the goods of Hill. See Mr. Justice Buller's very able judgment in the Cases of Vanderroom and Abbot, East's Pl. Cr. c. xv, s. 29. Mr. J. Buller's division of burglary seems to be sound notwithstanding the Quare;

Aleyn, who with great prudence had managed this affair, who pressed several questions to the said prisoners; who finding their said design fully discovered, declared as followeth:

The Examination and Confession of Col. James Turner and William Turner, two of the persons in the robbery of Mr. Tryon, taken by sir Thomas Aleyn, knt. and bart. in the presence of the right hon. sir Anthony Bateman, knt., Lord Mayor of the city of London, sir Richard Brown knt. and bart. sir John Robinson knt. and bart. sir Rich. Ford, and sir Rich. Rives, knights, sheriffs of the city of London; the 19th of Jan. 1664.

That the contriving and setting of this robbery was wholly acted by col. James Turner; and that it was in agitation about Christmas last, and should have been put in execution a week sooner, but that the other friend, whom col. Turner brought, was drunk, and one White, who was one of the actors, would not venture his life with him: That there were four persons that robbed him: Col. James Turner, William Turner, White a Solicitor, and White's friend, whose name they knew not; That upon Thursday the 7th day of January instant, Col. James Turner, William Turner, White, and the other person, whose name they knew not, met at the Red-Lion in Bishopsgate-street, near to St. Helen's, about three of the clock in the afternoon, where they dined: Col. Turner fetched a neck of veal from the cook's for their dinner; and then they agreed to rob Mr. Francis Tryon (who lives in Lime-street) that night, and went to meet again at the same house by six of the clock that evening: But the room where they were to meet being taken up, they went over to the Four Swans, or the Green Dragon, and there they all staid till eight of the clock. Col. Turner did then assure them that the doors should be opened; for that by his own confession he had got the impression of the key of the door in wax, and had another key made by it; but knew not the smith that made the key. From that place col. Turner carried them to the new market in Leadenhall, where they sat upon the stalls for the space of half an hour; and then he came unto them, and told them the man and maid were now gone out, and that now was their time. Thereupon col. Turner opened the door with his key, and let them in. Then they went up the stairs, col. Turner leading the way. He lit a candle in the kitchen, and went up into Mr. Tryon's chamber all four of them. Col. Turner went near the bed's-foot, the curtains being drawn close. White and the other persons put a cloth into Mr. Tryon's mouth, stopped it, and bound his feet and his hands. Col. Turner brought down the key of the warehouse and the counting-house out of his pocket, opened the warehouse door and the counting-house, and took the keys of the iron chest, and took out the money and the jewels. William Turner carried two wallets with four bags of money, as he conceives: And col.

Turner said that the said Wm. Turner carried 100l. and White carried two wallets more, supposed to be four bags of some hundred pounds. Col. Turner and the other person carried the rest of the money, only col. Turner carried away the jewels in his two bags. That Wm. Turner did not see any money, but as they said it was money. They did not stay in Mr. Tryon's house above an hour. That they carried all the aforesaid money and jewels into a lodging in one Nicholas Hickenson's house in Lousy-lane in Duke's-place, which they hired some days before, pretending it for the use of a master of a ship, his mate, purser, and boat-swain. They carried the money in about ten o'clock at night: When the maid let them in, they blew out the candle, carried up the money and jewels, Wm. Turner going under the name of purser. Col. Turner and Wm. Turner came away that night and left the money and the jewels there. The next morning col. Turner fetched away the money and jewels at five turns to his own house. And saith, That Wm. Turner was to have 100l. of the money for his pains, White and his friend 20l. a piece for their pains, and Col. Turner was to have the rest. That William Turner knew not of any of the jewels nor White, none but Col. Turner. That after that night William Turner never saw Col. Turner, nor the other persons in the robbery, till himself with Col. Turner and others were arraigned for the fact at Newgate. Neither did the said William Turner see any money or jewels opened; neither did he receive one penny of the money: neither was he in the counting-house of Mr. Tryon. That neither Col. Turner's wife nor sons knew of this robbery; only that they helped him to remove the money away on Saturday morning. That the money was in the house on Friday at night, when the constable and marshal searched his house; but they had hid them. That Col. Turner being asked where the jewels were on Saturday morning, said, he did deliver them at six of the clock to White in both the bags. That the carcanet of rubies were not in those bags. That Col. Turner, in the conclusion, confessed, that he had not done not that he did, but that he did lately understand that another person was made executor, and that he was resolved to have somewhat.

After Col. Turner's examination, Sir Thomas Aleyn told Col. Turner, that the first part of repentance was confession, the second restitution; and he being a convict person, and in all probability not likely to continue long in this world, it were much better for him to restore what was another's man's, than to think to enrich his wife and children, by leaving them that which he knew was none of his; and that one penny of his own estate he would continue longer with them than a pound of another body's: and thereupon he was pressed to restore Mr. Tryon the rest of his money, and the carcanet of rubies and diamonds yet in his custody. This had such a present influence upon Mr.

Turner, that he said he would immediately go and fetch the carcanet; which he accordingly did, and delivered the same into the hands of Sir Richard Rives, one of the sheriffs.

January 19, in the Evening.

Clerk. Set James Turner to the bar, James Turner, hold up thy hand: thou standest here convicted of Felony and Burglary, for the felonious stealing of the goods and money of Francis Tryon; what canst thou say, why the court should not give thee judgment to die according to law?

Col. Turner. My Lord, I humbly desire your honour, and the honourable bench, you would be pleased to grant me a reprieve.

J. Howel. That we cannot do; the court must give judgment upon you: If you can by any means prevail with his majesty to do it, you may use your interest; but the court cannot do it.

Col. Turner. I desire your honours I may be transported.

J. Howel. That likewise is in the power of his majesty: that he may do, if he please. It is not in the power of the court: we have nothing to do, but to give judgment.

Col. Turner. You do it with others.

J. Howel. No, not in this case of burglary; but leave that to his majesty's mere mercy and grace.

Col. Turner. My Lord, I shall humbly desire that my wife and the two youths may be discharged.

J. Howel. She is found Not Guilty; and therefore she shall have her acquittal upon the discharge of the gaol. Those that are acquitted, they must be discharged, if the court do not see cause for their further detention.

Col. Turner. I pray the young man and my wife may be discharged.

J. Howel. Whosoever are found not guilty must have their discharge according to law.

Col. Turner. My Lord, I hope the bench is satisfied about the young man.

J. Howel. Say no more.

Col. Turner. Your honour's humble servant.

Clerk. Set James Turner to the bar.

J. Howel. I must pronounce the Judgment of the court, which is, 'That you go to the place from whence you came, and so to that place of execution which shall be appointed to you by authority, there to be hanged by the neck till you be dead; and the Lord have mercy on your soul.'

Accordingly the said Col. James Turner was drawn in a cart from Newgate to Lime-street-End in Leadenhall-Street, the 21st of January, and was there executed on a gibbet erected for that purpose.

The Speech and Deportment of Col. JAMES TURNER, at his Execution in Leadenhall-street, January 21, 1664.

About eleven o'clock, col. Turner (attended with Mr. Ordinary of Newgate, and another minister,) was drawn in a cart to a gibbet erected in Leadenhall-street at Lime-street end; where coming, col. Turner called the executioner to him, told him, that his friends were desirous of all his cloaths, and that in consideration thereof he gave him 50s. and 2s. 6d. to drink, and about 15s. to the Serjeants and Yeoman, attending to see his body and clothes delivered to one Mrs. Smith there: And standing in the cart said as followeth:

Sir Richard Ford, and you, the other Mr. Sheriff, and all you gentlemen: I am come hither to pay that debt I owe, and that every man owes to nature; it is the just hand of God upon me for my sins, and there is no man hath done me wrong in it, and truly, it is my sins, and the greatness of my sins (and that I am very sensible of) hath brought me hither; and the greatest sin that troubles me, and lies upon me, (which I hope the blood of Jesus Christ, nay, I am confident, the blood of Jesus Christ, hath washed all my sins away,) is that sin which I was much addicted to, and that was the sin of prophaneess; of blaspheming God, of taking his name in vain. It is truth, I must not only accuse myself, but, in some sense, give you the truth of my conscience. I never heard any man or woman, or whatever they were, swear in my life, but I did tremble to hear them: For keeping of company with gentlemen of honour (they were men of quality, though that were an ill quality in them) was the occasion of it. I never kept company with any poor, base, inferior people, with any thief, or any such like base person, in all my life, but fled from them, and avoided them, till this accident. Truly, those poor men engaged in it, I must free them, I brought them into this business clearly and freely; and I beseech you, Mr. Sheriffs, as I am a dying man, that you will help those people in this business; poor silly men! As I was telling you, for that great sin of swearing: keeping company with persons that did swear, I did get a habit of swearing, though I hated it and loathed it, when I observed it in myself, and yet may be, did it again, forgetting presently and not observing, being of a hasty nature. It was my rashness, and my inconsiderateness, that hath brought me hither. Gentlemen, it is expected by all the city, and by all the world, that knows me, that I should make some great and notorious confession; it is truth, I must, and freely do here confess, as I said before, that it is my sins in general, and that sin of blaspheming God's name; I do charge myself particularly with that, as the occasion of bringing me hither; as for the fact itself; I do tell ye, it was my own act, my own contrivance, and the poor souls that are yonder, knew nothing of it.

Gentlemen, you will live when I am gone; there is my two sons; I here declare, as I expect mercy by-and-bye, at the hands of my Saviour and my God, they are as innocent as any person that looks upon me. For the youngest, my son Ely, he never knew or heard of one penny of the money, or business at all; therefore he is clear: he was in his bed that night it was done, and in the morning it was removed from my house: For the elder, he never knew of any monies, or any thing of it; only I did tell him, that it was a merchant's money that was broke, and that I would secure it for his wife and children; so that he was clearly innocent of any thing of the fact of the robbery of the house; he knew not that it was Mr. Tryon's money, but did carry that money with me to Tower-hill, as I bid him; so that he is as innocent as the younger. You understand me, Mr. Sheriffs; if you bid your servant take so much money, carry it, and dispose of it as you direct him, what is it to him how you came by that money? So that I say, this elder son, he is (I speak in the presence of God) as free as the other.

I do beg and beseech you, Mr. Sheriffs, in the bowels of tender mercy and compassion, that you would go to the lord-mayor, to the court of aldermen, that these two poor young men may be discharged; let them not lie there until the next sessions, among thieves and murderers, for they will be utterly undone. They are come from the loins of good parents; my father was an ancient, reverend divine, a parson within eleven miles of this town, a godly minister, forty odd years minister of one parish; no man more beloved than he, a man of charity, and for peace, never suffered them to go to law; he was justice of peace amongst them, mediator for them; if any poor wanted any thing, they came to him, he relieved them: he did all the poor's business, and composed the differences of the rich likewise: I am the son of that father, though an unfortunate son. My wife was a gentlewoman's daughter in Dorsetshire, her mother had a great portion, and is yet living; they are of the family of the Foyles, 8,000*l.* the old king had of her uncle, which was lent; they were persons of quality. I say, these children, they came from the loins of good persons. This I speak in reference that you will take that fatherly care, that these two poor boys may be turned out of prison. Their mother hath nothing to support them: Suppose it your own wife's case; add not affliction to affliction; restore her children to her this night, let me beg it, that God may be praised and glorified in the truth of all things. Will you promise it, Mr. Sheriffs, that you will endeavour it?

Sir Rd. Ford. I do; I have been ready at all times to promise you any thing which was in my power to perform; but ask not that which is not in my power to grant: You desire they may be discharged to-night.

Turner. That is but comparatively; as soon as possible.

Sir Rd. Ford. I do promise you, that this that you have declared concerning your sons, shall be communicated to the proper judges, and I will endeavour that they may be put out of our goal.

Sir Rd. Rives. And I will use my endeavours in the thing.

Turner. Pray do, they know nothing of it; pray put them out, my wife will want them; she hath no comfort left, and this will ruin her.

Sir Rd. Rives. We will do our endeavour; proceed on.

Turner. I have done, that is for the children; then for William Turner, what he did, he did at my instigation; he acted this at my entreaty, it was wholly by my direction, therefore let the poor man be likewise discharged, if there be no other thing against him but this fault.

Sir Rd. Ford. We will promise that we will take all occasions to give an intimation to the lord chief justice what you have declared, in extenuating of his crime, as he was a hireling of yours.

Turner. I have told you that it was my sins that hath brought me hither; and truly I must deal really with you, this nation is very full of sin, of crying sins, of sins, that (without God's wonderful mercies) the land will suddenly mourn by his hand: I have every year expected the sweeping plague to come and take away two-thirds of the nation for the sins that lie upon us; and truly, notwithstanding the ministers of God do preach, and call, and cry aloud, yet nobody regards them. Truly, from the magistrate to the very peasant, there is abundance of neglect to the true service and fear of God, that my soul has bled and groaned within me, as I have gone up and down the streets, and as I have lain in my bed. And I must ingenuously confess to you, that I have not once or twice, nor a hundred times, but a thousand times, wished myself dissolved, and in another world. I have been sick of it, not for any want, but with the mere trouble, the dislike that did so displease me, to see all manner of business in tumults and disorders, and sin, and all manner of wickedness; that truly I have had no pleasure (these latter years) in the world; indeed I have not. I have (to my poor wife) said many a hundred times, Lord God, that thou wert in thy grave, and I too, were it not for these poor children; truly, I could beg it of God, seeing all people are in combustion, none tied in love and amity. When I was a boy, there was no such doings; my father, I told you, was a minister, there was eight or ten gentlemen, adjoining families, who kept a house of hospitality, loving friendship, peace and quietness; but now there is no such thing in the world: It is a new world, a world of malice and difference; and it is to blame, that brethren do not hang together in unity.

It is expected, that I should declare here, as a dying man, somewhat to free myself from those aspersions, accusations, and calumnies, that have been laid upon me; those marks with black coals that people have laid upon me; I do declare to you, there are a great many scandals that lie upon me. I shall not justify myself at all, but rather accuse myself, that I am, as St. Paul saith, 'The greatest of sinners.' But for those things that are laid upon me, I must clear my family and my reputation, as I can before God, and in Jesus Christ. It is laid upon me, that I should take 200*l.* of Dr. Hewyt's lady, for to assist her in the helping her husband that was, in the getting him a pardon or reprieve. To that I answer, (I know not wheither I shewed you, Mr. Sheriffs, my lady's certificate or no; I heard not of this business till within these two nights) I never heard of her, nor her husband, in such a manner; no, I would not have had that sin mixed with my blood, not for ten thousand worlds; I should have thought, whenever it had entered into my cogitations, I should have thought myself eternally lost: But about that, I sent Mr. Gray, of Black Friars, who rode 32 miles the other night, and he hath brought a certificate under her ladyship's hand to the king; which certificate, if they will go to my wife, they may have it, and print it. She writes, shewing it to the king's most excellent majesty, that she was informed, that James Turner, gentleman, a prisoner in Newgate, is accused for taking 200*l.* of her towards the reprieving of her husband; she doth declare she never knew him, nor heard of him, therefore she is bound in conscience to free him; and so she humbly takes her leave. This is attested by that gentleman, with an affidavit under the hand of sir John Brampton, knight. She got a letter from secretary Thurlow, wherein he writes, and sets forth all the business, That one col. Whetton had 235*l.* of my lady Hewyt, to procure this business; and that Whetton did pretend, that he had given Thurlow 100*l.* of it to that purpose, which he there, under his hand, denied that he ever received one penny, directly or indirectly; so that Whetton was the person clearly accused, and she sent me word, she is suing him for the money; so for that I hope I have vindicated myself before God and the world.

In the second place, there is another calumny thrown upon me, and that is, That I should cozen or deceive the king that now is of some money, when I was beyond sea with him; truly, it is well known to thousands of the world, I was never out of England, never beyond sea with the king, never cozened him of a penny; that I have served him and his father with all the substance that I had, with my blood, and with all my fortune and goods, as a hearty subject should, and I pray God receive my soul but with a drop of his mercy, so sure as I served the old king, and prayed for him, and loved him.

The first commission that ever I had, was eldest captain of horse to William marquis of Newcastle, in his own regiment; I gave him the troop, fourscore and seventeen men, well armed; I never received one penny advance for the said troop, and but one week's pay for myself and officers, and three weeks pay for my troopers, in all my life not a penny more: I served him faithfully four years, or thereabouts. I was a prisoner at London house, at York, in the Tower, at the council of state, the court-martial, and the council of war of Oliver's: I was a prisoner at Luton in Bedfordshire; bringing the king up from Newark to Oxford, I was wounded, shot in the neck, and taken prisoner: And 'tis very well known by Mr. William Cotton, who is one of the gentlemen harbingers of the king's, he is the ancientest to this king, and hath served his father in that office; It was his fortune to be hard by when I was shot, who was then a stranger to me, but he being one of the king's servants, and hearing a lieutenant colonel of the king's was slain, he came in; after I was shot, I was crept into an hedge among briars and thorns, so deep, that he was forced to cut a way to come at me, and so drew me out, or I had died there. I was prisoner at Luton, so to St. Alban's where I lay in cure in the compter, 'till it cost me my first penny reckoning, sixty odd pounds in gold; they trusted me, and took my word 'till I could send to York, where my wife lived, nineteen miles beyond York; When I was able to ride, I was brought to town, put into London-house, where I abided, and paid my ransom, no exchange would be allowed. The king that is dead, (of blessed memory) sent three exchanges for me, his own trumpet, Sir Marmaduke Langdale's trumpet, and my own trumpet. The committee at St. Alban's returned the trumpeters word that I was dead, for my wounds were mortal, and so I believe they did think I was dead. Afterwards I had command of more than one troop, and I was lieutenant-colonel to sir John Preston, and was eldest captain to the marquis of Newcastle.

Sir Rd. Ford. I have no pleasure to interrupt you; if you have any thing to say, that may fit you for your change, as marks (for avoiding these inconveniences,) to the people—

Turner. I have done, Sir Richard.

Sir Rd. Ford. I do not apprehend this a proper work for a dying man; in good earnest methinks, it is not a proper work, for you to give this narrative now of affairs in the army.

Turner. I have but a few words more; I have wholly told you, that it was my own contrivance, and nobody's else, that I come hither, and therefore I do justly suffer here by the hand of God and justice; and I do desire all Christian people, that either hear me, or see me, or shall hear of me, that they will take warning by me; it is the first offence of this nature that ever I had to do withal in my life. God is my witness, as I said before, I never knew a thief or dishonest man, but I avoided them: But I say, and I could wish with all my soul, and I desire it earnestly, that all people would take warning by me this day, and to avoid, as much as may be, all sins in general: And I must declare to you likewise, that if it had pleased God that two of the officers had not met me, and arrested me in St. Mary-Axe, between two and three of the clock, and carried me here to the Hoop tavern, where they staid me, Mr. Tryon had had every pennyworth of his goods and money, and not lost a farthing, nor a hair of his head; but God forgive them. A great deal of blame hath lain upon me about those villains, who were half drunk, and beat Mr. Tryon. I say, he had had all his goods again. God above that hears me, knows my soul, it was not intended to rob him, or to hurt him, it was to ingratiate myself: the reasons I told him yesterday. He is the worse man, the best part of 10,000*l.* since his wife died; and I had lately discovered which way and how: I have told him of the person, but this is not a place to name him, or speak of these things; I hope God will give him wisdom to avoid dangers, and to make good of what I told him yesterday; a worse thing will come: for he will be robbed indeed, if he have not a care: He should have been robbed about a year since, and he did employ me to enquire after it, and discover it: I have given him warning several times: He is an honest brave gentleman, a good christian, and an honest, charitable man. But, Mr. Sheriffs, assure yourselves, so sure as I am going to heaven, I shall be there in glory, so sure had Mr. Tryon (if I had not met with those two foolish, timorous officers) have had his goods and money again, there never had one word of this business been known. It was a sad fate, that these two fellows out of a little fear should be the occasion of my coming hither; but God forgive them; Stubs and Lyon, I mean, these two villains, I have nobody to thank for my blood, but them; and yet do I free them, and freely forgive them: And I forgive the whole world, as freely as I desire God and Christ Jesus should forgive me. Mr. Sheriffs, are you satisfied in this? Would you have me say any more touching the fact?

Mr. Sheriff. It is satisfaction to us, if you are satisfied yourself.

Turner. This morning as I was coming out of the prison, to add scandal to scandal, one came and charged me I should clear myself about a fire in Lothbury, in the new buildings, whether I had any hand in that; the Lord Jesus Christ knows my soul, 'till even now they asked me the question, I never thought of it, but was then heartily sorry, and in my bed when I heard of it. Another sent me a letter, but I tore it, one John Marshall, touching some money that was lost in Coleman-Street; he might as well have asked the person to be born, as have asked me, for I knew not of it. And one brought a deed of one Katharine, I forgot her other name, alack, I know nothing of it. There was another large paper put into my hands, touching a man that died in my house, one Turner, a tall, proper gentleman, a clothier of Kept; he came to my house, and desired me to furnish one Daintry with 500*l.* which he had a place at the Custom-House for: This Turner was a stranger to me, only a namesake: It is thought, as by the paper was hinted, that he should have something put in his drink, which should occasion his death; he drank nothing at my house, more than what my wife and self, and two or three honest gentlemen, that were there. He told my wife once, Cousin, saith he, 'I am very ill, pray give me a cup of your water;' he had drank a glass or two of wine; there was but one bottle among five of them; and soon after, this gentleman fell asleep, with his hand on his cheek, and never waked again: He died of an apoplexy, or lethargy, as the Coroner found it. I must clear myself of this, because I have received a paper, it was at the end thereof hinted, Whether I did know if Daintry was not concerned in this business? The man could not put any thing into our drink sure; I have heard of your Spanish tricks, but I must free Daintry of that, according as I understand it. He was to do Daintry the courtesy, and surely he would not so reward him. I believe Daintry was as free as any body; but the Jury and Coroner did return, that he died of God's visitation, a natural disease, and I hope I have satisfied the world of that.

Ordinary of Newgate. Pray col. Turner, know you nothing of a glass jewel, delivered to the countess of Devonshire, in the room of another?

Turner. I know nothing of such a thing; I never had any jewels of her in my life; she is an honourable person, she will not speak of such a thing.

I will now give account of my faith. I have been bred up a true Protestant of the Primitive Church of England; my father bred me, and instructed me very strictly in the law of God: I will not tell you when I came to apprentice, I will let that alone: I am free of the company of Drapers; and I have lived civilly and honestly in St. Martin's, at the upper end of Cheapside; I am sure there are a thousand sorrowful souls and weeping eyes for me this day.

Sir Rd. Ford. Pray put that little time that you have to spend here to good use, and leave off these relations.

Turner. Have a little patience, let me satisfy the world of some particulars; I was a constant church-man, it is well known to my parishioners; I never durst see a man in the church with his hat on, it troubled me very much. If a man comes before a judge on earth, he is not suffered to wear his hat, much less should they before the magistrate of magistrates, the God of Heaven.

Sir Rd. Ford. Hear me one word; those reverend persons about you, methinks they should admonish you to leave off these discourses.

Ordinary. We press to the condemnation of a man's self, that he might be justified in God's sight.

Turner. Mr. Sheriff, I will hold you but a very little while longer; I do here truly confess that I have been, as I have said, a very great sinner, guilty of all the sins in the world.

Ordinary. Speak to some particulars.

Turner. Pray, be quiet, can ye?—Especially that of prophaneness; I am truly sensible, heartily sorrowful for my sins; and I do beg of God, of his infinite mercy, through the merits of Christ, who died for me, to wash away all my sins, and all the sins of this people here present.

sent, and all the sins of the whole world. I do beg, that God will open the heart of any man that staggers in faith, to confirm him. I do say, and pawn my salvation upon it, That no man dare gainsay that Jesus Christ died for sinners, of whom I am chief: That man that lays hold upon Christ by faith, the gates of hell shall never prevail against him. Truly, I am thought to be a great drinker, a company-keeper; my occasions did call me to taverns, but I bless God, I think there is no man (pardon me, for I will not speak it with ostentation,) I hope no man ever saw me disguised in drink, to my knowledge, except it was when I was a boy. I am truly, heartily, and sincerely sorrowful for my sins: I do confess them before my God, and the whole world, that the least of my sins are able to throw me into hell; but that the blood of Jesus Christ, that doth wash away the sins of the whole world, hath purged and cleansed mine. I say, I do here heartily, solemnly, and wholly confess my sins, and am truly sorrowful for them; that is my confession, with more trouble of soul than I am able to express. Here I have made my true and faithful confession. In the second place, I have made restitution, so far as in me lay; the gentleman hath every one of his jewels again, every farthing-worth; nay, he hath 2,000*l.* worth more than he missed, therefore there was no intention of felony: But my sad fate in meeting with those two sad officers, God of his mercy everlastingly forgive them—

Mr. Ordinary. Express your charity as to the world.

Turner. Do not put me out of my way, I must go step by step. First, I have given you my own confession: secondly, I have made restitution, I have restored all to my power: the third thing that is behind of a christian, is my true and unfeigned repentance, and my charity to the whole world; that God, that is the searcher of all secrets, that tries the reins, that knows all the inner parts, knows my soul, that I long and desire to be with Jesus Christ in glory.

Mr. Ordinary. Which is best of all.

Turner. I am in perfect charity with the whole world; it is expected by some, that I should fall upon some persons to recriminate on them; I shall not do it, the Lord God of his infinite mercy forgive them. It was reported to his majesty, that on Sunday last I was drunk and that I abused this reverend person Mr. Ordinary: This news was brought me by some that were present when the king was told such stories, that I was drunk, and ranted, and swore God damn me, and God sink me, and that I had 5,000*l.* and I would have a pardon and cared not for the business, and would have a pardon when I please. This great reproach was thrown upon me to the king, and that, with some other scandals, has taken off the king's affections: but this is altogether false, for Mr. Hicks, my landlord, can tell, that on Sunday morning he would have had me drunk my morning's draught; I told him, no, I would not drink: I only drank one small cup of cyder in the morning, two little glasses of sack, and one glass of claret at dinner. I went to church with this reverend gentleman, where I received great deal of comfort to my soul, for which thank him: He made a sound scholar-like sermon, and fit for persons in our condition. I did perceive they wanted a clerk, and I took upon me to officiate as clerk, and I was happy I had that opportunity. I came home, and remained in my chamber. About eight or nine o'clock, Justice Stringer came to me in Chancery-Lane, and two or three knights and persons of quality, eight or nine in all: they had one bottle of sack among them, of which I drank one little cup: and for the swearing of those oaths, I did not do it, I hate them, they were untruths, and the Lord forgive them that raised that scandal.

Sir, I must desire that you would now join with me in prayer; but I have forgot one thing, it is short: that night the sessions broke up, I was put in the Hole: it is a most fearful, sad, deplorable place; Hell itself, in comparison cannot be such a place; there is neither bench, stool, nor stick for any person there; they lie like swine upon the ground, one upon another howling and roaring; it was more terrible to me than this death: I would humbly beg, that Hole may be provided with some kind of boards like a court of guard, that men may lie down upon them in ease; for when they should be best prepared for their ends, they are most tormented, lying only upon the ground; they had better take them and hang them as soon as they have their sentence.

Jackson, the keeper. Seventeen out of nineteen made their escapes out of that Hole, they having only a form there.

Turner. I did with these poor souls pray heartily; none were able to pray, poor creatures! two were dying; I prayed with them, comforted them, assisted them, and gave them five shillings when I came out of the Hole: now pray join with me in prayer.

Sir Richard Ford. If I did think there were a reprieve to come for you, I could be contented to spin out the time thus; but, in good earnest, I expect none; unless you had an apprehension you were not to die, you would not thus run to so many impertinencies, that methinks, cannot fit you for death.

Turner. Truly, I expect none; pray join with me in prayer.

(Then he prayed some time, and Mr. Weldon, the ordinary of Newgate, joined with him in prayer.)

Mr. Ordinary. The Lord Jesus have mercy upon thee!

Turner. Mr. Sheriffs, God be with ye: pray remember my duty and respects to my Lord Mayor, and to all the aldermen, and to all their families.

Turner. Executioner, I charge you meddle not with my cloaths.

Serjeants. Col. Turner, we will take care of them.

Turner. "Lord, I am assured to be with thee in glory; I do rely and depend, all in all, upon Christ: refuse not my soul at the last hour, I have none in heaven, nor none in earth, nor any thing but thee to rely upon; and therefore into thy hands, both now, and for ever, I commit my soul, my body, my spirit, in sure and certain hopes of a joyful resurrection at the day of judgment, where I must appear and give account of my sins; but Jesus Christ hath washed them away in his blood. Pray, doctor, let me beg you to read those verses in the second of the Hebrews, to comfort me, being the 14, 15, 16, 17, and 18 verses. Forasmuch then as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same, that through death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is the devil: and deliver them who, through fear of death, were all their life-time subject to bondage. For verily he took not on him the nature of angels, but he took on him the seed of Abraham; wherefore, in all things it behoved him to be made like unto his brethren, that he might be a merciful and faithful high-priest, in things pertaining to God, to make reconciliation for the sins of the people; for in that he himself hath suffered, being tempted, he is able to succour them that are tempted."

After this, he gave 40 shillings to a minister, to be given to the poor of that parish, and 18 shillings and sixpence more, to be delivered to his wife, to be given to his young son's school-master.

Turner. Mr. Jackson, God be with you: remember me to my landlord, and all there. My two children, I hope, will be freed. Mr. Sheriff, must I hang all day?

Sir Richard Ford. You will be cut down, as soon as you are dead.

Turner. Pray tell me true, Mr. Sheriff.

Sir Richard Ford. You will not hang above half an hour.

Thereupon, he directed the executioner to take off his halter from his shoulders; and afterwards taking it in his hand, kissed it, and put it on his neck himself; then after he had fitted his cap, and put it on, he went out of the cart upon the ladder. The executioner tied him up, and pulling the rope a little, says Turner, What, dost thou mean to choak me? pray, fellow, give me more rope: what a simple fellow is this! how long have you been executioner, that you know not yet how to put the knot?

Mr. Secker, Minister, out of a window near. Mr. Turner, have you remembered those four things I spake to you of?

Turner. I have done them.

Mr. Secker. I trust this hour of heaviness will be an hour of happiness.

Turner. I am assured of it.

Mr. Secker. A living Christian in a dying hour is the best of all. The Lord be with you, and the Lord carry your soul safe through the jaws of death, to the joys of life!

Turner. I doubt not, but through a dark cloud I shall see a bright Saviour. Executioner, look ye, turn me not off, untill you have the sign from me, which shall be by laying my right hand on my left shoulder. The Lord God forgive thee, I do.

In the midst of some private ejaculations, offering to pull down his cap, he espied a gentlewoman at a window nigh, kissed his hand, said, Your servant, mistress.—His cap being pulled down, he lifted up his hands, and said, I disclaim any desert of mine own, there is nothing in me; look upon me through Jesus Christ. Lord Jesus, receive my soul! and thereupon giving the sign, the executioner turned him off. And after some short time he was cut down, and his body conveyed to a house near, there to rest for a space, untill they provided for him decent burial.

The confluence of people from the gaol to the place of execution was very great, beyond the memory of any upon the like occasion.

During his imprisonment, and to the last breath of life, his carriage was very undaunted.

218. The Trial of MARGARET FELL and GEORGE FOX, for not taking the Oath of Obedience:* 16 CHARLES II. A. D. 1664. [6 Harleian Miscellany, 258.]

The EXAMINATION and TRIAL of MARGARET FELL and GEORGE FOX (at the several assizes held at Lancaster, the 14th and 16th days of the first month 1663-4; and the 29th of the sixth month 1664) for their obedience to Christ's Command, who saith, "Swear not at all:" Also something in Answer to Bishop Lancelot Andrew's Sermon concerning swearing.

Matt. xv. 6.

"Thus have you made the Commandment of God of none Effect by your Tradition."

She was called to the bar, and when she was at the bar, order was given to the gaoler, by the judge, to set a stool and a cushion for her to sit upon; and she had four of her daughters with her at the bar, and the judge said, Let not Mrs. Fell's daughters stand at the bar, but let them come up hither, they shall not stand at the bar; so they plucked them up, and set them near where the judge sat: then, after a while, the Mittimus was read, and the judge spoke to her, and she stood up to the bar, and he began to speak to her as followeth :

Judge. He said, Mrs. Fell, you are committed by the justices of peace for refusing to take the oath of obedience; and I am commanded, or sent by the king, to tender it to any that shall refuse it.

Margaret Fell. I was sent for from my own house and family, but for what cause or transgression I do not know.

Judge. I am informed by the justices of peace in this country, that you keep multitudes of people at your house, in a pretence of worshipping God; and, it may be, you worship him in part, but we are not to dispute that.

Marg. Fell. I have the king's word from his own mouth, That he would not hinder me of my religion. God forbid, said he, that I should hinder you of your religion, you may keep it in your own house: and I appeal to all the country, whether those people that meet me at my house be not a peaceable, a quiet, and a godly honest people? And whether there hath been any just occasion of offence given by the meeting that was kept in my house?

Judge. If you will give security that you will have no more meetings, I will not tender the oath to you: you think if there be no fighting nor quarrelling amongst you, that you keep the peace, and break no law; but I tell you, That you are a breaker of the law, by keeping of unlawful meetings; and again, you break the law, in that you will not take the oath of allegiance.

Marg. Fell. I desire that I may have the liberty to answer to those two things that are charged against me: and, first, for that which is looked upon to be matter of fact, which is concerning our meetings; there are several of my neighbours that are of the same faith, principle, and spirit, and judgment that I am of; and these are they that meet at my house, and I cannot shut my door against them.

Judge. Mistress, you begin at the wrong end, for the first is the oath.

Marg. Fell. I suppose, that the first occasion of tendering to me the oath, was, because of meeting; but, as for that, if I have begun at the wrong end, I shall begin at the other: and, first, then as to the oath, the substance of which is allegiance to the king; and this I shall say, as for my allegiance, I love, own, and honour the king, and desire his peace and welfare, and that we may live a peaceable, a quiet, and godly life under his government according to the Scriptures, and this is my allegiance to the king; and as for the oath itself, Christ Jesus, the king of kings, hath commanded me not to swear at all, neither by heaven, nor by earth, nor by any other oath.

Judge. He called for the statute-book, and the grand-jury to be present: then one of the justices, that committed her, said, Mrs. Fell You know, that, before the oath was tendered to you, we offered, that, if you would put in security to have no more meetings at your house, we would not tender the oath to you.

Marg. Fell. I shall not deny that.

Judge. If you will yet put in security that you will have no more meetings, I will not tender it to you.

Marg. Fell spoke to the judge, and the court, and the rest of the people: You all profess here to be Christians, and likewise you profess the Scriptures; so in answer to those things that are laid against me:

First (John iv.) Christ Jesus hath left upon record in the Scriptures, that God is a spirit, and that his worship is in the spirit and truth; and that he is seeking of such worshippers to worship him in which spirit, I and those that meet, in my house, meet and worship God, in obedience to his doctrine and command.

Secondly, Mat. iv. The same Christ Jesus hath commanded, in plain words, that I should not swear at all; and, for obedience to Christ's doctrine and command, am I here arraigned this day; and so, you being Christians, and professing the same things in words, judge of those things according to that of God in your consciences, and I appeal to all the country, whether ever any prejudice, or hurt, those meetings did?

So, after she had spoken of the worship of God in spirit, and obedience to Christ's doctrine and command, &c.

Judge. You are not here for obedience to Christ's commands, but for keeping of unlawful meetings; and you think that if you do not fight, or quarrel, or break the peace, that you break no law, but there is a law against unlawful meetings.

Marg. Fell. What law have I broken for worshipping God in my own house?

Judge. What law?

Marg. Fell. Aye, What law have I broken for worshipping God in my own house?

Judge. The common law.

Marg. Fell. I thought you had proceeded by a statute. Then the sheriff whispered to him, and mentioned the statute of the 35th of Eliz.

Judge. I could tell you of a law, but it is too penal for you, for it might cost you your life.

Marg. Fell. I must offer and tender my life and all for my testimony, if it be required of me. Then the latter part of the statute was read to the jury for the oath of obedience; and the judge informed the jury and the prisoner, concerning the penalty of the statute upon refusal, for it would be to the forfeiture of all her estate, real and personal, and imprisonment during life.

Marg. Fell. I am a widow, and my estate is a dowry, and I have five children unprotected; and, if the king's pleasure be to take my estate from me, upon the account of my conscience, and not for any evil or wrong done; let him do as he pleases; and further, I desire that I may speak to the jury of the occasion of my being here.

Judge. The jury is to hear nothing, but me to tender you the oath, and you to refuse it or take it, Marg. Fell. You will let me have the liberty that other prisoners have, and then she turned to the jury, and said—Friends, I am here this day upon the account of my conscience, and not for any evil or wrong done to any man, but for obeying Christ's doctrine and command, who hath said in the Scripture, That God is a spirit, and that his worship is in the spirit and truth, and for keeping meetings in the unity of his spirit, and for obeying Christ's command and doctrine, who hath said, Swear not at all; am I here arraigned this day: now you profess yourselves to be Christians, and you own the Scripture to be true, and, for the obedience of the plain words of Scripture, and for the testimony of my conscience, am I here; so I now appeal to the witness of God in all your consciences to judge of me according to that.

Secondly, you are to consider this statute what it was made for, and for whom it was made, for papists; and the oath was allegiance to the king. Now, let your consciences judge, Whether we be the people it was made for, who cannot swear any oath, at all, only for conscience sake, because Christ commands not to swear at all.

Judge. Then the judge seemed to be angry, and said, She was not there upon the account of her conscience; and said, She had an everlasting tongue, you draw the whole court after you, and she continued speaking on, and he still crying, Will you take the oath or no?

Marg. Fell. It is upon the account of my conscience, for, if I could have sworn, I had not been here.

Secondly. If I would not have meetings in my house, I need not to have the oath tendered to me, and so I desire the jury to take notice, that it is only for those two things that I am here arraigned; which are only upon the account of my conscience, and not for any evil done against any man: then the judge was angry again, and bid them tender her the oath, and hold her the book.

Judge. Will you take the oath of allegiance?

Marg. Fell. I have said already, that I own allegiance and obedience to the king at his just and lawful commands; and I do also owe allegiance and obedience to the king of kings, Christ Jesus, who hath commanded me not to swear at all.

Judge. That is no answer: will you take the oath, or will you not take it?

Marg. Fell. I say, I owe allegiance and obedience unto Christ Jesus, who commands me not to swear.

Judge. I say unto you, That is no answer: Will you take it, or will you not take it?

Marg. Fell. If you should ask me never so often, I must answer to you: the reason why I cannot take it, is, because Christ Jesus hath commanded me not to swear at all; I owe my allegiance and obedience unto him.

Then one of the justices, that committed her, said: Mrs. Fell, you may with a good conscience, if you cannot take the oath, put in security, that you may not have any more meetings at your house.

Marg. Fell. Wilt thou make that good, That I may, with a safe conscience, make an engagement to forbear meetings, for fear of losing my liberty and estate? Wilt not thou, and you all here, judge of me, that it was for saving my estate and liberty that I did it? And do I not in this deny my testimony? And would not this defile my conscience?

Judge. This is no answer: will you take the oath? We must not spend time.

Marg. Fell. I never took an oath in my life; I have spent my days thus far, and I never took an oath; I own allegiance to the king, as he is King of England, but Christ Jesus is king of my conscience.—Then the clerk held out the book, and bid her pull off her glove, and lay her hand on the book.

Marg. Fell. I never laid my hand on the book to swear, in all my life, and I never was at this assize before; I was bred and born in his county, and have led my life in it, and I was never at an assize before this time, and I bless the Lord, that I am here this day upon this account, to bear testimony to the truth.—Then they asked her if she would have the oath read. She answered: I do not care if I never hear an oath read; for the land mourns, because of oaths.

Judge. Then the judge cried, Take her away.—Then they took her civilly away; and asked her if she would give security, That she would have no more meetings.

Marg. Fell. Nay, I can give no such security, I have spoken enough for that.

Then George Fox was called before judge Twisden; being a prisoner, the gaoler brought him in.

Judge. What, do you come into the court with your hat on?—And then the gaoler took it off.

George Fox. Peace be amongst you all.—And said, The hat was not the honour that came down from God.

Judge. Will you take the oath of allegiance, George Fox?

Geo. Fox. I never took oath in my life.

Judge. Will you swear, or no?

Geo. Fox. Christ commands we must not swear at all; and the apostle: and, whether must I obey God, or man, judge thee, I put it to thee.

Judge. I will not dispute with thee, George Fox. Come, read the oath to him. And so the oath was read, and, when it was read, give him the book, said they; and so a man, that stood by him, held up the book, and said, lay your hand on the book.

Geo. Fox. Give me the book in my hand. Which set them all a gazing, and as in hope he would have sworn. Then when he got the book in his hand, he held up the book, and said: This book commands me not to swear, if it be a bible, I will prove it; and he saw it was a bible, and he held it up; and then they plucked it forth of his hand again, and cried,

Will you swear? Will you take the oath of allegiance, yea, or nay?

Geo. Fox. My allegiance lies not in oaths, but in truth and faithfulness; for I honour all men, much more the king: but Christ saith I must not swear, the great Prophet, the Saviour of the world, and the Judge of the world: and thou sayest I must swear: whether must I obey Christ, or thee? For it is in tenderness of conscience that I do not swear, in obedience to the command of Christ and the Apostle; and for his sake I suffer, and in obedience to his command do I stand this day; and we have the word of a king for tender consciences, besides his speeches and declarations at Breda: and dost thou own the king?

Judge. Yes, I own the king.

Geo. Fox. Then why dost not thou own his speeches and declarations concerning tender consciences? To the which he replied nothing; but George said, It is in obedience to Christ, the Saviour of the world, the judge of the world, before whose judgment-seat all men must be brought, that I do not swear, and am a man of a tender conscience. And then the judge stood up.

Judge. I will not be afraid of thee, thou speaks so loud, thy voice drowns mine and the court's; I must call for three or four cryers to drown thy voice, thou hast good lungs.

Geo. Fox. I am a prisoner here, this day, for the Lord Jesus, that made heaven and earth, and for his sake, do we suffer, and for him do I stand this day; and, if my voice was five times louder, yet should I sound it out, and lift it up for Christ's sake, for whose cause I stand this day before your judgment-seat, in obedience to Christ's commands, who commands not to swear, before whose judgment-seat you must all be brought, and give an account.

Judge. Sirrah, will you take the oath?

Geo. Fox. I am none of thy Sirrah, I am no Sirrah, I am a Christian: art thou a judge, and sits there to give names to prisoners? Then thou ought not to give names to prisoners.

Judge. I am a Christian too.

Geo. Fox. Then, do Christian works.

Judge. Sirrah, thou thinkest to frighten me with thy words, and looked aside, I am saying so again.

Geo. Fox. I speak in love to thee, that doth not become a judge, thou oughtest to instruct a prisoner of the law and Scriptures, if he be ignorant and out of the way.

Judge. George Fox, I speak in love to thee.

Geo. Fox. Love gives no names.

Judge. Wilt thou swear, wilt thou take the oath, yea or nay?

Geo. Fox. As I said before, whether must I obey God or man, judge ye. Christ commands not to swear, and if thou, or ye, or any minister, or priest here will prove that ever Christ, or his apostles, after they had forbidden swearing, commanded men should swear, I will swear, and, several priests being there, yet not one did appear.

Judge. George Fox, will you swear, or no?

Geo. Fox. It is in obedience to Christ's commands I do not swear, and for his sake we suffer, and you are sensible enough of swearers, how they first swear one way, then another; and if I could swear any oath at all, upon any occasion, I should take that, but it is not denying oaths upon some occasion, but all oaths, according to Christ's doctrine.

Judge. I am a servant to the king, and the king sent me not to dispute, but he sent me to put his laws in execution, wilt thou swear? Tender the oath of allegiance to him.

Geo. Fox. If thou love the king, why dost thou break his word, and not own his declarations and speeches to tender consciences, from Breda, for I am a man of a tender conscience, for in obedience to Christ's command I am not to swear.

Judge. Then you will not swear, take him gaoler.

Geo. Fox. It is for Christ's sake, I cannot swear, in obedience to his commands I suffer, and so the Lord forgive you all.

And so the mighty power of the Lord God was over all.

The Appearance of MARGARET FELL the 2nd time, being the 16th day of the aforementioned month, 1663-4.

Judge. Mrs. Fell, you stand here indicted by the statute, because you will not take the oath of allegiance, and I am here to inform you, what the law provides for you in such a case, viz.

First, If you confess to the indictment, the judgment of a Premunire is to pass upon you.

Secondly, If you plead, you have liberty to traverse.

Thirdly, If you stand mute and say nothing at all, judgment will be passed against you, to see what you will chuse, of those three ways.

Marg. Fell. I am altogether ignorant of these things, for I had never the like occasion, so I desire to be informed by thee which of them is the best for me, for I do not know; and so several about the court cried, Traverse, traverse.

Judge. If you will be advised by me, put in your traverse, and so you have liberty, until the next assizes, to answer your indictment.

Marg. Fell. I had rather according to thy own proposal have a process, that I might have liberty until the next assizes, and then to put in a traverse.

Judge. Your traverse is a process.

Marg. Fell. May not I have a process, and put in my traverse the next assizes, I am informed, that was the thing that thou intended that I should have.

Judge. You shall have it.

Marg. Fell. That is all I desire.—Then, a clerk of the Crown-office stood up and whispered to the judge, and said it was contrary to law, and said I must put in my traverse now.

Judge. I would do you all the favour I can, but you must enter your traverse now.

Marg. Fell. I acknowledge thy favour and mercy, for thou hast shewn more mercy than my neighbours have done, and I see what thou hast done for me, and what my neighbours have done against me; and I know very well, how to make a distinction, for they who have done this against me, they have no reason for it.

Judge. I have done you no wrong, I found you here.

Marg. Fell. I had not been here but by my neighbours.

Judge. What say you, are you willing to traverse?

Marg. Fell. If I may not be permitted to have that which I desire, that is, longer time, I must be willing to traverse, till the next assizes; and that upon this account, that I have something to inform thee of, which I did not speak on the last time, when I was brought before thee: The justices which committed me, they told me they had express order from above; but they did not shew me the order, neither indeed did I ask them for it, but I heard since, that they have given it out in the country, that they had an order from the council, others said they had an order from the king.—The Sheriff said there was express order; and also justice Fleming, said, there was an order from the king and the council; so the country is incensed, that I am some great enemy to the king, so I desire that I may have this order read, that I may know what my offence is, that I may clear myself.

Judge. I will tell you what that order is, we have express order from the king, to put all statutes and laws in execution, not only against you, but all other people, and against Papists if they be complained of.

Marg. Fell. Will that order give the justices of peace power to fetch me from my own house, to tender me the oath?

Judge. Mistress we are all in love, if they had an order believe they had one.

Marg. Fell. If they have one, let them shew it, and then I can believe it.

Judge. Come, come, enter the traverse.

Marg. Fell. I had rather have had more time; that I might have informed the king, concerning these things.

Judge. You may inform the king in half a year's time, so now let us have your friend called up.

Then, after she was gone down, the judge called her back again and said, if you will put in bail, you may go home, and have your liberty till the next assizes, but you must not have such frequent meetings.

Marg. Fell. I will rather lie where I am, for as I told you before, I must keep my conscience clear, for that I suffer.

The 16th day of the same month, George Fox was brought before the Judge the second time, where he was a little offended at his hat, being the last morning, before he was to depart away, and not many people.

Judge. The judge he read a paper to him, hich was, whether he would submit, stand mute, or traverse, and so have judgment pass; he spake these and many more words so very softly, and in haste, that George Fox could not tell what he said.

Geo. Fox. desired it might be traversed and tried.

Judge. Take him away, then I will have no more with him, take him away.

Geo. Fox. Well, live in the fear of God, and do justice.

Judge. Why, have I not done you justice?

Geo. Fox. That which thou hast done hath been against the command of Christ.

This with much more was spoken, which could not be collected.

And then George Fox was called up, the 29th day of the sixth month in the year 1664.

At the Assizes holden at Lancaster, Margaret Fell brought to the bar, the Indictment read to the Judge, Come will you take the oath?

Marg. Fell. There is a clause in the Indictment, that the Church-Wardens informed of something which seemeth, that that should be the ground or first occasion of this Indictment, I desire to know what that information was, and what the transgression was, by which I come under this law.

Judge. Mistress, we are not to dispute that, you are here indicted, and you are here to answer, and to plead your Indictment.

Marg. Fell. I am first to seek out the ground and the cause whereof I am indicted; you have no law against me, except I be a transgressor; the law is made for the lawless, and transgressors; and except I be a transgressor, ye have no law against me, neither ought you to have indicted me, for being that the Church-wardens did inform, my question is, what matter of fact they did inform of, for I was sent for from my own house, from amongst my children and family, when I was about my outward occasions, when I was in no meeting, neither was it a meeting-day; therefore I desire to know what this first foundation or matter of fact was, for there is no law against the innocent and righteous, and, if I be a transgressor, let me know wherein.

Judge. You say well, the Law is made for transgressors, but Mistress, do you go to church?

Marg. Fell. I do go to Church.

Judge. What Church?

Marg. Fell. To the church of Christ.

Judge. But do you go to church amongst other people, ye know what I mean.

Marg. Fell. What dost thou call a church, the house or the people? The house ye all know is wood and stone; but if thou call the people a church, to that I shall answer: As for the church of England that now is, I was gathered unto the Lord's truth, unto which I now stand a witness, before this church was a church. I was separated from the general worship of the nation, when there was another set up than that which is now, and was persecuted by that power that then was, and suffered much hardship; and would you have us now to deny our faith and our principles, which we have suffered for so many years; and would you now have us turn from that which we have borne witness of so many years, and turn to your church contrary to our conscience?

Judge. We spend time about those things, come to the matter in hand, what say you to the oath and to the Indictment?

Marg. Fell. I say this to the oath, as I have said in this place before now, Christ Jesus hath commanded me not to swear at all, and that is the only cause and no other; the righteous Judge of Heaven and Earth knoweth, before whose throne and justice ye must all appear one day, and his eyes sees us all and beholds us all at this present, and he hears and sees all our words and actions; and therefore every one ought to be serious, for the place of judgment is weighty; and this I do testify unto you here, where the Lord's eye beholds us all, that for the matter or substance of the oath, and the end for which it was intended, I do own one part, and deny the other; that is to say, I do own truth and faithfulness and obedience to the king, and all his just and lawful demands and commands; I do also deny all plotting, contrivings against the king, and all Popish Supremacy and Conspiracy, and I can no more transgress against king Charles in these things, than I can disobey Christ Jesus his commands; and by the same power and virtue of the same word, which hath commanded me not to swear at all, the same doth bind me in my conscience, that I can neither plot nor contrive against the king, nor do him nor no man upon the earth any wrong; and I do not deny this oath, only because it is the oath of allegiance, but I deny it, because it is an oath, because Christ Jesus hath said I shall not swear at all, neither by Heaven, nor by Earth, nor any other oath; and, if I might gain the whole world for swearing an oath, I could not, and whatever I have to lose this day, for not swearing of an oath, I am willing to offer it up.

Judge. What say you to the indictment?

Marg. Fell. What should I say, I am clear and innocent of the wronging any man upon the earth as my little child that stands by me here, and if any here have any thing to lay to my charge, let them come down and testify it here before you all; and, if I be clear and innocent, you have no law against me: Then colonel Kirby and the sheriff whispered to the Judge, and I looked up and spoke to colonel Kirby, and said, let us have no whispering, I will not have so many judges one of one side, and another of another, here is one judge that is to be judge: and the judge said No, No, I will not hear them; and then I called to colonel Kirby, and said, If thou have any thing to lay to my charge, or to speak against me, come, come down here, and testify against me; and I said, The judge represents the king's person and his power, and I own that.

Judge. Jury, take notice she doth not take the oath.

Marg. Fell. This matter is weighty to me, whatsoever it is to you, upon many accounts, and I would have the Jury to take notice of it, and to consider seriously what they are going to do; for I stand here before you upon the account of the loss of my liberty and my estate.

Secondly. I stand in obeying Christ's commands, and so keeping my conscience clear, which if I obey this law and king Charles's commands, I defile my conscience and transgresseth against Christ Jesus, who is the king of my conscience, and the cause and controversy in this matter, that you all are here to judge of this day, is betwixt Christ Jesus and king Charles; and I am his servant and witness this day, and this is his cause, and whatsoever I suffer it is for him, and so let him plead my cause when he pleaseth.

And the judge said to the jury, Are ye all agreed, have ye found it? And they said, For the king.

Margaret Fell then spoke to the judge, and said, I have council to plead to my indictment; and he said he would hear them afterwards in arrest of judgment; so the court broke up for that time; and, after dinner when they came again, they intended to have called us at the first, and they had called George Fox out, and was calling me; and I stepped up to the bar, and desired the judge that he would give us time till the next morning to bring in our arrest of judgment; and the judge said at the first we should, and I was stepping down to go my way: and the judge called me back again, and said, Mistress Fell, you wrote to me concerning your prisons, that they are bad and rains in, and are not fit for people to lie in; and, I answered, the sheriff doth know and hath been told of it several times; and now it is raining; if you will send to see, at this present, you may see whether they be fit for people to lie in or no; and colonel Kirby stood up and spoke to the judge to excuse the sheriff, and the badness of the room; and I spoke to him, and said, If you were to lie in it yourselves, you would think it hard, but your minds is only in cruelty to commit others, as William Kirby here hath one, who hath committed ten of our friends, and put them into a cold room, where there was nothing but bare boards to lie on, where they have laid several nights, some of them old ancient men above threescore years of age, and known to be honest men in their country where they live; and when William Kirby was asked, why they might not have liberty to shift for themselves for beds? he answered and said, they were to commit them to prison, but not to provide prisons for them: and we asked him who should do it then? and he said, the king: And then the judge spoke to him and said, they should not do so, they should let them have prisons fit for men, with several more such like words; and then at that time we were returned to our chambers again; the next day we were called about the tenth hour; and I stood up to the bar, and said I had counsel there, and named them, that the judge might assign them to speak; and I said I had two or three words to speak before them, and I said, I did see all sorts of prisoners that did appear before the judge received mercy, what the law would afford them; but we desired only to receive justice and law, and the judge said what are we here for else; so I stepped down, and the lawyers spoke and shewed the judge several errors, and defects and places of contradiction, and confusion in the indictment; at which the judge seemed to give ear to some of them, others he seemed to wave; but he made a pause and a stop, and seemed dissatisfied, and then called George Fox; and so then when he came to plead, and bringing that by which his indictment was quite quenched; and then they put the oath to George Fox. Again the judge spoke to the lawyers and said, he would consider of those particulars they had spoken to, and he would speak to his brother Twisden before he passed judgment upon me; but, if I do pass judgment, you may have a writ of error; and the lawyers answered him again, will you pass an erroneous judgment my lord? so after they had called the grand jury, and tendered George Fox the oath again, they returned us to our chambers; and when they had drawn another indictment of George Fox, and found it, they called us again in the afternoon, and George Fox pleaded to his indictment and entered his traverse; when he had done, the judge spoke to me, and said, If such a word had been in, which was not in mine, but it was in George Fox's (and yet it was neither of those words, by which his indictment was quashed) but, if that had been in mine, he said he would not have passed sentence, but, being that it was not there, he passed sentence of premunire; then I stood up and told him that he had said to my council, that I might have a writ of error to reverse it; he said I should have what the law would afford me; so I said, The Lord forgive thee for what thou hast done, and this law was made for Popish recusants, but ye pass sentence but on few of them.

Margaret Fell.

The last Assizes holden at Lancaster, the 29th of the sixth month, 1664.

I George Fox, being called before the judge, was put amongst the felons and murderers, and there stood amongst them above two hours, the people and the justices, and the judge gazing upon me; and they tried many things before the judge, and they called me to the bar, and then the judge caused me to be brought, and he then caused the jury to be called, and then he asked the justices whether they had tendered me the oath at the sessions, and they said they had; and the judge caused the book to be given to the justices for them to swear, they tendered me the oath according to the indictment, and some of them would have refused, and the judge said he would do it to take away occasion, that there might be no occasion; and, when the justices and jury was sworn, the judge asked me whether I had not refused to take the oath the last assize? and I said I never took an oath in my life, and Christ the saviour and judge of the world saith, Swear not at all; and the judge asked me whether or no I had not refused to take the oath the last assizes? and I answered, the words that I said to them was, that if they could prove either priest or teacher, or justices, that, after Christ and the apostles had forbidden swearing, that afterwards they commanded that men should swear, I would swear.

The judge said he was not at that time to dispute whether it was lawful to swear, but to enquire whether or no I did refuse to take the oath.

George. Those things as concerning plotting and the pope's foreign powers, &c. contained in that oath, I utterly deny.

The judge said, I said well in that.

George. I said to them again as before, if they could prove, that, after Christ and the apostle forbade swearing, that again they commanded to swear, I would swear; but Christ and the apostle commanded not to swear, therefore I should shew forth christianity, for I am a christian.

The judge asked me again, whether I denied the oath, what did I say?

George. What would thou have me to say? I have told thee before what I have said.

The judge asked me if I would have those men to swear that I had taken the oath?

George. Would thou have those men to swear that I have refused to take the oath? at which the court burst out into laughter: I asked them if this court was a playhouse; where is gravity and sobriety, for that did not become them? and so the indictment being read, I told the judge I had something to speak to it; and I asked him whether all the oath was not to be put into the indictment, and he said yes; why, then, said I, here is 'pretended to be derived and his heirs and successors' left out; and I asked him whether the oath was to be put to the king's subjects, and he said yes.

I answered, why am not I put in as a subject? but the word 'subject' is left out of the indictment, which is in the oath, and so makes it not the same oath. Jury, take notice of it; but the judge said, I must speak to the jury; at which words the judge read the oath, and found it was as I had said; so he stood up, and said he could put the oath to me, or any man in the court, and so they began to be disturbed in themselves; also the justices. And there began to be a murmuring against the clerks; and the judge he got up, and began to cover the error; so I asked whether the last eleventh day of January the sessions were kept at Lancaster, which they call Monday, and whether or no the sessions was not on that they call Tuesday, the 12th of January; all people take your almanacks, and see whether any oath was tendered G. F. the 11th of January, whether the sessions was not upon the 12th; and the clerks and people looked their almanacks, and saw it was the 12th; and the judge asked whether the 11th was not the first of the sessions, and they answered there was but one day, and it was the 12th; and the judge said then it was a great mistake; and then all the justices was struck, and some of them could have found in their hearts to have gone off, and said they had done it on purpose, and said, what clerk did it? and a great stir was amongst them: and then I spoke to the jury, how that they could not bring me in guilty according to that indictment; and the judge said I must not speak to the jury, but he would speak to them, and said they might bring me in guilty, I denying the oath; then I said what should you do with a form then, and do not go according to it? then you may throw the form away, and then I told the jury that I lay upon their consciences, as they would answer the Lord God before his judgment seat, before whom all must be brought; and so the judge spoke to me, and said he would hear me afterwards any reasons I could alledge, wherefore he should not give judgment against me, and so he spoke to the jury; and I bid him do me justice, and do justice, and so the jury brought in for the kipp guilty.

And I told them then that the justices had forsworn themselves and the jury both, and so they had small cause to laugh as they did a little before, and to say I was mad; and, before I had brought forth my reasons, I stood a little while, and the judge said he cannot dispute; but then the people said, he is too cunning for them all, after I had brought forth my reasons, how contrary to their own indictment they had done and sworn, and brought me in guilty: Oh, the envy and rage, and malice that was among them against me, and lightness, but the Lord confounded it all, that abundance of it was slain; and so I told them I was no lawyer, and the judge said he would hear me what I could alledge before he did give judgment; and so I cried, All people might see how they had forsworn themselves, and gone contrary to their indictment, and so their envy and malice was wonderfully stopt, and so presently Margaret Fell was called, who had a great deal of good service amongst them; and so the court broke up near the second hour; many more words was spoken concerning the truth.

And so in the afternoon we were brought up to have sentence passed upon us, and so Margaret Fell desired that judgment and sentence might be deferred till the next morning; and we desired nothing but law and justice at his hands, for thieves had mercy; and I desired the judge to send some to see my prison, being so bad, they would put no creature they had in it, it was so windy and rainy; and I told him that colonel Kirby, who was then on the bench, said I should be locked up, and no flesh alive should come at me; and most of the gentry of the country being gathered together, expecting to hear the sentence, but they were crost that time; so I was had away, to my prison, and some justices, with colonel Kirby, went up to see it; and when they came up in it they durst scarcely go in it, it was so bad, rainy, and windy, and the badness of the floor; and others that came up said it was a jakes house, I being removed out of the prison which I was in formerly; and so colonel Kirby said I should be removed from that place ere long, that I should be sent unto some securer place; for he spoke to the judge in the court, saying, that he knew that the justices would join with him; but the judge said, after I have past sentence I will leave him to the jailor; and how I was not a fit man to be conversed with, none should converse with me; and all the noise amongst the people was that I should be transported; and so the next day, towards the 11th hour, we was called forth again to hear the sentence and judgment; but Margaret Fell was called first before me to the bar, and there was some counsellors pleaded, and found many errors in her indictment, and so she was taken by, after the judge had acknowledged them, and then the judge asked what they could say to mine; and I was willing to let no man plead for me, but to speak to it myself; and, though Margaret Fell had some that pleaded for her, yet she spoke as much herself as she would; and though they had the most envy against me, yet the most gross errors was found in mine; and before I came to the bar I was moved to pray, that the Lord would confound their wickedness and envy, and set his truth over all, and exalt his seed; the thundering voice answered, I have glorified thee, and will glorify thee again; and I was so filled full of glory, that my head and ears was filled full of it; and that when the trumpets sounded, and the judges came up again, they all appeared as dead men under me; and so when I was to answer to the errors of the indictment, seeing that all the oath, as he said himself, was to be in, I told him there was many words of the oath left out, which was 'pretended to be derived, and his heirs and successors' and I bid them look the oath, and look the indictment, and they might see it, and they did, and found it according to my words; and I asked them whether the last assizes holden at Lancaster was in the 15th year of the king, which was the 10th day of March, and they said, nay, it was the 16th year; then, said I, look your indictment, and see whether or no it is not the 15th year, and then they were all of a fret both judge and justices, for it was the 15th in the indictment; then the judge bid them look whether Margaret Fell's was so or no, and it was not so: I told them I had something else to speak concerning the indictment, but they said nay, I had spoken enough, so the indictment was thrown out; so I told them that they had small cause to laugh as they had done a little before, for they might see how the justices and the jury were forsworn men, and so I bid him do me justice, and he said, I should have law; and the judge said I was clear from all the former, and he started up in a rage and said, but he would prefer the oath to me again; I told him they had example enough for swearers and false swearers, both justices and jury, yesterday before their faces, for I saw before my eyes both justices and jury had forsworn themselves, who heard the indictment; and so he asked me, whether I would take the oath? I bid him do me justice for my false imprisonment, all this while; for what had I been prisoner all this while for, for I ought to be at liberty; Then he said I was at liberty, but I will put the oath to you again: Then I turned me about, and cried, All people, take notice this is a snare, and all was mighty quiet, and all people was struck and astonished; and he caused the grand jury to be called, for he had called them before, when I was there, when he saw they would be overthrown, and the jury would fain have been dismissed; but he told them, he could not dismiss them, for he had business for them, and they might be ready, when he called them, and I felt his intent, that if I was freed he would come on again; so I looked him in the face, and he was judged in himself, for he saw that I saw him; so he caused the oath to be read to me again, and caused the jury to be called, and then when the oath was read, he asked me whether I would take the oath, or no; and, the jury standing by, I told him, I never took oath in my life, and he bid them give me the book, and I bid them give it me in my hand and I opened it; and he bid me swear, and I told him the book bid swear not at all; again he bid me swear, and I told him, the book said I should not swear, and held it open to them, and said by the book, I would prove that men should not swear.

And if they would prove, after Christ and the apostle had forbidden swearing, that afterwards they commanded to swear, then I would swear, for I was a man of a tender conscience; and, if they had any sense of a tender conscience, they would consider this; and the judge asked me, whether I would take the oath? And bid them give me the book again: I told them, ye give me the book to swear, and the book saith I should not swear at all: and so you may prison the book: The judge said, he would imprison George Fox; I answered, nay, you may prison the book, which saith swear not at all; and the sheriff and the judge said, the angel swore in the Revelations; I answered, I bring forth my first begotten Son into the world, saith God, let all the angels in heaven worship him, who saith swear not at all; and the judge said often, he would not dispute; and so then I spoke much to the jury, how that it was for Christ's sake, that which I did; and therefore none of them to act contrary to that of God in their consciences, for before his judgment-seat they must all be brought; and for all those things contained in the oath, as plots, and persecuting about religion, and the pope's power, &c. I denied them in my heart, and I am a Christian, and shall shew forth Christianity, this day, and it is for Christ's sake that I stand, for it is 'lotish shabim de col dabor;' and they all gazed, and there was a great calm, and they took me away; but there were many more words, both to the jury and to them.

Then, in the afternoon, we was called again, where I stood among the thieves a pretty while, with my hat on, at the last the gaoler took it off; and when I was called to the bar, the jury brought in guilty for the king, and the judge asked me what I could say for myself; I bid them read the indictment, I would not answer to that I did not hear; and, as they read, the judge bid them take heed it was not false again; and they read it so amazedly, that, when they spoke to me, I did scarcely understand what they said, and the judge asked me, What I would plead? I told them, I desired to have a copy of that indictment, and to have some time to answer to it, for the last I had but lately, and never heard it read but once, and then in the court, and so the judge asked me, what time I would have? And I said till the next assizes, and the judge said I should: Then he asked again, what I would plead? I told him I was not guilty at all of denying swearing, swearing obstinately and wilfully, and those things contained in the oath, as jesuitical plots, and foreign powers, &c. I utterly denied them; and he said, I said well in that: And the judge said, the king was sworn, the parliament was sworn, and the justices and he was sworn, and the law was upheld by oaths: I told them, they had sufficient experience of men's swearing; Had not the justices and jury forsworn themselves? And had they not read the book of martyrs, how many of the martyrs suffered, because they could not swear, both in the ten persecutions, and in Bonner's days? And the judge said, I would the laws were otherwise: Then I said, our yea is yea and our nay nay, all along; and if we transgress our yea and nay, let us suffer as they do that break an oath, and so to deny swearing is not a new thing in obedience to Christ's command; and I said this we had sent to the king, who said it was reasonable: And so, after several more words, I was had away to my chamber, being, as I was before, to answer to the indictment; and so the truth and power of the Lord God was glorious over all, and many spirits was crost grievously in their envy and malice.

There was many things spoken both to judge, jury, and people, which were too large to mention.

And so the judge told Margaret Fell her sentence, and I lie upon a new indictment.

There follows an Argument, on the unlawfulness of swearing, with this title :

"Something in Answer to bishop Lancelot Andrews's Sermon concerning Swearing, being one of his Sermons upon the Third Commandment; the place that he treats upon is in Jer. the 4th, the words are these : 'And thou shalt swear, the Lord liveth, in truth, in judgment, and in righteousness.'"

219. A Trial of WITCHES, at the Assizes held at Bury St. Edmond's for the County of Suffolk : 17 CHARLES II. A. D. 1665. Before Sir Matthew Hale,* knt. then Lord Chief Baron of his Majesty's Court of Exchequer. Taken by a Person then attending the Court. London: Printed for William Shrewsbury, at the Bible, in Duck-lane, 1682.

[See the Cases of Mary Smith, A. D. 1616, ante, vol. 2, p. 1050; of the Essex Witches, A. D. 1645, ante, vol. 4, p. 817; of Lloyd and others, A. D. 1682, and of Wenham, A. D. 1712, post. The Case of Malcolm Macgregor cited in the Note, vol. 4, p. 829, is much more fully reported in Maclaurin's Arguments and Decisions, &c. p. 595, (where the pannel is called Callum Macgregor, alias John Grant). To this report Mr. Maclaurin has subjoined an argument, in which, upon principle and from analogy, he questions the soundness of the decision in favour of the prescription, and this he says, "may be done with the less diffidence, as a contrary opinion was given by some of the judges not many years ago." In the Abstract of the Laws of New England (which, as Mr. Davenport observed, should rather be intitled, "An Abstract of a Code or System of Laws prepared for the Commonwealth of the Massachusetts Bay;" for although when they compiled their laws they made this abstract their plan in general, yet they departed from it in many instances, and in some which were very material) printed in London in 1655, and inserted in Hutchinson's Collections of Papers forming the third volume of his History of Massachusetts Bay, the third and fourth articles of the seventh chapter are these : "III. Witchcraft, which is fellowship by covenant with a familiar spirit, to be punished with death. IV. Consultants with witches not to be tolerated, but either to be cut off by death or banishment, or other suitable punishment." New England seems to have had its share of witchcraft in the 17th century. The following Account is extracted from Hutchinson's History :

"The confusion the country was in from the supposed witchcrafts, seems to have occasioned an adjournment of the general court on the 2nd of July, to the second Wednesday in October, 1692; very little public business having been done during the session. The great noise which the New England witchcrafts made throughout the English dominions, proceeded more from the general panic with which all sorts of persons were seized, and an expectation that the contagion would spread to all parts of the country, than from the number of persons who were executed, more having been put to death in a single county in England, in a short space of time, than have suffered in all New England from the first settlement until the present time. Fifteen years had passed, before we find any mention of witchcraft among the English colonists. The Indians were supposed to be worshippers of the Devil, and their powows to be wizards. The first suspicion of witchcraft among the English, was about the year 1645; at Springfield upon Connecticut river, several persons were supposed to be under an evil hand, and among the rest two of the minister's children. Great pains were taken to prove the fact upon several persons charged with the crime, but either the nature of the evidence was not satisfactory, or the fraud was suspected, and so no person was convicted until the year 1650, when a poor wretch, Mary Oliver, probably weary of her life from the general reputation of being a witch, after long examination was brought to confession of her guilt, but I do not find that she was executed. Whilst this enquiry was making, Margaret Jones was executed at Charlestown (see vol. 1, p. 150); and Mr. Hale mentions a woman at Dorchester, and another at Cambridge about the same time, who all at their death asserted their innocence. Soon after, Hugh Parsons was tried at Springfield and escaped death (id. p. 179). In 1655 Mrs. Hibbins, the assistant's widow, was hanged at Boston (id. p. 187). In 1662, at Hartford in Connecticut, about 30 miles from Springfield upon the same river, one Anne Cole, a young woman who lived next door to a Dutch family, and, no doubt, had learned something of the language, was supposed to be possessed with demons, who sometimes spake Dutch and sometimes English, and sometimes a language which nobody understood, and who held a conference with one another. Several ministers who were present, took down the conference in writing, and the names of several persons, mentioned in the course of the conference, as actors or bearing parts in it; particularly a woman then in prison upon suspicion of witchcraft, one Greensmith, who upon examination confessed and appeared to be surprised at the discovery. She owned that she and the others named had been familiar with a dæmon, who had carnal knowledge of her,* and although she had not made a formal covenant, yet she had promised to be ready at his call, and was to have had a high frolic at Christmas, when the agreement was to have been signed. Upon this confession she was executed, and two more of the company were condemned at the same time.† In 1669, Susanna Martin of Salisbury, was bound over to the court upon suspicion of witchcraft, but escaped at that time. She suffered death in 1692.

“In 1671, Elizabeth Knap, another ventriloqua, alarmed the people of Groton in much the same manner as Anne Cole had done those of Hartford; but her dæmon was not so cunning, for instead of confining himself to old women, he railed at the good minister of the town and other persons of good character, and the people could not then be prevailed on to believe him, but believed the girl, when she confessed she had been deluded, and that the devil had tormented her in the shape of good persons; and so she escaped the punishment due to her fraud and imposture.

“In 1673, Eunice Cole of Hampton was tried, and the Jury found her Not (legally) Guilty, but that there were strong grounds to suspect her of familiarity with the devil.

“In 1679, William Morse’s house at Newbury, was troubled with the throwing of bricks, stones, &c. and a boy of the family was supposed to be bewitched, who accused one of the neighbours; and in 1682, the house of George Walton, a Quaker at Portsmouth, and another house at Salmon-falls, both in New-Hampshire, were attacked after the same manner.

“In 1683, the dæmons removed to Connecticut river again, where one Desborough’s house was molested by an invisible hand, and a fire kindled nobody knew how, which burnt up great part of his estate; and in 1684, Philip Smith, a judge of the court, a military officer and a representative of the town of Hadley, upon the same river, an hypochondriac person, fancied himself under an evil hand, and suspected a woman, one of his neighbours, and languished and pined away, and was generally supposed to be bewitched to death. While he lay ill, a number of brisk ladstried an experiment upon the old woman. Having dragged her out of her house, they hung her up until she was near dead, let her down, rolled her some time in the snow, and at last buried her in it, and there left her, but it happened that she survived, and the melancholy man died.

“Notwithstanding these frequent instances of supposed witchcrafts, none had suffered for near thirty years, in the Massachusetts colony. The execution of the assistant or counsellor’s widow in 1655, was disapproved of by many principal persons, and it is not unlikely that her death saved the lives of many other inferior persons. But in 1685, a very circumstantial account of all or most of the cases I have mentioned, was published, and many arguments were brought to convince the country that they were no delusions nor impostures, but the effects of a familiarity between the devil and such as he found fit for his instruments; and in 1687 or 1688, began a more alarming instance than any which had preceded it. Four of the children of John Goodwin, a grave man and a good liver at the north part of Boston, were generally believed to be bewitched. I have often heard persons, who were of the neighbourhood, speak of the great consternation it occasioned. The children were all remarkable for ingenuity of temper, had been religiously educated and were thought to be without guile. The eldest was a girl of 13 or 14 years. She had charged a laundress with taking away some of the family linen. The mother of the laundress was one of the wild Irish, of bad character, and gave the girl harsh language; soon after which she fell into fits, which were said to have something diabolical in them. One of her sisters and two brothers followed her example, and it is said, were tormented in the same part of their bodies at the same time, although kept in separate apartments, and ignorant of one another’s complaints. One or two things were said to be very remarkable; all their complaints were in the day time, and they slept comfortably all night; they were struck

* “The Egyptians suppose a divine spirit may possibly approach a woman and produce in her the principles of generation; but on the other side, that it is impossible for a man to have any such intercourse with a goddess. It is however altogether irrational, to believe that any god or dæmon is capable of a sensual love for human bodily form or beauty. Plutarch’s Life of Numa.”—Hutchinson.

The scheme of Grecian mythology, replete as it is with intrigues between gods and women, goddesses and men, seems scarcely to admit the possibility of such congress being effected by those deities, in their proper persons. Homer tells us, that when Mars was knocked down by Minerva, “ἔρως δ’ ἔβριξε τριτάτην κούρην.” Iliad, book 21, v. 407.

dead at the sight of the Assembly's Catechism, Cotton's Milk for Babes, and some other good books, but could read in Oxford Jest, Popish and Quaker books, and the Common Prayer, without any difficulty. Is it possible the mind of man should be capable of such strong prejudices as that a suspicion of fraud should not immediately arise? But attachments to modes and forms in religion had such force that some of these circumstances seem rather to have confirmed the credit of the children. Sometimes they would be deaf, then dumb, then blind; and sometimes all these disorders together would come upon them. Their tongues would be drawn down their throats, then pulled out upon their chins. Their jaws, necks, shoulders, elbows and all their joints would appear to be dislocated, and they would make most piteous outcries of burnings, of being cut with knives, beat, &c. and the marks of wounds were afterwards to be seen. The ministers of Boston and Charlestown kept a day of fasting and prayer at the troubled house; after which the youngest child made no more complaints. The others persevered, and the magistrates then interposed, and the old woman was apprehended, but upon examination would neither confess nor deny, and appeared to be disordered in her senses. Upon the report of physicians that she was compos mentis, she was executed, declaring at her death the children should not be relieved. The eldest after this was taken into a minister's family, where, at first, she behaved orderly, but after some time, suddenly fell into her fits. The account of her affliction is in print; some things are mentioned as extraordinary, which tumblers are every day taught to perform; others seem more than natural, but it was a time of great credulity. The children returned to their ordinary behaviour, lived to adult age, made profession of religion, and the affliction they had been under they publicly declared to be one motive to it. One of them I knew many years after. She had the character of a very sober virtuous woman, and never made any acknowledgment of fraud in this transaction. The printed account was published with a preface by Mr. Baxter, who says, 'The evidence is so convincing, that he must be a very obdurate Sadducee who will not believe*.'

* "In the year 1720, at Littleton in the county of Middlesex, a family was supposed to be bewitched. One J. B. had three daughters, of 11, 9 and 5 years of age. The eldest was a forward girl, and having read and heard many strange stories, would surprise the company where she happened to be, with her manner of relating them. Pleased with the applause, she went from stories she had heard, to some of her own framing, and so on to dreams and visions, and attained the art of swooning and of being to all appearance for some time breath-

It obtained credit sufficient, together with other preparatives, to dispose the whole country to be easily imposed upon by the more extensive and more tragical scene, which was presently after acted at Salem and other parts of the county of Essex. Not less. Upon her revival, she would tell of strange things she had met with in this and other worlds. When she met with the words, God, Christ, the Holy Ghost, in the bible, she would drop down with scarce any signs of life in her. Strange noises were often heard in and upon the house; stones came down the chimney and did great mischief. She complained of the spectre of Mrs. D——y, a woman living in the town; and once the mother of the girl struck at the place where the said D——y was, and the girl said, 'You have struck her on the belly,' and upon enquiry it was found, that D——y complained of a hurt in her belly about that time. Another time the mother struck at a place, where the girl said there was a yellow bird, and she told her mother she had hit the side of it's head; and it again appeared that D——y's head was hurt about the same time. It was common to find her in ponds of water, crying out she should be drowned; sometimes upon the top of the house, and sometimes upon the tops of trees, where she pretended she had flown; and some fancied they had seen her in the air. There were often the marks of blows and pinches upon her, which were supposed to come from an invisible hand.

"The second daughter, after her sister had succeeded so well, imitated her in complaints of D——y, and out did her in feats of running upon the barn, climbing trees, &c. and, what was most surprising, the youngest attempted the same feats, and in some instances went beyond her sisters. The neighbours agreed they were under an evil hand, and it was pronounced a piece of witchcraft, as certain as that there ever had been any at Salem; and no great pains were taken to detect the imposture. Physicians had been at first employed, but to no purpose; and afterwards ministers were called to pray over them, but without success. At length D——y, not long after the supposed blows, took to her bed, and after some time died, and the two eldest girls ceased complaining; the youngest held out longer, but all persisted in it, that there had been no fraud. The eldest, not having been baptized, and being come to adult age, desired and obtained baptism, and the minister then examined her upon her conduct in the affair, and she persisted in her declarations of innocency. In 1728, having removed to Medford, she offered to join the church there, and gave a satisfactory account of herself to the minister of the town; but he knew nothing of the share she had in this transaction. The Lord's day before she was to be admitted, he happened to preach from this text, "He that speaketh lies shall not escape." The woman supposed the sermon to be intend-many years before, Glanvil published his Witch Stories in England; Perkins and other nonconformists were earlier; but the great authority was that of sir Matthew Hale, revered in New-England, not only for his knowledge in the law, but for his gravity and piety. The Trial of the Witches in Suffolk was published in 1684. All these books were in New-England, and the conformity between the behaviour of Goodwin's children and most of the supposed bewitched at Salem, and the behaviour of those in England, is so exact, as to leave no room to doubt the stories had been read by the New-England persons themselves, or had been told to them by others who had read them. Indeed, this conformity, instead of giving suspicion, was urged in confirmation of the truth of both; the Old England demons and the New being so much alike. The court justified themselves from books of law, and the authorities of Keble, Dalton and other lawyers, then of the first character, who lay down rules of conviction, as absurd and dangerous as any which were practised in New-England. The trial of Richard Hathaway the impostor, before Lord Chief Justice Holt, was ten or twelve years after. This was a great discouragement to prosecutions in England for witchcraft, but an effectual stop was not put to them, until the act of parliament in the reign of his late majesty.* Even this has not wholly cured the ed for her, and went to the minister, who told her nobody had made any objection against her; but being determined to confess her guilt she disclosed the fraud of herself and her sisters, and desired to make a public acknowledgment, in the face of the church; and accordingly did so. The two sisters, seeing her pitted, had become actors also with her, without being moved to it by her, but when she saw them follow her, they all joined in the secret and acted in concert. They had no particular spite against D——y; but it was necessary to accuse somebody, and the eldest having pitched upon her, the rest followed. The woman's complaints, about the same time the girl pretended she was struck, proceeded from other causes, which were not then properly enquired into. Once, at least, they were in great danger of being detected in their tricks; but the grounds of suspicion were overlooked, through the indulgence and credulity of their parents. M.S. of the Rev. Mr. Turell minister of Medford." Hutchinson.

* "I remember to have heard a gentleman, who in other respects was very sensible, express his surprize upon the first news of this act. The parliament, he said, had in effect declared that there were no evil spirits, he was afraid they would declare by another act that there are no good ones,

"From 1694 to 1701, there were 11 persons tried for witches before Lord Chief Justice Holt, all of whom were acquitted. In Scotcommon people, and we hear of old women ducked and cruelly murdered within these last twenty years. Reproach then, for hanging witches, although it has been often cast upon the people of New-England by those of Old, yet it must have been done with an ill grace. The people of New-England were of a grave cast, and had long been disposed to give a serious solemn construction even to common events in providence; but in Old-England, the reign of Charles the second was as remarkable for gaiety as any whatsoever, and for scepticism and infidelity, as any which preceded it.

"Sir William Phips, the governor, upon his arrival, fell in with the opinion prevailing. Mr. Stoughton, the lieutenant-governor, upon whose judgment great stress was laid, had taken up this notion, that although the devil might appear in the shape of a guilty person, yet he would never be permitted to assume the shape of an innocent person.* This opi-land 7 were executed for witches in 1697, upon the testimony of one girl about 11 years old." Hutchinson.

* "A gentleman of more than ordinary understanding, learning and experience, desired me to write to N. England about your trials and convictions of witches, not being satisfied with the evidence upon which some who have been executed were found guilty; he told me that in the time of the great reformation parliament, a certain person or persons had a commission to discover and prosecute witches. Upon these prosecutions many were executed, in at least one county in England, until, at length, a gentleman of estate and of great character for piety was accused, which put an end to the commission, and the judges upon a re-hearing, reversed many of the judgments; but many lives had been taken away. All that I speak with much wonder that any man, much less a man of such abilities, learning and experience as Mr. Stoughton, should take up a persuasion, that the devil cannot assume the likeness of an innocent, to afflict another person. In my opinion, it is a persuasion utterly destitute of any solid reason to render it so much as probable. and besides, contradictory to many instances of facts in history. If you think good, you may acquaint Mr. Stoughton and the other judges with what I write." Letter from London to Tho. Mather, Jan. 9, 1692-3.

"I suppose the Long Parliament must be intended by the great reformation parliament, for in 1644, 1645 and 1646, one Matthew Hopkins went from place to place to find out witches. Mr. Baxter says a great number were hanged by his discovery, and that Mr. Calamy went along with the judges to hear the confessions, and to see that there was no fraud or wrong done. Hopkins searched for teats, set some upon stools or tables cross-legged, and kept them 24 hours without meat or drink, within which time it was said their imps would come nion, at first, was generally received. Some of the most religious women who were accused, when they saw the appearance of distress and torture in their accusers, and heard their solemn declarations, that they saw the shapes or spectres of the accused afflicting them, persuaded themselves they were witches, and that the devil, some how or other, although they could not remember how or when, had taken possession of their evil hearts, and obtained some sort of assent to his afflicting in their shapes; and thereupon they thought they might be justified in confessing themselves guilty.

"It seems, at this day, with some people, perhaps but few, to be the question whether the accused or the afflicted were under a preternatural or diabolical possession, rather than whether the afflicted were under bodily distempers, or altogether guilty of fraud and imposture. As many of the original examinations have fallen into my hands, it may be of service to represent this affair in a more full and impartial light than it has yet appeared to the world.

"In February 1691-2, a daughter and a niece of Mr. Parris, the minister of Salem* village, girls of ten or eleven years of age, and two other girls in the neighbourhood, made the same sort of complaints as Goodwin's children had made, two or three years before. The physicians, having no other way of accounting for the disorder, pronounced them bewitched. An Indian woman, who was brought into the country from New Spain, and then lived with Mr. Parris, tried some experiments which she pretended to be used to, in her own country, in order to find out the witch. This coming to the children's and suck; others he tried by swimming them, and at length raised the indignation of certain gentlemen, who caused him to be seized, and his hands and feet being tied, to be thrown into the water, where fortunately for him he was proved to be a witch or wizard himself, by his swimming or floating upon the water. The country was cleared of him, and some lamented that the experiment had not been made sooner." Hutchinson.

* "Douglas in his Summary says, "In Salem and its neighbourhood, enthusiasm and other nervous disorders seem to be endemic; it was the seat of the New-England witchcraft, A. D. 1692." I question whether he had any other foundation for this remark than merely this scene of witchcraft, which must be considered as the distemper of the country in general, rather than of any particular town or county, and had Mr. Parris's family lived in any other part of the province, perhaps the neighbourhood would have been as much infected; and no impression ought to be made to the disadvantage of a town the most ancient, and at this day the second in rank within the province, and upon other accounts justly respectable." Hutchinson.

knowledge, they cried out upon the poor Indian, as appearing to them, pinching, and pricking and tormenting them; and fell into fits. Tituba, the Indian, acknowledged that she had learned how to find out a witch, but denied that she was one herself. Several private fasts were kept at the minister's house and several, more public, by the whole village, and then a general fast through the colony, to seek to God to rebuke Satan, &c. So much notice taken of the children, together with the pity and compassion, expressed by those who visited them, not only tended to confirm them in their design but to draw others into the like. Accordingly, the number of the complainants soon increased, and among them there were two or three women and some girls old enough for witnesses. These had their fits too, and, when in them, cried out, not only against Tituba, but against Sarah Osborn, a melancholy distracted old woman, and Sarah Good, another old woman who was bedrid. Tituba, at length, confessed herself a witch, and that the two old women were her confederates; and they were all committed to prison; and Tituba upon search, was found to have scars upon her back which were called the devil's mark, but might as well have been supposed those of her Spanish master. This commitment, was on the 1st of March. About three weeks after, two other women, of good characters and church members, Cory and Nurse were complained of and brought upon their examination; when these children fell into fits, and the mother of one of them, and wife of Thomas Putman, joined with the children and complained of Nurse as tormenting her; and made most terrible shrieks, to the amazement of all the neighbourhood. The old women denied every thing; but were sent to prison, and such was the infatuation, that a child of Sarah Good, about 4 or 5 years old, was committed also, being charged with biting some of the afflicted who shewed the print of small teeth on their arms. On April 3d Mr. Parris took for his text, 'Have not I chosen you 12, and one of you is a devil.' Sarah Cloyse, supposing it to be occasioned by Nurse's case who was her sister, went out of meeting. She was, presently after, complained of for a witch, examined and committed. Elizabeth Proctor was charged about the same time: her husband, as every good husband would have done, accompanied her to her examination, but it cost the poor man his life. Some of the afflicted cried out upon him also, and they were both committed to prison.

"Instead of suspecting and sifting the witnesses, and suffering them to be cross examined, the authority, to say no more, were imprudent in making use of leading questions, and thereby putting words into their mouths or suffering others to do it. Mr. Parris was over officious; most of the examinations, although in the presence of one or more of the magistrates, were taken by him. The following examinations, of several of the accused, may serve as specimens, they being generally made in the same manner.

“ At a court held at Salem 11th April 1692, by the honoured Thomas Danforth, deputy governor.—Q. John; * who hurt you? A. Goody Proctor first, and then Goody Cloyse.—Q. What did she do to you? A. She brought the book to me.—Q. John! tell the truth, who hurts you? Have you been hurt? A. The first, was a gentlewoman I saw.—Q. Who next? A. Goody Cloyse.—Q. But who hurt you next? A. Goody Proctor.—Q. What did she do to you? A. She choked me, and brought me the book.—Q. How oft did she come to torment you? A. A good many times, she and Goody Cloyse.—Q. Do they come to you in the night as well as the day? A. They come most in the day.—Q. Who? A. Goody Cloyse and Goody Proctor.—Q. Where did she take hold of you? A. Upon my throat, to stop my breath.—Q. Do you know Goody Cloyse and Goody Proctor? A. Yes, here is Goody Cloyse: (Cloyse) when did I hurt thee? A. A great many times. (Cloyse) Oh! you are a grievous liar.—Q. What did this Goody Cloyse do to you? A. She pinched and bit me till the blood came.—Q. How long since this woman came and hurt you? A. Yesterday, at meeting.—Q. At any time before? A. Yes a great many times.—Q. Mary Walcott! who hurts you? A. Goody Cloyse.—Q. What did she do to you? A. She hurt me.—Q. Did she bring the book? A. Yes.—Q. What was you do with it? A. To touch it, and be well.—Then she fell into a fit.—Q. Doth she come alone? A. Sometimes alone, and sometimes in company with Goody Nurse and Goody Corey, and a great many I do not know.—Then she fell into a fit again.—Q. Abigail Williams; did you see a company at Mr. Parris's house eat and drink? A. Yes, sir. That was their sacrament.—Q. How many were there? A. About forty, and Goody Cloyse and Goody Good were their deacons.—Q. What was it? A. They said it was our blood, and they had it twice that day.—Q. Mary Walcott! have you seen a white man? Yes sir, a great many times.—Q. What sort of man was he? A. A fine grave man, and when he came, he made all the witches to tremble.—Abigail Williams confirmed the same, and that they had such a sight at Deacon Ingersoll's.—Q. Who was at Deacon Ingersoll's then? A. Goody Cloyse, Goody Nurse, Goody Corey, and Goody Good.—Then Sarah Cloyse asked for water, and sat down as one seized with a dying fainting fit; and several of the afflicted fell into fits, and some or them cried out, Oh! her spirit is gone to prison to her sister Nurse.—Q. Elizabeth

Proctor! you understand whereof you are charged, viz. to be guilty of sundry acts of witchcraft; what say you to it? Speak the truth, and so you that are afflicted, you must speak the truth, as you will answer it before God another day. Mary Walcott! doth this woman hurt you? A. I never saw her so as to be hurt by her.—Q. Mary Lewis! does she hurt you?—her mouth was stopped.—Q. Ann Putman! does she hurt you?—She could not speak.—Q. Abigail Williams! does she hurt you?—Her hand was thrust in her own mouth.—Q. John! does she hurt you? A. This is the woman that came in her shift and choked me.—Q. Did she ever bring the book? A. Yes sir.—Q. What to do? A. To write.—Q. What this woman? A. Yes sir.—Q. Are you sure of it? A. Yes sir.—Again Abigail Williams and Ann Putman were spoke to by the court, but neither of them could make any answer, by reason of dumbness or other fits.—Q. What do you say Goody Proctor to these things? A. I take God in heaven to be my witness, that I know nothing of it, no more than the child unborn.—Q. Ann Putman! doth this woman hurt you? A. Yes sir, a great many times.—Then the accused looked upon them and they fell into fits.—She does not bring the book to you, does she? A. Yes sir, often, and saith she hath made her maid set her hand to it.—Q. Abigail Williams! does this woman hurt you? A. Yes sir, often.—Q. Does she bring the book to you? A. Yes.—Q. What would she have you to do with it? A. To write in it and I shall be well.—Did not you, said Abigail, tell me, that your maid had written? (Proctor) dear child, it is not so. There is another judgment, dear child.—Then Abigail and Ann had fits.—By and by they cried out, look you there is Goody Proctor upon the beam.—By and by, both of them cried out of Goodman Proctor himself and said he was a wizard.—Immediately, many, if not all of the bewitched, had grievous fits.—Q. Ann Putman! who hurt you? A. Goodman Proctor and his wife too.—Afterwards, some of the afflicted cried, there is Proctor going to take up Mrs. Pope's feet.—And her feet were immediately taken up.—Q. What do you say Goodman Proctor to these things? A. I know not. I am innocent.—Abigail Williams cried out, there is Goodman Proctor going to Mrs. Pope, and immediately, said Pope fell into a fit.—You see the devil will deceive you; the children could see what you was going to do before the woman was hurt. I would advise you to repentance, for the devil is bringing you out.—Abigail Williams cried out again, there is Goodman Proctor going to hurt Goody Bibber; and immediately Goody Bibber fell into a fit. There was the like of Mary Walcott, and divers others.—Benjamin Gould gave in his testimony, that he had seen Goodman Corey and his wife, Proctor and his wife, Goody Cloyse, Goody Nurse, and Goody Griggs in his chamber last Thursday night—Elizabeth Hubbard was in a trance during the whole examination.—During the examination of Elizabeth Proctor, Abigail Williams and Ann Putman, both made offer to strike at said Proctor, but when Abigail's hand came near it opened, whereas it was made up into a fist before, and came down exceeding lightly, as it drew near to said Proctor, and at length with open and extended fingers, touched Proctor's hood very lightly. Immediately Abigail cried out her fingers, her fingers, her fingers burned, and Ann Putman took on most grievously, of her head, and sunk down."

"Salem, April 11, 1692. Mr. Samuel Parris was desired by the honourable Thomas Danforth, deputy-governor, and the council, to take in writing the aforesaid Examinations, and accordingly took and delivered them in; and upon hearing the same, and seeing what was then seen, together with the charge of the afflicted persons, were by the advice of the council all committed by us,

"No wonder the whole country was in a consternation, when persons, of sober lives and unblemished characters, were committed to prison upon such sort of evidence. Nobody was safe. The most effectual way to prevent an accusation, was to become an accuser; and accordingly the number of the afflicted increased every day, and the number of the accused in proportion, who in general persisted in their innocency; but, being strongly urged to give glory to God by their confession, and intimation being given that this was the only way to save their lives, and their friends urging them to it, some were brought to own their guilt. The first confession upon the files, is of Deliverance Hobbs, May 11th, 1692, being in prison. She owned every thing she was required to do. The confessions multiplied the witches, new companions were always mentioned, who were immediately sent for and examined. Thus more than an hundred women, many of them of fair characters and of the most reputable families, in the town of Salem, Beverly, Andover, Billerica, &c. were apprehended, examined and, generally, committed to prison. The confessions being much of the same tenor, one or two may serve for specimens.

"The Examination and Confession (8 Sept. 92.) of Mary Osgood, wife of Captain Osgood of Andover, taken before John Hawthorne and other their majesties justices.

"She confesses, that about 11 years ago, when she was in a melancholy state and condition, she used to walk abroad in her orchard and upon a certain time, she saw the appearance of a cat, at the end of the house, which yet she thought was a real cat. However, at that time, it diverted her from praying to God, and instead thereof she prayed to the devil; about which time she made a covenant with the devil, who as a black man, came to her and presented her a book, upon which she laid her finger and that left a red spot: and that upon her signing, the devil told her he was her God, and that she should serve and worship him, and, she believes, she consented to it. She says further, that about two years ago, she was carried through the air, in company with deacon Frye's wife, Ebenezer Baker's wife and Goody Tyler, to Five-mile pond, where she was baptized by the devil, who dipped her face in the water and made her renounce her former baptism, and told her she must be his, soul and body for ever, and that she must serve him, which she promised to do. She says, the renouncing her first baptism was after her dipping, and that she was transported back again, through the air, in company with the forenamed persons, in the same manner as she went, and believes they were carried upon a pole.—Q. How many persons were upon the pole? A. As I said before, viz. Four persons and no more but whom she had named above.—She confesses she has afflicted three persons, John Sawdy, Martha Sprague and Rosa Foster, and that she did it by pinching her bed cloaths, and giving consent the devil should do it in her shape, and that the devil could not do it without her consent.—She confesses the afflicting persons in the court, by the glance of her eye. She says, as she was coming down to Salem to be examined, she and the rest of the company with her stopped at Mr. Phillips's to refresh themselves, and the afflicted persons, being behind them upon the road, came up just as she was mounting again and were then afflicted, and cried out upon her, so that she was forced to stay until they were all past, and said she only looked that way towards them.—Q. Do you know the devil can take the shape of an innocent person and afflict? A. I believe he cannot.—Q. Who taught you this way of witchcraft? A. Satan, and that he promised her abundance of satisfaction and quietness in her future state, but never performed any thing; and that she has lived more miserably and more discontented since, than ever before. She confesses farther, that she herself, in company with Goody Parker, Goody Tyler and Goody Dean, had a meeting at Moses Tyler's house, last Monday night, to afflict, and that she and Goody Dean carried the shape of Mr. Dean the minister, between them, to make persons believe that Mr. Dean afflicted.—Q. What hindered you from accomplishing what you intended? A. The Lord would not suffer it so to be, that the devil should afflict in an innocent person's shape.—Q. Have you been at any other witch meetings? A. I know nothing thereof, as I shall answer in the presence of God and his people: but said, that the black man stood before her, and told her, that what she had confessed was a lie; notwithstanding, she said that what she had confessed was true, and thereto put her hand. Her husband being present was asked, if he judged his wife to be any way discomposed. He answered, that having lived with her so long, he doth not judge her to be any ways discomposed, but has cause to believe what she has said is true. When Mistress Osgood was first called, she afflicted Martha Sprague and Rose Foster, by the glance of her eyes, and recovered them out of their fits by the touch of her hand. Mary Lacey and Betty Johnson and Hannah Post saw Mistress Osgood afflicting Sprague and Foster. The said Hannah Post and Mary Lacey and Betty Johnson, jun. and Rose Foster and Mary Richardson were afflicted by Mistress Osgood, in the time of their examination, and recovered by her touching of their hands.

"I underwritten, being appointed by authority, to take this examination, do testify upon oath, taken in court, that this is a true copy of the substance of it, to the best of my knowledge, 5 Jan. 1692-3. The within Mary Osgood was examined before their majesties justices of the peace in Salem.

(Attest.) JOHN HIGGINSON, Just. Pac."

"A miserable negro woman, charged by some of the girls with afflicting them, confessed, but was cunning enough to bring the greatest share of the guilt upon her mistress.

"Salem, Monday July 4, 1692. The Examination of Candy, a Negro Woman, before Bartholomew Gedney and John Hawthorne, Esqrs. Mr. Nicholas Noyes also present.

"Q. Candy! are you a witch? A. Candy no witch in her country. Candy's mother no witch. Candy no witch. Barbados. This country, mistress give Candy witch.—Q. Did your mistress make you a witch in this country? A. Yes, in this country mistress give Candy witch.—Q. What did your mistress do to make you a witch? A. Mistress bring book and pen and ink, make Candy write in it.—Q. What did you write in it?—She took a pen and ink and upon a book or paper made a mark.—Q. How did you afflict or hurt these folks, where are the puppets you did it with?—She asked to go out of the room and she would shew or tell; upon which she had liberty, one going with her, and she presently brought in two clouts, one with two knots tied in it, the other one; which being seen by Mary Warren, Deliverance Hobbs and Abigail Hobbs, they were greatly affrighted and fell into violent fits, and all of them said that the black man and Mrs. Hawkes and the negro stood by the puppets or rags and pinched them, and then they were afflicted, and when the knots were untied yet they continued as aforesaid. A bit of one of the rags being set on fire, the afflicted all said they were burned, and cried out dreadfully. The rags being put into water, two of the forenamed persons were in dreadful fits, almost choaked, and the other was violently running down to the river, but was stopped.

(Attest.) JOHN HAWTHORNE, Just. Peace."

Mrs. Hawkes, the mistress, had no other way to save her life but to confess also.

"Mr. Hale, the minister of Beverly, who has the character of an impartial relator, acknowledges that the confessors, generally, went off from their confessions; some saying they remembered nothing of what they had said, others that they had belied themselves, &c. but he thinks, if the times had been calm, the condition of the confessors might have called for a melius inquirendum; and thinks it remarkable that children and grandchildren should confirm their parents' and grandparents' confession, instancing in the case of Goody Foster, her daughter Mary Lacey, and grand-daughter Mary Lacey, jun. and that other children should accuse their own parents, as in the case of Richard Carrier, a lad of 13 years of age. These confessions are preserved, and a few extracts from them will shew they were forced from them, through fear of losing their lives if they refused, and their fear, in some, was so great as to disorder their brains, and they scarce knew what they said.

"21st July 1692. Before Major Gidney, Mr. Hawthorne, Mr. Corwin and Capt. Higginson.

"Q.—Goody Foster! you remember we have three times spoken with you, and do you now remember what you then confessed to us?—You have been engaged in very great wickedness, and some have been left to hardness of heart to deny; but it seems that God will give you more favour than others, inasmuch as you relent. But your daughter here hath confessed some things that you did not tell us of. Your daughter was with you and Goody Carrier, when you did ride upon the stick. A. I did not know it.—Q. How long have you known your daughter to be engaged? A. I cannot tell, nor have I any knowledge of it at all.—Q. Did you see your daughter at the meeting? A. No.—Q. Your daughter said she was at the witches meeting, and that you yourself stood at a distance off and did not partake at that meeting; and you said so also; give us a relation from the beginning until now. A. I know none of their names that were there, but only Goody Carrier.—Q. Would you know their faces if you saw them? A. I cannot tell.—Q. Were there not two companies in the field at the same time? A. I remember no more.—Mary Warren, one of the afflicted, said that Goody Carrier's shape told her, that Goody Foster had made her daughter a witch.—Q. Do not you acknowledge that you did so about 13 years ago? A. No, and I know no more of my daughter's being a witch than what day I shall die upon.—Q. Are you willing your daughter should make a full and free confession? A. Yes.—Q. Are you willing to do so too? A. Yes.—Q. You cannot expect peace of conscience without a free confession. A. If I knew any thing more, I would speak it to the utmost.—Goody Lacey, the daughter, called in, began thus; Oh! mother! how do you do? We have left Christ, and the devil hath got hold of us. How shall I get rid of this evil one? I desire God to break my rocky heart that I may get the victory this time.—Q. Goody Foster! you cannot get rid of this snare, your heart and mouth is not open. A. I did not see the devil, I was praying to the Lord.—Q. What Lord? A. To God.—Q. What God do witches pray to? A. I cannot tell, the Lord help me.—Q. Goody Lacey! had you no discourse with your mother when riding? A. No, I think I had not a word.—Q. Who'rid foremost on that stick to the village? A. I suppose my mother.—Goody Foster said, that Goody Carrier was foremost.—Q. Goody Lacey! how many years ago since they were baptized? A. Three or four years ago, I suppose.—Q. Who baptized them? A. The old serpent.—Q. How did he do it? A. He dipped their heads in the water, saying, they were his and that he had power over them.—Q. Where was this? A. At Fall's river.—Q. How many were baptized that day? A. Some of the chief; I think there were six baptized.—Q. Name them. A. I think they were of the higher powers.*—Mary Lacey, the grand daughter, was brought in, and Mary Warren fell into a violent fit.—Q. How dare you come in here, and bring the devil with you, to afflict these poor creatures? Lacey laid her hand on Warren's arm, and she recovered from her fit.—Q. You are here accused of practising witchcraft upon Goody Ballard, which way do you do it? A. I cannot tell. Where is my mother that made me a witch, and I knew it not?—Q. Can you look upon that maid Mary Warren, and not hurt her? Look upon her in a friendly way. She, trying so to do, struck her down with her eyes.—Q. Do you acknowledge now you are a witch? A. Yes.—Q. How long have you been a witch? A. Not above a week.—Q. Did the devil appear to you? A. Yes.—Q. In what shape? A. In the shape of a horse.—Q. What did he say to you? A. He bid me not to be afraid of any thing, and he would not bring me out, but he has proved a liar from the beginning.—Q. When was this? A. I know not; above a week.—Q. Did you set your hand to the book? A. No.—Q. Did he bid you worship him? A. Yes, he bid me also afflict persons.—You are now in the way to obtain mercy if you will confess and repent. She said, the Lord help me.—Q. Do not you desire to be saved by Christ? A. Yes.—Then you must confess freely what you know in this matter. She then proceeded. I was in bed and the devil came to me and bid me obey him and I should want for nothing, and he would not bring me out.—Q. But how long ago? A. A little more than a year.—Q. Was that the first time? A. Yes.—Q. How long was you gone from your father, when you ran away? A. Two days.—Q. Where had you your food? A. At Jolm Stone's.—Did the devil appear to you then, when you was abroad? A. No, but he put such thoughts in my mind as not to obey my parents.—2. Who did the devil bid you afflict? A. Timothy Swan. Richard Carrier comes often a nights and has me to afflict persons.—2. Where do ye go? A. To Goody Ballard's sometimes.—2. How many of you were there at a time? A. Richard Carrier and his mother, and my mother and grandmother.—Upon reading over the confession so far, Goody Lacey, the mother, owned this last particular. 2. How many more witches are there in Andover? A. I know no more, but Richard Carrier.

“Carrier, at first, denied all, but was followed until he was brought to accuse his mother, much in the same manner with Foster's daughter and grand-daughter.

“It is urged by the writers of that day, as a principal part of the evidence against Mr. Burroughs, the minister, that seven or eight of the confessors witnessed against him. It will appear from the examinations, that the confession was drawn from the examinants by the court.

“Q. Mary Lacey! was there not a man also among you at your meeting? A. None but the devil.—Q. What shape was the devil in then? A. He was a black man, and had a high crowned hat.—Q. Your mother and your grandmother say, there was a minister there. How many men did you see there? A. I saw none but Richard Carrier.—Q. Did you see none else? A. There was a minister there, and I think he is now in prison. 2. Were there not two* ministers there? A.

* “Mr. Deane, one of the ministers of Andover, then near fourscore, seems to have been in danger. He is tenderly touched in several of the examinations, which might be owing to a fair character, and he may be one of the persons accused, who caused a discouragement to further prosecutions. “Deliverance Deane being asked why she and the rest brought in Mr. Deane as afflicting persons, she answered, it was Satan's subtlety, for he told her he would put a sham upon all these things, and make people believe that he did afflict. She said Mrs. Osgood and she gave their consent the devil should bring Mr. Deane's shape to afflict. Being asked

‘It was time to stop.’ Hutchinson.

Cannot tell.—2. Was there not one Mr. Burroughs there? A. Yes."

"Carrier's Examination is in this manner; the questions are omitted. 'We met in a green which was the minister's pasture. We were in two companies at last: I think there was a few men with them. I heard Sarah Good talk of a minister or two. One of them was he that has been at the Eastward, his name is Burroughs, and is a little man. I remember not the other's name.'

"Margaret Jacobs had been brought to accuse herself, and then to charge Burroughs, the minister, and her own grandfather; but, struck with horror, chose to lose her own life, rather than persist in her confession; and begged forgiveness of Burroughs before his execution, who is said to have freely forgiven her; and recanted all she had said against her grandfather, but in vain as to his life. Her own life was saved by a disorder in her head, which prevented her trial at the first court; but before the next court, she made a formal recantation of all she had confessed, and delivered it to the judges.

"The humble Declaration of Margaret Jacobs unto the honoured Court now sitting at Salem, sheweth, "That whereas your poor and humble declarant being closely confined here in Salem gaol for the crime of witchcraft, which crime thanks be to the Lord I am altogether ignorant of, as will appear at the great day of judgment: May it please the honoured court, I was cried out upon by some of the possessed persons, as afflicting them; whereupon I was brought to my examination, which persons at the sight of me fell down, which did very much startle and affright me. The Lord above knows I knew nothing, in the least measure, how or who afflicted them; they told me, without doubt I did, or else they would not fall down at me; they told me, if I would not confess I should be put down into the dungeon and would be hanged, but if I would confess I should have my life the which did so affright me, with my own vile wicked heart, to save my life; made me make the like confession I did, which confession, may it please the honoured court, is altogether false and untrue. The very first night after I had made confession, I was in such horror of conscience that I could not sleep for fear the devil should carry me away for telling such horrid lies. I was, may it please the honoured court, sworn to my confession, as I understand since, but then, at that time, was ignorant of it, not knowing what an oath did mean. The Lord, I hope, in whom I trust, out of the abundance of his mercy, will forgive me my false forswearing myself. What I said, was altogether false again if Mrs. Osgood and she acted this business, she said yes." Mr. Deane was much beholden to this woman." Hutchinson.

against my grandfather, and Mr. Burroughs, which I did to save my life and to have my liberty; but the Lord, charging it to my conscience, made me in so much horror, that I could not contain myself before I had denied my confession, which I did though I saw nothing but death before me, chusing rather death with a quiet conscience; than to live in such horror, which I could not suffer. Where, upon my denying my confession, I was committed to close prison, where I have enjoyed more felicity in spirit, a thousand times, than I did before in my enlargement.

And now, may it please your honours, your declarant, having, in part given your honours a description of my condition, do leave it to your honours pious and judicious discretions, to take pity and compassion on my young and tender years, to act and do with me, as the Lord above and your honours shall see good, having no friend, but the Lord, to plead my cause for me; not being guilty in the least measure of the crime of witchcraft, nor any other sin that deserves death from man; and your poor and humble declarant shall for ever pray, as she is bound in duty, for your honours happiness in this life and eternal felicity in the world to come. So prays your honours declarant.

MARGARET JACOBS."

The Recantation of several persons in Andover will shew in what manner they were brought to their confessions:

"We whose names are under-written, inhabitants of Andover; when as that horrible and tremendous judgment beginning at Salem village in the year 1692, by some called Witchcraft, first breaking forth at Mr. Parris's house, several young persons, being seemingly afflicted, did accuse several persons for afflicting them, and many there believing it so to be, we being informed that, if a person was sick, the afflicted person could tell what or who was the cause of that sickness: Joseph Ballard, of Andover, his wife being sick at the same time, he either from himself or by the advice of others, fetched two of the persons, called the afflicted persons, from Salem village to Andover, which was the beginning of that dreadful calamity that befel us in Andover, believing the said accusations to be true, sent for the said persons to come together to the meeting house in Andover, the afflicted persons being there. After Mr. Barnard had been at prayer, we were blindfolded, and our hands were laid upon the afflicted persons, they being in their fits and falling into their fits at our coming into their presence, as they said; and some led us and laid our hands upon them, and then they said they were well, and that we were guilty of afflicting them: whereupon, we were all seized, as prisoners, by a warrant from the justice of the peace and forthwith carried to Salem. And, by reason of that sudden surprisal, we knowing ourselves altogether innocent of that crime, we were all exceedingly astonished and amazed, and consternated and affrighted even out of our reason; and our nearest and dearest relations, seeing us in that dreadful condition, and knowing our great danger, apprehended there was no other way to save our lives, as the case was then circumstanced, but by our confessing ourselves to be such and such persons as the afflicted represented us to be, they, out of tenderness and pity, persuaded us to confess what we did confess. And indeed that confession, that it is said we made, was no other than what was suggested to us by some gentlemen, they telling us that we were witches, and they knew it, and we knew it, which made us to think that it was so; and our understandings, our reason, our faculties, almost gone, we were not capable of judging of our condition; as also the hard measures they used with us rendered us incapable of making our defence, but said any thing and every thing which they desired, and most of what we said was but, in effect, a consenting to what they said. Some time after, when we were better composed, they telling us what we had confessed, we did profess that we were innocent and ignorant of such things; and we hearing that Samuel Wardwell had renounced his confession, and quickly after condemned and executed, some of us were told we were going after Wardwell.

“ The testimonial to these persons characters by the principal inhabitants of Andover will outweigh the credulity of the justices who committed them or of the grand jury which found bills against them.

“ To the honoured Court of Assize held at Salem. The humble Address of several of the Inhabitants of Andover.

“ May it please this honoured court,

“ We being very sensible of the great sufferings our neighbours have been long under in prison, and charitably judging that many of them are clear of that great transgression which hath been laid to their charge, have thought it our duty to endeavour their vindication so far as our testimony for them will avail. The persons in whose behalf we are desired and concerned to speak something at present are Mrs. Mary Osgood, Eunice Frye, Deliverance Dane, Sarah Wilton and Abigail Barker, who are women of whom we can truly give this character and commendation, that they have not only lived among us so inoffensively as not to give the least occasion to any that knew them to suspect them of witchcraft, but by their sober godly and exemplary conversation have obtained a good report in the place, where they have been well esteemed and approved in the church of which they are members.

“ We were surprized to hear that persons of known integrity and piety were accused of so horrid a crime, not considering, then, that the most innocent were liable to be so misrepresented and abused. When these women were accused by some afflicted persons of the neighbourhood, their relations and others, though they had so good grounds of charity that they should not have thought any evil of them yet, through a misrepresentation of the truth of that evidence that was so much credited and improved against people, took great pains to persuade them to own what they were, by the afflicted, charged with, and, indeed, did unreasonably urge them to confess themselves guilty, as some of us who were then present can testify. But these good women did very much assert their innocence, yet some of them said they were not without fear lest Satan had some way ensnared them, because there was that evidence against them which then was by many thought to be a certain indication and discovery of witchcraft, yet they seriously professed they knew nothing by themselves of that nature. Nevertheless, by the unwearied solicitations of those that privately discoursed them both at home and at Salem, they were at length persuaded publicly to own what they were charged with, and so submit to that guilt which we still hope and believe they are clear of. And, it is probable, the fear of what the event might be and the encouragement that, it is said, was suggested to them, that confessing was the only way to obtain favour, might be too powerful a temptation for timorous women to withstand, in the hurry and distraction that we have heard they were then in. Had what they said against themselves proceeded from conviction of the fact, we should have had nothing to have said for them, but we are induced to think that it did not, because they did soon privately retract what they had said, as we are informed, and, while they were in prison, they declared to such as they had confidence to speak freely and plainly to, that they were not guilty of what they had owned, and that what they had said against themselves was the greatest grief and burden they laboured under: now, though we cannot but judge it a thing very sinful for innocent persons to own a crime they are not guilty of, yet, considering the well ordered conversation of those women while they lived among us, and what they now seriously and constantly affirm in a more composed frame, we cannot but in clarity judge them innocent of the great transgression that hath been imputed to them. As for the rest of our neighbours, who are under the like circumstances with those that have been named, we can truly say of them that, while they lived among us, we have had no cause to judge them such persons as, of late, they have been represented and reported to be, nor do we know that any of their neighbours had any just grounds to suspect them of that evil that they are now charged with.

" Among the confessing witches I find Dorothy Falkener, a child of ten years, Abigail Falkener of eight, and Sarah Carrier between seven and eight.

" Sarah Carrier's Confession, Aug. 11th, 1696.

" It was asked Sarah Carrier by the magistrates or justices John Hawthorne esq. and others: How long hast thou been a witch? A. Ever since I was six years old.—Q. How old are you now? A. Near eight years old, brother Richard says I shall be eight years old in November next.—Q. Who made you a witch? A. My mother, she made me set my hand to a book.—Q. How did you set your hand to it? A. I touched it with my fingers and the book was red, the paper of it was white. She said she never had seen the black man; the place where she did it was in Andrew Foster's pasture and Elizabeth Johnson, jun. was there. Being asked who was there beside, she answered her aunt Toothaker and her cousin. Being asked when it was, she said, when she was baptized.—Q. What did they promise to give you? A. A black dog.—Q. Did the dog ever come to you? A. No.—Q. But you said you saw a cat once. What did that say to you? A. It said it would tear me in pieces if I would not set my hand to the book. She said her mother baptized her and the devil or black man was not there as she saw, and her mother said when she baptized her, Thou art mine for ever and ever and amen.—Q. How did you afflict folks? A. I pinched them, and she said she had no puppets, but she went to them that she afflicted. Being asked whether she went in her body or her spirit, she said in her spirit. She said her mother carried her thither to afflict.—Q. How did your mother carry you when she was in prison? A. She came like a black cat.—Q. How did you know that it was your mother? A. The cat told me so that she was my mother. She said she afflicted Phelps's child last Saturday, and Elizabeth Johnson joined with her to do it. She had a wooden spear, about as long as her finger, of Elizabeth Johnson, and she had it of the devil. She would not own that she had ever been at the witch meeting at the village. This is the substance, (Attest.) SIMON WILLARD."

" This poor child's mother then lay under sentence of death, the mother of the other two children was in prison, and soon after tried and condemned, but upon her confession reprieved and finally pardoned.

" I meet with but one person in near an hundred whose examinations are upon file, that was dismissed after having been once charged, for which he might thank one of the girls who would not agree with the rest of the accusation.

" The Examination of Nehemiah Abbot, at a court at Salem village, by John Hawthorne and Jonathan Corwin Esqrs. 23d April 1692.

" What say you, are you guilty of witchcraft, of which you are suspected, or not? No sir, I say before God, before whom I stand, that I know nothing of witchcraft. Who is this man? Ann Putman named him.—Mary Walcot said she had seen his shape. What do you say to this? I never did hurt them. Who hurt you Ann Putman? That man. I never hurt her. Ann Putman said, he is upon the beam. Just such a discovery of the person carried out, and she confessed; and if you would find mercy of God, you must confess.—If I should confess this, I must confess what is false. Tell how far have you gone, who hurts you? I do not know, I am absolutely free. As you say, God knows. If you will confess the truth, we desire nothing else that you may not hide your guilt, if you are guilty, and therefore confess if so. I speak before God that I am clear from this accusation. What, in all respects? Yes in all respects. Doth this man hurt you? Their mouths were stopped. You hear several accuse you, though one cannot open her mouth. I am altogether free. Charge him not unless it be he. This is the man say some, and some say he is very like him. How did you know his name? He did not tell me himself, but other witches told me. Ann Putman said, it is the same man, and then she was taken with a fit. Mary Walcot, is this the man? He is like him, I cannot say it is he. Mercy Lewis said it is not the man. They all agreed, the man had a bunch on his eyes.

Ann Patman, in a fit, said, be you the man? ay, do you say you be the man? did you put a mist before my eyes? Then he was sent forth till several others were examined. When he was brought in again, by reason of much people and many in the windows so that the accusers could not have a clear view of him, he was ordered to be abroad and the accusers to go forth to him and view him in the light, which they did, and in the presence of the magistrates and many others discoursed quietly with him, one and all acquitting him, but yet said he was like that man, but he had not the wen they saw in his apparition. Note, he was a hilly-faced man, and stood shaded by reason of his own hair, so that for a time he seemed to some bystanders and observers, to be considerably like the person the afflicted did describe.

“Mr. Samuel Parris, being desired to take in writing the examination of Nehemiah Abbot, hath delivered it as aforesaid, and upon hearing the same did see cause to dismiss him.

JOHN HAWTHORNE, } Assistants.”
JONA. CORWIN, }

“We see, from the preceding examinations and confessions, the method of proceeding preparatory to the trial of the accused persons.

“For three or four months, the afflicted generally confined themselves to their own neighbourhood, in their accusations. In the examinations there is, sometimes, mention made of strangers, whose shapes or spectres were unknown to the afflicted. The first accused, in any other county, was Mrs. Cary; wife of Mr. Nathaniel Cary, a principal inhabitant of the town of Charlestown. He, as soon as he heard of it, carried his wife to Salem village, supposing she would not be known to the afflicted. They happened to arrive, just as the justices were going into the meeting house, where they held their court, to examine prisoners. All the prisoners which were brought in, were accused, and the girls fell into fits as usual; but Mrs. Cary came in and sat without any notice, except that one or two of the afflicted came to her and asked her name. After the examination, her husband went to the tavern, intending there to discourse with one of the girls, who he heard had accused his wife. John, the Indian who pretended to be one of the afflicted, was a servant in the house. Two of the girls were soon brought in, and instead of giving any opportunity of discoursing with them, they tumbled about the floor, crying out Cary, Cary, and a warrant came to apprehend her; the Indian joining with the two girls in the charge. No bail could be admitted, nor was it to any purpose to make any defence, and she was ordered to the prison in Boston; but, upon the request of her husband was removed to Cambridge gaol, where she was kept in irons. Afterwards when the trials came on at Salem, her husband went there to see how they were managed, and he thought the only chance his wife had for her life, was by an escape, which, by some means or other, he effected, and fled with her to New York, where governor Fletcher entertained them very courteously.—They petitioned, I suppose before the escape, that she might be tried in the county where she lived. If the Court thought they were held to try the fact in the county where it was committed, there seems to have been room for an argument, her body being in Middlesex at the same time that her spectre and the body of the afflicted persons were in Essex.

“Mrs. Cary was committed about the middle of May. Towards the end of the month, Capt. John Alden of Boston was accused, who was thereupon sent down to Salem. He had been many years commander of a sloop in the colony service, employed for supplying the forts east with provisions and stores; and although, upon his first appearing, the justices allowed that he always had the character of an honest man, yet one of them, Gidney, soon after, let him know he then saw reason to think otherwise of him. Alden, in his account, says that the accuser first pointed to another man and said nothing, but that the man who held her stooped down to her ear and then she cried out Alden, Alden. All were ordered into the street and a ring made, and then she cried out, There stands Alden a bold fellow with his hat on, sells powder and shot to the Indians, lies with the squaws and has paposes, &c. He was immediately taken into custody of the marshal, and required to deliver up his sword. A further examination was had in the meeting house, and his hands were held open by the officer, that he might not pinch the afflicted, who were struck down at the sight of him, and made their usual cries; all which, the justices deemed sufficient grounds for committing him to gaol, where he lay 15 weeks, and then he was prevailed on by his friends to make his escape, and to absent himself until the consternation should abate and the people recover the use of their reason.

“Although the number of prisoners had been increasing from February until the beginning of June, yet there had been no trials. The charter was expected from day to day, and the new constitution of government to take place. Soon after it's arrival, commissioners of oyer and terminer were appointed for the trial of witchcrafts. By the charter, the general assembly are to constitute courts of justice, and the governor with the advice of council is to nominate and appoint judges, commissioners of oyer and terminer, &c. but whether the governor, with advice of council can constitute a court of oyer and terminer, without authority for that purpose derived from the general assembly, has been made a question; however, this, the most important court to the life of the subject which ever was held in the province, was constituted in no other manner. It was opened at Salem, the first week in June. Only one of the accused, Bridget Bishop, alias Oliver, was then brought to trial. She had been charged with witchcraft twenty years before. The accuser, upon his death bed, confessed his own guilt in the accusation; but an old woman, once charged with being a witch, is never afterwards wholly free from the accusation, and she being, besides, of a fractious temper, all the losses the neighbours met with in their cattle and poultry, and accidents in oversetting their carts, &c. were attributed to her spite against them, and now suffered to be testified against her. This evidence, together with the testimony of the afflicted, and of the confessors, what they had heard from the spectres and seen of her spectre, and an excrescence, called a teat, found upon her body, were deemed by court and jury plenary proof, and she was convicted, and on the 10th of June executed. The further trials were put off to the adjournment, the 30th of June. The governor and council thought proper, in the mean time, to take the opinion of several of the principal ministers upon the state of things as they then stood. This was an old charter practice. They gave their opinion as follows.*

The Return of several Ministers, consulted by his Excellency and the Hon. Council upon the present Witchcraft in Salem village.

Boston, June 15th, 1692.

- " 1. The afflicted state of our poor neighbours that are now suffering by molestations from the invisible world, we apprehend so deplorable, that we think their condition calls for the utmost help of all persons in their several capacities.
- " 2. We cannot but, with all thankfulness, acknowledge the success which the merciful God has given to the sedulous and assiduous endeavours of our honourable rulers to defeat the abominable witchcrafts which have been committed in the country, humbly praying, that the discovery of those mysterious and mischievous wickednesses may be perfected.
- " 3. We judge that in the prosecution of these and all such witchcrafts, there is need of a very critical and exquisite caution, lest by too much credulity for things received only upon the devil's authority, there be a door opened for a long train of miserable consequences, and Satan get an advantage over us; for we should not be ignorant of his devices.
- " 4. As, in complaints upon witchcrafts, there may be matters of enquiry which do not amount unto matters of presumption, and there may be matters of presumption which yet may not be matters of conviction, so it is necessary, that all proceedings, thereabout, be managed with an exceeding tenderness towards those that may be complained of, especially if they have been persons formerly of an unblemished reputation.

- " 5. When the first enquiry is made into the circumstances of such as may lie under the just suspicion of witchcrafts, we could wish that there may be admitted as little as possible of such noise, company and openness, as may too hastily expose them that are examined, and that there may be nothing used as a test for the trial of the suspected, the lawfulness whereof may be doubted by the people of God; but that the directions given by such judicious writers, as Perkins and Bernard, may be observed.
- " 6. Presumptions whereupon persons may be committed, and, much more, convictions whereupon persons may be condemned, as guilty of witchcrafts, ought certainly to be more considerable than barely the accused person's being represented by a spectre unto the afflicted; inasmuch as it is an undoubted and a notorious thing, that a demon may, by God's permission, appear, even to ill purposes, in the shape of an innocent, yea and a virtuous man. Nor can we esteem alterations made in the sufferers, by a look or touch of the accused, to be an infallible evidence of guilt, but frequently liable to be abused by the devil's lger-demean.
- " 7. We know not whether some remarkable affronts given the devils, by our disbelieving those testimonies whose whole force and strength is from them alone, may not put a period unto the progress of the dreadful calamity begun upon us, in the accusation of so many persons, whereof some, we hope, are yet clear from the great transgression laid to their charge.
- " 8. Nevertheless, we cannot but humbly recommend, unto the government, the speedy and vigorous prosecutions, of such as have rendered themselves obnoxious, according to the directions given in the laws of God and the wholesome statutes of the English nation for the detection of witchcrafts".
- " The judges seem to have paid more regard to the last article of this Return, than to several which precede it; for the prosecutions were carried on with all possible vigour and without that exquisite caution which is proposed.
- " At the first trial, there was no colony or provincial law against witchcraft in force. The statute of James the first must therefore have been considered as in force in the province, witchcraft not being an offence at common law. Before the adjournment, the old colony law, which makes witchcraft a capital offence, was revived, with the other local laws, as they were called, and made a law of the province.

* I fancy this must be what Douglas had heard something of and calls by mistake "the address of many of the very popular but very weak ministers or clergy to sir W. P. a very weak governor, with thanks for what was already done, and exhorting him to proceed." Hutch.

"At the adjournment, June 30, five women were brought upon trial, Sarah Good, Rebekah Nurse, Susannah Martin, Elizabeth How, and Sarah Wilder.

"There was no difficulty with any but Nurse. She was a member of the church and of a good character, and, as to her, the jury brought in their verdict not guilty; upon which the accusers made a great clamour, and the court expressed their dissatisfaction with the verdict, which caused some of the jury to desire to go out again; and then they brought her in guilty. This was a hard case, and can scarcely be said to be the execution of law and justice in mercy*. In a capital case, the court often refuses a verdict of, guilty, but, rarely, if ever, sends a jury out again, upon one of, not guilty. It does not indeed appear, that in this case the jury was ordered out again; but the dissatisfaction expressed by the court seems to have been in such a manner as to have the same effect. The certificate given by the foreman of the jury, to satisfy the relations of the woman, shews how the fact was.

July 4th, 1692.

"I Thomas Fisk, the subscriber hereof, being one of them that were of the jury last week at Salem court, upon the trial of Rebekah Nurse, &c. being desired, by some of the relations, to give a reason why the jury brought her in guilty, after the verdict not guilty; I do hereby give my reasons to be as follows,

"When the verdict not guilty was given, the honoured court was pleased to object against it, saying to them, that they think they let slip the words which the prisoner at the bar spake against herself, which were spoken in reply to Goodwife Hobbs and her daughter, who had been faulty in setting their hands to the devil's book, as they had confessed formerly; the words were 'What! do these persons give in evidence against me now? they used to come among us.' After the honoured court had manifested their dissatisfaction of the verdict, several of the jury declared themselves desirous to go out again, and thereupon the honoured court gave leave; but when we came to consider the case, I could not tell how to take her words as an evidence against her, till she had any further opportunity to put her sense upon them, if she would take it; and then going into court, I mentioned the words aforesaid, which by one of the court were affirmed to have been spoken by her, she being then at the bar, but made no reply nor interpretation of them; whereupon, these words were to me a principal evidence against her.

'THOMAS FISK.'

* A part of the oath the king takes at his coronation, "which judges should have written on their hearts." Foster's Crown Law.

"Nurse, being informed of the use which had been made of her words, gave in a declaration to the court, that "when she said Hobbs and her daughter were of her company, she meant no more than that they were prisoners as well as herself; and that, being hard of hearing, she did not know what the foreman of the jury said;" but her declaration had no effect.

"Mr. Noyes, the minister of Salem, a zealous prosecutor, excommunicated the poor old woman and delivered her to Satan, to whom he supposed she had formally given herself up many years before; but her life and conversation had been such, that the remembrance thereof, in a short time after, wiped off all the reproach occasioned by the civil or ecclesiastical sentence against her.

"It is said, that at the trial of Sarah Good, one of the afflicted persons fell into a fit, and after recovery, cried out, 'that the prisoner had stabbed her and broke her knife in doing it;' and a piece of the knife was found upon the afflicted person; but a young man declared that the day before, he broke that very knife and threw away the piece, this afflicted person being then present. The court took so much notice as to bid her tell no more lies, but went on to improve her as a witness against other prisoners*. Something happened, not unlike to this, in a trial before sir Matthew Hale. The afflicted children, in their fits would shriek out upon the least touch from Rose Cullender, one of the witches, but remained quite insensible when any body else touched them. Lest there should be any fraud, lord Cornwallis, sir Edmund Bacon, serjeant Keeling and other gentlemen attended one of the girls, whilst she was in her fits, at another part of the hall, and one of the witches was brought, and an apron was put before the girl's eyes; but instead of the witch's hand, another person's hand was taken to touch the girl, who thereupon shrieked out as she used to do. The gentlemen returned and declared to the court they believed the whole was an imposture. Notwithstanding this, the witch was found guilty, and the judge and all the court were fully satisfied with the verdict, and awarded sentence accordingly.

"Susannah Martin had been suspected ever since 1669, so that many witch stories were reported of her and given in evidence against her. One of these women, being told at her execution by the minister Mr. Noyes, that he knew she was a witch, and therefore advised her to confess, she replied, that he lied, and that she was no more a witch than he was a wizard; and if he took away her life God would give him blood to drink*.

* "This story is related by Calef, who, by his narrative, gave great offence, having censured the proceedings, at a time when in general the country did not see the error they had been in; but in his account of facts which can be evidenced by records, and other original writings, he appears to have been a fair relator." Hutch.

"At the trial of another of them, it is said, that, one of the afflicted cried out in court upon Mr. Willard, a minister of Boston, and that she was immediately sent out of court; and it was given out that she was mistaken in the person.† There was one Willard then in prison for witchcraft.

"At the next adjournment, Aug. 5th, George Burroughs, John Procter and Elizabeth his wife, John Willard, George Jacobs and Martha Carrier were all brought upon trial and condemned, and all executed upon the 19th of August, except Elizabeth Procter, who escaped by pleading her belly.

"Burroughs had been a preacher,‡ several years before this, at Salem village, where there had been some misunderstanding between him and the people. Afterwards he became a preacher at Wells in the province of Main. We will be a little more particular in our account of his trial.¶ The indictment was as follows:

"Anno Regis et Reginae, &c. quarto.

"Essex ss. The Jurors for our sovereign lord and lady the king and queen, present,

* "Calef.—They have a tradition among the people of Salem that a peculiar circumstance attended the death of this gentleman, he having been choaked with blood, which makes them suppose her, if not a witch, a Pythonissa, at least, in this instance." Hutchinson.

† Calef.

‡ "The confessing witches were examined concerning him.—Richard Carrier affirmed to the jury that he saw Mr. George Burroughs at the witch meeting at the village, and saw him administer the sacrament. Mary Lacey, sen. and her daughter Mary affirmed that Mr. George Burroughs was at the witch meetings and witch sacraments, and that she knows Mr. Burroughs to be of the company of witches. Aug. 3, 1692." Hutchinson.

¶ "Among the sufferers discovered in England by Matthew Hopkins in 1645, there was one Mr. Lewis, whom Mr. Baxter calls an old reading parson, and says that he confessed he had two inns, and that he sent one to sink a ship which he saw on the coast, and that afterwards he saw the ship sink. Dr. Hutchinson, in his observations upon the Suffolk witches, says, Mr. Lewis was an ancient clergyman, near fourscore, who read queen Elizabeth's homilies instead of sermons, but being what was then called a malignant parson, he was more easily convicted; that upon his trial he asserted his innocency, and at his execution read the service for burial himself; that the confession Mr. Baxter mentions was from the evidence of persons at his trial, and as Hopkins had swam him several times till he was near drowning, such confession, or any other, was not matter of great wonder." Hutchinson.

that George Burroughs, late of Falmouth in the province of Massachusetts-bay, clerk, the 9th day of May, in the 4th year of the reign of our sovereign lord and lady William and Mary, by the grace of God of England, Scotland, France and Ireland, king and queen, defenders of the faith, &c. and divers other days and times, as well before as after, certain detestable arts called witchcrafts and sorceries, wickedly and feloniously hath used, practised and exercised, at and within the town of Salem, in the county of Essex aforesaid, in upon and against one Mary Walcott of Salem village, in the county of Essex, single woman; by which said wicked arts, the said Mary Walcott, the 9th day of May, in the 4th year above said, and divers other days and times, as well before as after, was and is tortured, afflicted, pined, consumed, wasted and tormented, against the peace of our sovereign lord and lady the king and queen, and against the form of the statute in that case made and provided. Endorsed Billa vera." Three other bills were found against him for witchcrafts upon other persons, to all which he pleaded Not Guilty, and put himself upon trial, &c.

"The afflicted persons, and the confessing witches were first examined; for although, by the advice of the elders, their evidence was not conclusive, yet some presumption arose from it, and with other circumstances to corroborate it, the proof might be sufficient to convict. One circumstance was, that, being a little man, he had performed feats beyond the strength of a giant, viz. had held out a gun of 7 feet barrel with one hand, and had carried a barrel full of cyder from a canoe to the shore. Upon his urging, that an Indian, who was present, held out the gun also, and the witnesses not remembering that any Indian was there, it was said the Indian must have been the black man or the devil, who the witnesses swore looks like an Indian. Other evidence was given of his harsh treatment of his wives, having been twice married, and of his pretending to them that he knew what had been said to them in his absence, and his persuading them to give it under their hands in writing, and to swear to it, that they would not reveal his secrets; and it was further said they had privately complained to the neighbours that their house was haunted with spirits: And a brother of one of his wives swore, that going out after strawberries, upon their return, he went into the bushes on foot, and though they rode a quick pace, yet when they came near home, to their astonishment, they found him with them, and that he fell to chiding his wife for talking to her brother about him, and said he knew their thoughts, which, the brother said was more than the devil knew; to which Burroughs replied, that his God told him. Against this evidence he urged, that a man was with him, to shew that another walked as fast as he did; and this was immediately determined to be the black man also. And, upon the whole, he was confounded and used many twistings and turnings, which I think we cannot wonder at. At his execution, he concluded his dying prayer with the Lord's prayer; probably to convince some of the spectators of his innocence, for it was the received opinion, that a true witch could not say the Lord's prayer without blundering,* and in many of the examinations it was used as a test, and several of the old women not saying it right, this was improved against them.

* Sept. the 9th, Martha Cory,* Mary Esty,* Alice Parker,* Anu Pudenter,* Dorcas Hoar, and Mary Bradbury were tried, and September 17th, Margaret Scott,* Wilmot Read,* Samuel Wardwell* Mary Parker,* Abigail Falkner, Rebecca Eames, Mary Lacey, Ann Foster and Abigail Hobbs, and all received sentence of death. Those marked* were executed the 22d following.

* Mary Esty, who was sister to Nurse, gave in to the court a petition; in which she says, she does not ask her own life, although she is conscious of her innocence, but prays them before they condemn any more, to examine the confessing witches more strictly; for she is sure they have belied themselves and others, which will appear in the world to which she is going, if it should not in this world.

* Those who were condemned and not executed, I suppose all confessed their guilt. I have seen the confessions of several of them. Wardwell also confessed, but he recanted and suffered. His own wife, as well as his daughter,† accused him and saved themselves. There are many instances among the examinations, of children accusing their parents, and some of parents accusing their children. This is the only instance of a wife or husband, accusing one the other, and surely this instance ought not to have been suffered. I shudder while I am relating it. Besides this irregularity, there were others in the course of these trials. The facts laid in the indictments were, witchcrafts upon particular persons, there was no evidence of these facts, but what was called spectral evidence, which, in the opinion of the ministers, was insufficient; some of the other evidence was of facts ten or twenty years before, which had no relation to those with which they were charged; and some of them no relation to the crime of witchcraft. Evidence is not admitted, even against the general character of persons upon trial, unless to encounter other evidence brought in favour of it; much less ought their whole lives to be arraigned, without giving time sufficient for defence.*

* Giles Cory was the only person, besides those already named, who suffered. He, seeing the fate of all who had put themselves upon trial, refused to plead; but the judges, who had not been careful enough in observing the law in favour of the prisoners, determined to do it against this unhappy man, and he had judgment of peine fort et dure for standing mute, and was pressed to death; the only instance which ever was, either before this time or since, in New-England. In all ages of the world, superstitious credulity has produced greater cruelty than is practised among the Hottentots, or other nations, whose belief of a deity is called in question.

* This court of oyer and terminer, happy for the country, sat no more. Nineteen persons had been executed, all asserting their innocence; but this was not enough to open the eyes of the people in general. The gaol at Salem was filled with prisoners, and many had been removed to other gaols; some were admitted to bail, all reserved for trial, a law having passed constituting a supreme standing court, with jurisdiction in capital, as well as all other criminal cases. The general court also shewed their zeal against witchcraft, by a law passed in the words of the statute of James the first, but this law was disallowed by the king. If the court was of opinion that the statute extended here, I see no necessity of a provincial act exactly in the same words; if the statute did not extend here, I know not by what law the first that was tried could be sentenced to death.

* The time, by law, for holding the court at Salem, was not until January. This gave opportunity for consideration; and this alone might have been sufficient for a change of opinions and measures, but another reason has been given for it. Ordinarily, persons of the lowest rank in life have had the misfortune to be charged with witchcrafts; and although many such had suffered, yet there remained in prison a number of women, of as reputable families as any in the towns where they lived, and several persons, of still superior rank, were hinted at by the pretended bewitched, or by the confessing witches. Some had been publicly named. Dudley Bradstreet, a justice of peace, who had been appointed one

* "She was bid to say the Lord's prayer. When she came to 'forgive us our trespasses as we forgive them that trespass against us,' she said, so do I. No other mistake, in saying the prayer, remarkable." A woman's examination Sept. 21, 1692. Hutchinson.

† "The daughter upon a second enquiry denied that she knew her father and mother to be witches; the wife was not asked a second time." Hutchinson.

* "Against many of the women there was likewise given in evidence the return of a jury of one man, a doctor, and eight women appointed to examine their bodies for tetts and other devil's marks. The search was curious enough, but the return is too indelicate to appear in this relation. Some said the credulity was such that a flea bite would pass well enough for a tett or the devil's mark." Hutchinson.

of president Dudley's council, and who was son to the worthy old governor, then living, found it necessary to abscond. Having been remiss in prosecuting, he had been charged by some of the afflicted as a confederate. His brother, John Bradstreet, was forced to fly also. Calef says it was intimated that sir William Phips's lady was among the accused. It is certain, that one who pretended to be bewitched at Boston, where the infection was beginning to spread, charged the secretary of the colony of Connecticut.* Mrs. Hale, wife to the minister of Beverly, was accused also; which caused her husband to alter his judgment and to be less active in prosecutions than he had been.

“At the court in January, the grand jury found bills against about 50 for witchcraft, one or two men, the rest women; but, upon trial, they were all acquitted, except three of the worst characters, and those the governor reprimed for the king's mercy. All that were not brought upon trial he ordered to be discharged.† Such a gaol delivery was made this court, as has never been known at any other time in New-England.

“Several persons had been charged and imprisoned in the county of Middlesex also, and at the first court at Charlestown they were brought to trial, but the jury acquitted them all. Some of the court were dissatisfied. The juries changed sooner than the judges. However, it was not long before one, at least, of the judges of the first court of Oyer and Terminer was sensible of his error. Mr. Sewall, at a public fast, gave in to the minister a bill, acknowledging his error in the late proceedings, and desiring to humble himself in the sight of God and his people. It is said, that, the chief justice, Mr. Stoughton, being informed of this action of one of his brethren, observed for himself that, when he sat in judgment, he had the fear of God before his eyes and gave his opinion according to the best of his understanding; and although it might appear afterwards, that he had been in an error, yet he saw no necessity of a public acknowledgment of it.

“One of the ministers, who, in the time of it, was fully convinced that the complaining persons were no impostures, and who vindicated his own conduct and that of the court, in a narrative he published, remarks, not long after, in his diary, that many were of opinion that innocent blood had been shed. None of the pretended afflicted were ever brought upon trial for their fraud, some of them proved profligate persons, abandoned to all vice, others passed their days in obscurity or contempt.

“The opinion which prevailed in New-England, for many years after this tragedy, that there was something præternatural in it, and that it was not all the effect of fraud and imposture, proceeded from the reluctance in human nature to reject errors once imbibed. As the principal actors went off the stage, this opinion has gradually lessened, and perhaps it is owing to a respect to the memory of their immediate ancestors, that many do not yet seem to be fully convinced. There are a great number of persons who are willing to suppose the accusers to have been under bodily disorders which affected their imaginations. This is kind and charitable, but seems to be winking the truth out of sight. A little attention must force conviction that the whole was a scene of fraud and imposture, began by young girls, who at first perhaps thought of nothing more than being pitied and indulged, and continued by adult persons, who were afraid of being accused themselves. The one and the other, rather than confess their fraud, suffered the lives of so many innocents to be taken away, through the credulity of judges and juries.”*

* “As to what you mention, concerning that poor creature in your town that is afflicted, and mentioned my name to yourself and son, I return you hearty thanks for your intimation about it, and for your charity therein mentioned, and I have great cause to bless God, who, of his mercy hitherto, hath not left me to fall into such an horrid evil.” Extract of a letter from Secretary Allen to Inc. Mather, Hartford, 18 March, 92-3.

† It is said, the governor's lady, when sir William was absent, saved one poor woman from trial. “In sir William's absence, his lady, I suppose upon account of her name's being Mary, (William and Mary) was solicited for a favour in behalf of a woman committed by one of the judges, on accusation of witchcraft, by a formal warrant under his hand and seal, and in close prison for trial the next assizes, then not far off. The good lady, propria virtute, granted and signed a warrant for the said woman's discharge, which was obeyed by the keeper, and the woman lives still for aught I know. Truly, I did not believe this story till I saw a copy of the mittimus and discharge, under the keeper's hand, attested a true copy, for which discovery the keeper was discharged from his trust and put out of his employment, as he himself told me.” M.S. letter.

The following Reports are from lord Fountainhall's Decisions, &c. :

“Criminal Court. Sept. 10, and 11, 1678.

“Eight or ten witches, all (except one or two)

* “The general court, about 20 years after, upon the petitions of the relations of those who had been executed, and of several persons who had been charged and fled, and whose goods had been seized, made grants for and in consideration of the losses sustained; but the petitioners alledged, that they bore no proportion to the real damage. Philip English, a merchant in Salem, received 300*l*.—He computed his damages at 1500*l*.—Enquiry was made by a committee, and they professed to report such sums as each petitioner had suffered.” Hutch.

poor miserable like women were pannelled, some of them were brought out of sir Robert Hepburn of Keith's lands, others out of Ormiston, Crichton, and Pancaitland parishes. The first of them were delayed by these two who were burnt in Salt-preston in May 1678, and they divulged and named the rest, as also put forth seven in the Louthead of Leswade; and if they had been permitted were ready to file, by their delation, sundry gentlewomen and others of fashion; but the justices discharged them, thinking it either the product of malice, or melancholy, or the devil's deception, in representing such persons as present at their field-meetings who truly were not there. Yet this was cried out on as a prelimiting theirs from discovering these enemies of mankind. However, they were permitted to name Mr. Gideon Penman, who had been minister at Crichton, and for sundry acts of uncleanness and other crimes was deprived. Two or three of the witches constantly affirmed that he was present at their meetings with the devil; and that when the devil called for him, he asked, where is Mr. Gideon, my chaplain? and that ordinarily Mr. Gideon was in the rear in all their dances, and beat up those that were slow. He denied all, and was liberated upon caution. They declared and confessed the first thing the devil caused them to do was to renounce their baptism; and by laying their hand on the top of their head, and the other on the sole of their foot, to renounce all betwixt the two to his service: That one of them was at the time with child in fornication, and in her resignation she excepted the child, at which the devil was very angry. That he lay frequently with them, and kissed them, but was cold, and his breath was like a damp air; that he cruelly beat them when they had done the evil he had enjoined them; for that he was (said they) a most wicked and barbarous master. That he adventured to give them the communion or holy sacrament, I remember in 1670 we heard that the devil appeared in the shape of a minister, in the copper mines of Sweden, and attempted the same villainous apery: the bread was like waters, the drink was sometimes blood, and other times black moss-water. That he preached and most blasphemously mocked them, if they offered to trust in God who left them miserable in the world, and neither he nor his Son Jesus Christ ever appeared to them when they called on them, as he had, who would not cheat them. That sometimes he transformed them into bees, ravens, and crows, and they flew to such and such remote places: which was impossible for the devil to do, to rarify the substance of their body into so small a matter; and some thought he might take away their spirit and convey it to these places, leaving the body behind, but this were to give him the power of the resurrection of the dead; for death is nothing but the removal of the soul from the body, which being once done it is not in his power to reunite them; so that all he deludes them in is by representing such and such ideas, shapes and objects to their imagination and fancy when asleep, and in our sleep we will have very lively conceptions of things, only in these diabolic transports their sleep is so deep that no pinching will awake them. Their confessions made many intelligent sober persons stumble much what faith was to be adhibite to them. See at the end of Feb. 1677, a large discourse about witchcraft, on the occasion of bewitching of Pollock Maxwell, and Janet Douglas the discoverer of it; Joseph Mead's story of the devil's apcing God in conveying the Tartars to Mexico, and Camerarii Meditat. Histor. centur. 1. c. 70. There is a story told of one who in king James the 6th's time was prosecuted as a witch, because a Scotchman being troubled with a disease in Italy, and craving a magician's help and cure for it, he was told he needed not have come so far from home, for there was one in Scotland could cure it, and gave him his marks; (after) some years, being returned, on the bridge of Earn, he met one to whom all the marks did quadrature, to whom having imparted the case, he cured him by application of some simple herbs. This coming abroad he is accused of Necromancy, and compact with Satan, and found guilty, though he alledged that the cure was natural, and he would teach any of them to do as much; and that the devil's naming him could not make him guilty, else it should be in his power to ruin and destroy the most innocent and godly persons. As for the encounter betwixt Mr. Williamson school-master at Couper, (who has wrote a grammar,) and the Rosicrucians, I never trusted it till I heard it from his own son, who is present minister of Kirkaldie. He tells, that a stranger came to Couper, and called for him; after they had drank a little, and the reckoning came to be paid, he whistled for spirits; one in the shape of a boy came, and gave him gold in abundance; no servant was seen riding with him to the town, nor enter with him into the inn: he caused his spirits against next day bring him noble Greek wine from the Pope's cellar, and tell the freshest news then at Rome; then trysted Mr. Williamson at London, who met the same man in a coach near to London-bridge, and who called on him by his name; he marvelled to see any know him there; at last he found it was his Rosicrucian: He pointed to a tavern, and desired Mr. Williamson to do him the favour to dine with him at that house; whither he came about twelve o'clock, and found him and many others of good fashion there, and a most splendid and magnificent table, furnished with all the varieties of delicate meats, where they are all served by spirits. At dinner they debated on the excellency of being attended by spirits; and after dinner they proposed to him, to assume him into their society, and make him participant of their happy life: but among the other conditions and qualifications requisite this was one that they demanded, his abstracting his spirit from all materiality, and abandoning and renouncing his baptismal engagements. Being amazed at this proposal he falls a praying, whereat they all disappear and leave him alone. Then he began to forethink what would become him if he were left to pay that vast reckoning, not having as much on him as would defray it. He calls the boy, and asks what was become of these gentlemen, and what was to pay? He answered there was nothing to pay, for they had done it, and were gone about their affairs in the city. Some said he was left in a jacks, but this relation his son affirmed to be truth. As for appearances, by which the devil has actuated dead bodies, and made them move; see of Cornelius Agrippa and many others, some very odd stories recorded by Delrio, in his Disquisitiones Magicæ, though Gabr. Nandæus in his Apology, endeavours to wash Agrippa's face very clean, and to justify him and the rest from the imputation of magic. There was one or two of these women that denied, and so were set at liberty; nine of them upon their confession (and so seemed very rational and penitent) were sentenced to be strangled, and then burnt, which was shortly after executed upon five of them between Leith and Edinburgh, and the other four were burnt at Painston-muir within their own parish where they had lived. The Secret Council gave a commission to sir John Nicolson, John Clerk of Pennycuik, John Johnston of Polton, and Mr. John Preston, advocate, to judge these seven who were defamed for witches in the Lonehead of Leswade.

"At a Secret Council, Catharine Liddel exhibited a complaint against ———— Rutherford baron baillie to Morison of Prestongrange, and against David Cowan in Tranent, bearing that they had seized upon her an innocent woman, and defamed her as a witch, and detained her under restraint as a prisoner; and that the said Cowan had pricked her with long pins, in sundry places of her body, and bled her and tortured her most cruelly. The defences were, that she was delated by other witches, and that 'malâ famâ laborabat,' and was thereupon apprehended, and yet so kindly used as not to be thrust into any public prison, but kept in a private house, that she and her son-in-law consented that she might be searched, 'et sic volenti seu consentienti non fit injuria neque dolus,' it being desired for the manifestation and vindication of her innocency. As for the pricker, 1st, He learned his trade from Kincaid a famed pricker. 2do, He never came unsent for, because he was either called by sheriffs, magistrates of boroughs, ministers or baillies of baronies, so what he did was 'auctore prætoris;' and so 'velle non creditur qui obsequitur imperio domini,' 'et non est in dolo qui judici obtemperat.' 3tio, The trade was not improbat or condemned by any law among us; and so not being prohibitum, it was 'de genere permissorum.' 4to, All divines and lawyers who write on witchcraft, as Perkins, Delrio, &c. acknowledge there are such marks, called by them, 'stigmata sagarum.' (vid. Feb. 1677) why then may there not be an art for discerning and distinguishing them from other marks in the body. 5to, 'Error communis facit jus.' The council may restrain that way of trial for the future, but must pardon bygones. Answered, 1mo, Denies consent. 2do, None can validly consent to their own torture, for 'nemo est dominus suorum membrorum.' As for the pricker, he was a cheat, and abused the people for gain; and the chancellor remembered that he had caused imprison that Kincaid the pricker in Kinross, for abusing the country there. The Lords of privy council first declared the woman innocent, and restored her to her good name and fame, and ordained it to be publicly intimate the next Sunday in her parish church: they reprov'd Rutherford the baron-baillie for his rashness, and discharged him to proceed so hereafter; and found that no inferior judge, much less a baron-baillie, had power to apprehend, or incarcerate, or detain any of the king's lieges under restraint, upon the pretence of their being delated or suspected as witches, but that they must immediately intimate it with the first occasion, either to the Lords of Privy Council, or to the Lords of Justiciary, and obtain their warrant for the taking of them: As also, 'found they might not use any torture by pricking, or by withholding them from sleep, &c. but reserved all that to themselves, and the justices, and those who acted by commissions from them.' And as as a mark of their displeasure against the pricker, they commanded him to prison, there to lie during their pleasure.

"Nov. 6, 1678. Criminal Court. Three witches brought in from Fulla parish were condemned at the criminal court to be burnt, upon their judicial confessions."

Hawkins in his Chapter of Witchcraft (Pl. of the Cr. book 1, c. 4) distributes offenders of this nature into three kinds; first, conjurers who by force of certain magic words endeavoured to raise the Devil, and compel him to execute their commands; secondly, witches, who by way of friendly conference are said to bargain with an evil spirit to do what they desire of him; thirdly, sorcerers, or charmers, who by the use of certain superstitious forms of words, or by means of images, or other odd representations of persons or things, &c. are said to produce strange effects above the ordinary course of nature.

Before the statute 9 G. 2, c. 5, Chief Justice Holt had adopted a course which if generally pursued, must have been very efficacious in prevention of accusations for Witchcraft. See the Cases of Hathaway, and of Hathaway and others, A. D. 1703, infra].

A TRIAL OF WITCHES.

At the Assizes and general Gaol Delivery, held at Bury St. Edmonds for the County of Suffolk, the 10th day of March, in the 16th year of the reign of our sovereign lord king Charles 2, before Matthew Hale, knt. Lord Chief Baron of his Majesty's Court of Exchequer; Rose Cullender and Amy Duny, widows, both of Leystoff in the County aforesaid, were severally indicted for bewitching Elizabeth and Ann Durent, Jane Bocking, Susan Chandler, William Durent, Elizabeth and Deborah Pacey: and the said Cullender and Duny, being arraigned upon the said indictments, pleaded Not Guilty: and afterwards, upon a long Evidence, were found Guilty, and thereupon had Judgment to die for the same.

To the READER.

THIS Trial of Witches hath lain a long time in a private gentleman's hands in the country, it being given to him by the person that took it in the court for his own satisfaction; but it came lately to my hands, and having perused it, I found it a very remarkable thing, and fit to be published; especially in these times, wherein things of this nature are so much controverted, and that by persons of much learning on both sides. I thought that so exact a relation of this Trial would probably give more satisfaction to a great many persons, by reason that it is pure matter of fact, and that evidently demonstrated; than the arguments and reasons of other very learned men, that probably may not be so intelligible to all readers; especially, this being held before a judge, whom for his integrity, learning, and law, hardly any age, either before or since could parallel; who not only took a great deal of pains, and spent much time in this trial himself; but had the assistance and opinion of several other very eminent and learned persons: so that this being the most perfect narrative of any thing of this nature hitherto extant, made me unwilling to deprive the world of the benefit of it; which is the sole motive that induced me to publish it.

The Evidence whereupon these persons were convicted of Witchcraft, stands upon divers particular circumstances.

1. THREE of the parties above-named, viz. Anne Durent, Susan Chandler, and Elizabeth Pacey were brought to Bury to the assizes and were in a reasonable good condition; but that morning they came into the hall to give instructions for the drawing of their bills of indictments, the three persons fell into strange and violent fits, shrieking out in a most sad manner, so that they could not in any wise give any instructions in the court who were the cause of their distemper. And although they did after some certain space recover out of their fits, yet they were every one of them struck dumb, so that none of them could speak neither at that time, nor during the assizes until the conviction of the supposed witches.

As concerning William Durent, being an infant, his mother Dorothy Durent sworn and examined deposed in open court, that about the 10th of March, nono Caroli Secundi, she having a special occasion to go from home, and having none in her house to take care of her said child (it then sucking) desired Amy Duny her neighbour, to look to her child during her absence, for which she promised her to give her a penny; but the said Dorothy Durent desired the said Amy not to suckle her child, and laid a great charge upon her not to do it. Upon which it was asked by the court, why she did give that direction, she being an old woman and not capable of giving suck? It was answered by the said Dorothy Durent, that she very well knew that she did not give suck, but that for some years before, she had gone under the reputation of a witch, which was one cause made her give her the caution. Another was, That it was customary with old women, that if they did look after a sucking child, and nothing would please it but the breast, they did use to please the child, to give it the breast, and it did please the child, but it sucked nothing but wind, which did the child hurt. Nevertheless after the departure of this deponent, the said Amy did suckle the child; and after the return of the said Dorothy, the said Amy did acquaint her, that she had given suck to the child contrary to her command. Whereupon the deponent was very angry with the said Amy for the same; at which the said Amy was much discontented, and used many high expressions and threatening speeches towards her; telling her, That she had as good to have done otherwise than to have found fault with her, and so departed out of her house; and that very night her son fell into strange fits of swooning, and was held in such terrible manner, that she was much affrighted therewith, and so continued for divers weeks. And the said examinant farther said, that she being exceedingly troubled at her child's distemper, did go to a certain person named Dr. Jacob, who lived at Yarmouth, who had the reputation in the country, to help children that were bewitched; who advised her to hang up the child's blanket in the chimney-corner all day, and at night when she put the child to bed, to put it into the said blanket, and if she found any thing in it, she should not be afraid, but to throw it into the fire. And this deponent did according to his direction; and at night when she took down the blanket with an intent to put her child therein, there fell out of the same a great toad, which ran up and down the hearth, and she having a young youth only with her in the house, desired him to catch the toad, and throw it into the fire, which the youth did accordingly, and held it there with the tongs; and as soon as it was in the fire it made a great and horrible noise, and after a space there was a flashing in the fire like gun-powder, making a noise like the discharge of a pistol, and thereupon the toad was no more seen nor heard. It was asked by the court, if that after the noise and flashing, there was not the substance of the toad to be seen to consume in the fire? And it was answered by the said Dorothy Durent, that after the flashing and noise, there was no more seen than if there had been none there. The next day there came a young woman a kinswoman of the said Amy, and a neighbour of this deponent, and told this deponent, that her aunt (meaning the said Amy) was in a most lamentable condition, having her face all scorched with fire, and that she was sitting alone in her house, in her smock without any fire. And thereupon this deponent went into the house of the said Amy Duny to see her, and found her in the same condition as was related to her; for her face, her legs, and thighs, which this deponent saw, seemed very much scorched and burnt with fire, at which this deponent seemed much to wonder. And asked the said Amy how she came into that sad condition? and the said Amy replied, she might thank her for it, for that she this deponent was the cause thereof, but that she should live to see some of her children dead, and she upon crutches. And this deponent farther saith, that after the burning of the said toad, her child recovered, and was well again; and was living at the time of the assizes. And this deponent farther saith, That about the 6th of March, 11 Car. 2, her daughter Elizabeth Durent, being about the age of ten years, was taken in like manner as her first child was, and in her fits complained much of Amy Duny, and said, that she did appear to her, and afflict her in such manner as the former. And she this deponent going to the apothecary's for something for her said child, when she did return to her own house, she found the said Amy Duny there, and asked her what she did do there, and her answer was, That she came to see her child, and to give it some water. But she this deponent was very angry with her, and thrust her forth of her doors, and when she was out of doors, she said, You need not be so angry, for your child will not live long: and this was on a Saturday, and the child died on the Monday following. The cause of whose death this deponent verily believeth was occasioned by the witchcraft of the said Amy Duny: for that the said Amy hath been long reputed to be a witch, and a person of very evil behaviour, whose kindred and relations have been many of them accused for witchcraft, and some of them have been condemned.

The said deponent further saith, that not long after the death of her daughter Elizabeth Durent, she this deponent was taken with a lameness in both her legs, from the knees downward, that she was fain to go upon crutches, and that she had no other use of them but only to bear a little upon them till she did remove her crutches, and so continued till the time of the Assizes, that the Witch came to be tried, and was there upon her crutches; the Court asked her, That at the time she was taken with this lameness, if it were with her according to the custom of women? Her answer was, that it was so, and that she never had any stoppages of those things, but when she was with child.

This is the substance of her Evidence to this Indictment.

There was one thing very remarkable, that after she had gone upon crutches for upwards of 3 years, and went upon them at the time of the Assizes in the Court when she gave her Evidence, and upon the jury's bringing in their verdict, by which the said Amy Duny was found Guilty, to the great admiration of all persons, the said Dorothy Durent was restored to the use of her limbs, and went home without making use of her crutches.

2. As concerning Elizabeth and Deborah Pacy, the first of the age of 11 years, the other of the age of 9 years or thereabouts: as to the elder, she was brought into the Court at the time of the instructions given to draw up the Indictments, and afterwards at the time of trial of the said prisoners, but could not speak one word all the time, and for the most part she remained as one wholly senseless, as one in a deep sleep, and could move no part of her body, and all the motion of life that appeared in her was, that as she lay upon cushions in the court upon her back, her stomach and belly, by the drawing of her breath, would arise to a great height: and after the said Elizabeth had lain a long time on the table in the court, she came a little to herself and sat up, but could neither see nor speak, but was sensible of what was said to her, and after a while she laid her head on the bar of the court with a cushion under it, and her hand and her apron upon that, and there she lay a good space of time: and by the direction of the judge, Amy Duny was privately brought to Elizabeth Pacy, and she touched her hand; whereupon the child without so much as seeing her, for her eyes were closed all the while, suddenly leaped up, and caught Amy Duny by the hand, and afterwards by the face; and with her nails scratched her till blood came, and would by no means leave her till she was taken from her, and afterwards the child would still be pressing towards her, and making signs of anger conceived against her.

Deborah the younger daughter was held in such extreme manner, that her parents wholly despaired of her life, and therefore could not bring her to the Assizes.

The Evidence which was given concerning these two Children was to this Effect:

Samuel Pacy a merchant of Leystoff aforesaid, (a man who carried himself with much soberness during the trial, from whom proceeded no words either of passion or malice, though his children were so greatly afflicted,) sworn and examined, deposeth, That his younger daughter Deborah, upon Thursday the 10th of October last, was suddenly taken with a lameness in her legs, so that she could not stand, neither had she any strength in her limbs to support her, and so she continued until the 17th day of the same month, which day being fair and sunshiny, the child desired to be carried on the east part of the house to be set upon the bank which looketh upon the sea; and whilst she was sitting there, Amy Duny came to this deponent's house to buy some herrings, but being denied she went away discontented, and presently returned again, and was denied, and likewise the third time and was denied as at first; and at her last going away, she went away grumbling; but what she said was not perfectly understood. But at the very same instant of time, the said child was taken with most violent fits, feeling most extreme pain in her stomach, like the pricking of pins, and shrieking out in a most dreadful manner like unto a whelp; and not like unto a sensible creature. And in this extremity the child continued to the great grief of the parents until the 30th of the same month. During this time this deponent sent for one Dr. Feavor, a doctor of physic, to take his advice concerning his child's distemper; the Doctor being come, he saw the child in those fits, but could not conjecture, as he then told this deponent, and afterwards affirmed in open court, at this trial, what might be the cause of the child's affliction. And this deponent farther saith, That by reason of the circumstances aforesaid, and in regard Amy Duny is a woman of an ill fame, and commonly reported to be a witch and sorceress, and for that the said child in her fits would cry out of Amy Duny as the cause of her malady, and that she did affright her with apparitions of her person (as the child in the intervals of her fits related) he this deponent did suspect the said Amy Duny for a witch, and charged her with the injury and wrong to his child, and caused her to be set in the stocks on the 28th of the same October: and during the time of her continuance there, one Alice Letteridge and Jane Buxton demanding of her, as they also affirmed in court upon their oaths, what should be the reason of Mr. Pacy's child's distemper? Telling her, That she was suspected to be the cause thereof; she replied, 'Mr. Pacy keeps a great stir about his child, but let him stay until he hath done as much by his children, as I have done by mine.' And being further examined, what she had done to her children? She answered, 'That she had been fain to open her child's mouth with a tap to give it victuals.'

And the said deponent further deposeth, that within two days after speaking of the said words, being the 30th of October, the eldest daughter Elizabeth, fell into extreme fits, insomuch, that they could not open her mouth to give her breath, to preserve her life, without the help of a tap which they were enforced to use; and the younger child was in the like manner afflicted, so that they used the same also for her relief.

And further the said children being grievously afflicted would severally complain in their extremity, and also in the intervals, that Amy Duny (together with one other woman whose person and clothes they described) did thus afflict them, their apparitions appearing before them, to their great terror and affrightment: and sometimes they would cry out, saying, There stands Amy Duny, and there Rose Cullender; the other person troubling them.

Their fits were various, sometimes they would be lame on one side of their bodies, sometimes on the other: sometimes a soreness over their whole bodies, so as they could endure none to touch them: at other times they would be restored to the perfect use of their limbs, and deprived of their hearing; at other times of their sight, at other times of their speech; sometimes by the space of one day, sometimes for two; and once they were wholly deprived of their speech for eight days together and then restored to their speech again. At other times they would fall into swoonings, and upon the recovery to their speech they would cough extremely, and bring up much phlegm, and with the same crooked pins, and one time a two-penny nail with a very broad head, which pins (amounting to forty or more) together with the two-penny nail, were produced in court, with the affirmation of the said deponent, that he was present when the said nail was vomited up, and also most of the pins. Commonly at the end of every fit they would cast up a pin, and sometimes they would have four or five fits in one day.

In this manner the said children continued with this deponent for the space of two months, during which time in their intervals this deponent would cause them to read some chapters in the New Testament. Whereupon this deponent several times observed, that they would read till they came to the name of Lord, or Jesus, or Christ; and then before they could pronounce either of the said words they would suddenly fall into their fits. But when they came to the name of Satan, or devil, they would clap their fingers upon the book, crying out, This bites, but makes me speak right well.

At such time as they recovered out of their fits (occasioned as this deponent conceives upon their naming of Lord, or Jesus, or Christ,) this deponent hath demanded of them, what is the cause they cannot pronounce those words: they reply and say, that Amy Duny saith, I must not use that name.

And farther, the said children after their fits were past, would tell, how that Amy Duny, and Rose Cullender would appear before them holding their fists at them, threatening, that if they related either what they saw or heard, that they would torment them ten times more than ever they did before.

In their fits they would cry out, There stands Amy Duny, or Rose Cullender; and sometimes in one place and sometimes in another, running with great violence to the place where they fancied them to stand, striking at them as if they were present; they would appear to them sometimes spinning, and sometimes reeling, or in other postures, deriding or threatening them.

And this deponent farther saith, that his children being thus tormented by all the space aforesaid, and finding no hopes of amendment, he sent them to his sister's house, one Margaret Arnold, who lived at Yarmouth, to make trial whether the change of the air might do them any good. And how, and in what manner they were afterwards held, he this deponent refers himself to the testimony of his said sister.

Margaret Arnold, sworn and examined, saith, that the said Elizabeth and Deborah Pacy came to her house about the thirtieth of November last, her brother acquainted her, that he thought they were bewitched, for that they vomited pins; and farther informed her of the several passages which occurred at his own house. This deponent said, that she gave no credit to that which was related to her, conceiving possibly the children might use some deceit in putting pins in their mouths themselves. Wherefore this deponent unpinned all their clothes, and left not so much as one pin upon them, but sowed all the clothes they wore, instead of pinning of them. But this deponent saith, that notwithstanding all this care and circumspection of hers, the children afterwards raised at several times at least 30 pins in her presence, and had most fierce and violent fits upon them.

The children would in their fits cry out against Rose Cullender and Amy Duny, affirming that they saw them; and they threatened to torment them ten times more, if they complained of them. At some times the children (only) would see things run up and down the house in the appearance of mice; and one of them suddenly snapt one with the tongue, and threw it in the fire, and it screeched out like a rat.

At another time, the younger child being out of her fits went out of doors to take a little fresh air, and presently a little thing like a bee flew upon her face, and would have gone into her mouth, whereupon the child ran in all haste to the door to get into the house again, screeking out in a most terrible manner; whereupon, this deponent made haste to come to her, but before she could get to her, the child fell into her swooning fit, and at last with much pain, straining herself, she vomited up a two-penny nail with a broad head; and after that the child had raised up the nail she came to her understanding; and being demanded by this deponent, how she came by this nail? she answered, that the bee brought this nail and forced it into her mouth.

And at other times, the elder child declared unto this deponent, that during the time of her fits, she saw flies come unto her and bring with them in their mouths crooked pins; and after the child had thus declared the same, she fell again into violent fits, and afterwards raised several pins.

At another time, the said elder child declared unto this deponent, and sitting by the fire suddenly started up and said, she saw a mouse, and she crept under the table looking after it, and at length, she put something in her apron, saying, she had caught it; and immediately she ran to the fire and threw it in, and there did appear upon it to this deponent like the flashing of gun-powder, though she confessed she saw nothing in the child's hand.

At another time the said child being speechless, but otherwise, of perfect understanding, ran round about the house holding her apron, crying hush, hush, as if there had been some poultry in the house; but this deponent could perceive nothing; but at last she saw the child stoop as if she had caught at something, and put it into her apron, and afterwards made as if she had thrown it into the fire. but this deponent could not discover any thing; but the child afterwards being restored to her speech, she this deponent demanded of her what she saw at the time she used such a posture? Who answered, That she saw a duck.

At another time, the younger daughter being recovered out of her fits, declared, That Amy Duny had been with her, and that she tempted her to drown herself, and to cut her throat, or otherwise to destroy herself.

At another time in their fits they both of them cried out upon Rose Cullender and Amy Duny, complaining against them; Why do not you come yourselves, but send your imps to torment us?

These several passages, as most remarkable, the said deponent did particularly set down as they daily happened, and for the reasons aforesaid, she doth verily believe in her conscience, that the children were bewitched, and by the said Amy Duny, and Rose Cullender; though at first she could hardly be induced to believe it.

As concerning Ann Durent, one other of the parties supposed to be bewitched, present in court.

Edmund Durent her father sworn and examined; said, That he also lived in the said town of Leystoff, and that the said Rose Cullender, about the latter end of November last, came into this deponent's house to buy some herrings of his wife, but being denied by her, the said Rose returned in a discontented manner; and upon the first of December after, his daughter Ann Durent was very sorely afflicted in her stomach, and felt great pain, like the pricking of pins, and then fell into swooning fits, and after the recovery from her fits, she declared, That she had seen the apparition of the said Rose, who threatened to torment her. In this manner she continued from the 1st of December, until this present time of trial; having likewise vomited up divers pins (produced here in court.) This maid was present in court, but could not speak to declare her knowledge; but fell into most violent fits when she was brought before Rose Cullender.

Ann Baldwin sworn and examined, deposeth the same thing as touching the bewitching of the said Ann Darent.

As concerning Jane Bocking, who was so weak, she could not be brought to the assizes:

Diana Bocking sworn and examined, deposed, That she lived in the same town of Leystoft, and that her said daughter having been formerly afflicted with swooning fits recovered well of them, and so continued for a certain time; and upon the first of February last, she was taken also with great pain in her stomach, like pricking with pins; and afterwards fell into swooning fits, and so continued till the deponents coming to the assizes, having during the same time taken little or no food, but daily vomiting crooked pins; and upon Sunday last raised seven pins. And whilst her fits were upon her she would spread forth her arms with her hands open, and use postures as if she caught at something, and would instantly close her hands again; which being immediately forced open, they found several pins diversly crooked, but could neither see nor perceive how or in what manner they were conveyed thither. At another time, the same Jane being in another of her fits, talked as if she were discoursing with some persons in the room, (though she would give no answer nor seem to take notice of any person then present) and would in like manner cast abroad her arms, saying, I will not have it, I will not have it; and at last she said, Then I will have it, and so waving her arm with her hand open, she would presently close the same, which instantly forced open, they found in it a lath-nail. In her fits she would frequently complain of Rose Cullender and Amy Duny, saying, That now she saw Rose Cullender standing at the bed's feet, and another time at the bed's-head, and so in other places. At last she was stricken dumb and could not speak one word, though her fits were not upon her, and so she continued for some days, and at last her speech came to her again, and she desired her mother to get her some meat; and being demanded the reason why she could not speak in so long time? She answered, That Amy Duny would not suffer her to speak. This lath-nail, and divers of the pins, were produced in court.

As concerning Susan Chandler, one other of the parties supposed to be bewitched and present in court:

Mary Chandler mother of the said Susan, sworn and examined, deposed and said, That about the beginning of February last past, the said Rose Cullender and Amy Duny were charged by Mr. Samuel Pacy for bewitching of his daughters. And a warrant being granted at the request of the said Mr. Pacy, by sir Edmund Bacon baronet, one of the justices of the peace for the county of Suffolk, to bring them before him, and they being brought before him were examined, and confessed nothing. He gave order that they should be searched; whereupon this deponent with five others were appointed to do the same: and coming to the house of Rose Cullender, they did acquaint her with what they were come about, and asked whether she was contented that they should search her? She did not oppose it, whereupon they began at her head, and so stript her naked, and in the lower part of her belly they found a thing like a teat of an inch long, they questioned her about it, and she said, That she had got a strain by carrying of water which caused that excrescence. But upon narrower search, they found in her privy parts three more excrescencies or teats, but smaller than the former: this deponent farther saith, That in the long teat at the end thereof there was a little hole, and it appeared unto them as if it had been lately sucked, and upon the straining of it there issued out white milky matter.

And this deponent farther saith, That her said daughter (being of the age of 18 years) was then in service in the said town of Leystoft, and rising up early the next morning to wash, this Rose Cullender appeared to her, and took her by the hand, whereat she was much allrighted, and went forthwith to her mother, (being in the same town) and acquainted her with what she had seen; but being extremely terrified, she fell extreme sick, much grieved at her stomach; and that night after, being in bed with another young woman, she suddenly shrieked out, and fell into such extreme fits as if she were distracted, crying against Rose Cullender; saying, she would come to bed to her. She continued in this manner beating and wearing herself, inso-much, that this deponent was glad to get help to attend her. In her intervals she would declare, That some time she saw Rose Cullender, at another time with a great dog with her: she also vomited up divers crooked pins; and sometimes she was stricken with blindness, and at another time she was dumb, and so she appeared to be in court when the trial of the prisoners was; for she was not able to speak her knowledge; but being brought into the court at the trial, she suddenly fell into her fits, and being carried out of the court again, within the space of half an hour she came to herself and recovered her speech, and thereupon was immediately brought into the court, and asked by the court, whether she was in condition to take an oath, and to give evidence, she said she could. But when she was sworn, and asked what she could say against either of the prisoners? Before she could make any answer, she fell into her fits, shrieking out in a miserable manner, crying burn her, burn her, which were all the words she could speak.

Robert Chandler father of the said Susan gave in the same evidence, that his wife Mary Chandler had given; only as to the searching of Rose Cullender as aforesaid.

This was the sum and substance of the Evidence which was given against the prisoners concerning the bewitching of the children before mentioned. At the hearing this evidence there were divers known persons, as Mr. Serjeant Keeling, Mr. Serjeant Earl, and Mr. Serjeant Barnard, present. Mr. Serjeant Keeling seemed much unsatisfied with it, and thought it not sufficient to convict the prisoners: for admitting that the children were in truth bewitched, yet said he, it can never be applied to the prisoners, upon the imagination only of the parties afflicted; for if that might be allowed, no person whatsoever can be in safety, for perhaps they might fancy another person, who might altogether be innocent in such matters.

There was also Dr. Brown of Norwich, a person of great knowledge; who after this evidence given, and upon view of the three persons in Court, was desired to give his opinion, what he did conceive of them: and he was clearly of opinion, that the persons were bewitched; and said, That in Denmark there had been lately a great discovery of witches, who used the very same way of afflicting persons, by conveying pins into them, and crooked as these pins were, with needles and nails. And his opinion was, That the devil in such cases did work upon the bodies of men and women, upon a natural foundation, (that is) to stir up, and excite such humours super-abounding in their bodies to a great excess, whereby he did in an extraordinary manner afflict them with such distempers as their bodies were most subject to, as particularly appeared in these children; for he conceived, that these swooning fits were natural, and nothing else but that they call the mother, but only heightened to a great excess by the subtilty of the devil, co-operating with the malice of these which we term witches, at whose instance he doth these villainies.

Besides the particulars above-mentioned touching the said persons bewitched, there were many other things objected against them for a further proof and manifestation that the said children were bewitched.

As first, during the time of the Trial, there were some experiments made with the persons afflicted, by bringing the persons to touch them; and it was observed, that when they were in the midst of their fits, to all men's apprehension wholly deprived of all sense and understanding, closing their fists in such manner, as that the strongest man in the Court could not force them open; yet by the least touch of one of these supposed witches, Rose Cullender by name, they would suddenly shriek out opening their hands, which accident would not happen by the touch of any other person.

And last they might privately see when they were touched, by the said Rose Cullender, they were blinded with their own aprons, and the touching took the same effect as before.

There was an ingenious person that objected, there might be a great fallacy in this experiment, and there ought not to be any stress put upon this to convict the parties, for the children might counterfeit this their distemper, and perceiving what was done to them, they might in such manner suddenly alter the motion and gesture of their bodies, on purpose to induce persons to believe that they were not natural, but wrought strangely by the touch of the prisoners.

Wherefore to avoid this scruple it was privately desired by the judge, that the lord Cornwallis, sir Edmund Bacon, and Mr. Serjeant Keeling, and some other gentlemen there in Court, would attend one of the distempered persons in the farther part of the Hall, whilst she was in her fits, and then to send for one of the witches, to try what would then happen, which they did accordingly: and Amy Duny was conveyed from the bar and brought to the maid: they put an apron before her eyes, and then one other person touched her hand, which produced the same effect as the touch of the witch did in the Court. Whereupon the gentlemen returned, openly protesting, that they did believe the whole transaction of this business was a mere imposture.

This put the Court and all persons into a stand. But at length Mr. Pacy did declare, That possibly the maid might be deceived by a suspicion that the witch touched her when she did not. For he had observed divers times, that although they could not speak, but were deprived of the use of their tongues and limbs, that their understandings were perfect, for that they have related divers things which have been when they were in their fits, after they were recovered out of them. This saying of Mr. Pacy was found to be true afterwards, when his daughter was fully recovered (as she afterwards was,) as shall in due time be related: For she was asked, whether she did hear and understand any thing that was done and acted in the Court, during the time that she lay as one deprived of her understanding? and she said, she did: and by the opinions of some, this experiment, (which others would have a fallacy) was rather a confirmation that the parties were really bewitched, than otherwise: for say they, it is not possible that any should counterfeit such distempers, being accompanied with such various circumstances, much less children; and for so long time, and yet undiscovered by their parents and relations: For no man can suppose that they should all conspire together, (being out of several families, and, as they affirm, no way related one to the other, and scarce of familiar acquaintance) to do an act of this nature whereby no benefit or advantage could redound to any of the parties, but a guilty conscience for perjurying themselves in taking the lives of two poor simple women away, and there appears no malice in the case. For the prisoners themselves did scarce so much as object it. Wherefore, say they, it is very evident that the parties were bewitched, and that when they apprehend or understand by any means, that the persons who have done them this wrong are near, or touch them; then their spirits being more than ordinarily moved with rage and anger at them being present, they do use more violent gestures of their bodies, and extend forth their hands, as desirous to lay hold upon them; which at other times not having the same occasion, the instance there falls not out the same.

2ndly, One John Soam of Leystoff aforesaid, yeoman, a sufficient person, deposeth, that not long since, in harvest time he had three carts which brought home his harvest, and as they were going into the field to load, one of the carts wrenched the window of Rose Cullender's house, whereupon she came out in a great rage and threatened this deponent for doing that wrong, so they passed along into the fields and loaded all the three carts, the other two carts returned safe home, and back again, twice loaded that day afterwards; but as to this cart which touched Rose Cullender's house, after it was loaded, it was overturned twice or thrice that day; and after that they had loaded it again the second or third time, as they brought it through the gate which leadeth out of the field into the town, the cart stuck so fast in the gates-head, that they could not possibly get it through, but were enforced to cut down the post of the gate to make the cart pass through, although they could not perceive that the cart did of either side touch the gate-posts. And this deponent further saith, that after they had got it through the gate-way, they did with much difficulty get it home into the yard; but for all that they could do, they could not get the cart near unto the place where they should unload the corn, but were fain to unload it at a great distance from the place, and when they began to unload they found much difficulty therein, it being so hard a labour that they were tired that first came; and when others came to assist them, their noses burst forth a bleeding: so they were fain to desist and leave it until the next morning, and then they unloaded it without any difficulty at all.

Robert Sherringham also deposeth against Rose Cullender, that about two years since, passing along the street with his cart and horses the axletree of his cart touched her house, and broke down some part of it, at which she was very much displeased, threatening him, that his horses should suffer for it; and so it happened, for all those horses, being four in number, died within a short time after: since that time he hath had great losses by the sudden dying of his other cattle; so soon as his sows pigged, the pigs would leap and caper, and immediately fall down and die. Also, not long after, he was taken with a lameness in his limbs that he could neither go nor stand for some days. After all this, he was very much vexed with great number of lice of an extraordinary bigness, and although he many times shifted himself, yet he was not any thing the better, but would swarm again with them; so that in the conclusion he was forced to burn all his clothes, being two suits of apparel, and then was clean from them.

As concerning Amy Duny, one Richard Spencer deposeth, that about the first of September last, he heard her say at his house, that the devil would not let her rest until she were revenged on one Cornelius Sandeswell's wife.

Ann Sandeswell, wife unto the above-said Cornelius, deposeth, that about seven or eight years since, she having bought a certain number of geese, meeting with Amy Duny, she told her, if she did not fetch her geese home they would all be destroyed: which in a few days after it came to pass.

Afterwards the said Amy became tenant to this deponent's husband for a house, who told her, that if she looked not well to such a chimney in her house that the same would fall: whereupon this deponent replied, that it was a new one; but not minding much her words, at that time they parted. But in a short time the chimney fell down according as the said Amy had said.

Also this deponent farther saith, that her brother being a fisherman, and using to go into the Northern Seas, he desired him to send her a firkin of fish, which he did accordingly; and she having notice that the said firkin was brought into Leystoff-Road, she desired a boatman to bring it ashore with the other goods they were to bring; and she going down to meet the boatman to receive her fish, desired the said Amy to go along with her to help her home with it; Amy replied, she would go when she had it. And thereupon this deponent went to the shore without her, and demanded of the boatman the firkin, they told her, that they could not keep it in the boat from falling into the sea, and they thought it was gone to the devil, for they never saw the like before. And being demanded by this deponent, whether any other goods in the boat were likewise lost as well as hers? they answered not any.

This was the substance of the whole evidence given against the prisoners at the bar; who being demanded, what they had to say for themselves? they replied, nothing material to any thing that was proved against them. Whereupon, the judge in giving his direction to the jury, told them, that he would not repeat the evidence unto them, lest by so doing he should wrong the evidence on the one side or on the other. Only this acquainted them, that they had two things to enquire after. First, Whether or no these children were bewitched? Secondly, Whether the prisoners at the bar were guilty of it?

That there were such creatures as witches he made no doubt at all; For first, the scriptures had affirmed so much. Secondly, the wisdom of all nations had provided laws against such persons, which is an argument of their confidence of such a crime. And such hath been the judgment of this kingdom, as appears by that act of parliament which hath provided punishments proportionable to the quality of the offence. And desired them, strictly to observe their evidence; and desired the great God of heaven to direct their hearts in this weighty thing they had in hand: For to condemn the innocent, and to let the guilty go free, were both an abomination to the Lord.

With this short direction the jury departed from the bar, and within the space of half an hour returned, and brought them in both Guilty upon the several indictments, which were thirteen in number, whereupon they stood indicted.

This was upon Thursday in the afternoon, March 13, 1665. The next morning, the three children with their parents came to the Lord Chief Baron Hales's lodging, who all of them spake perfectly, and were as in good health as ever they were; only Susan Chandler, by reason of her very much affliction, did look very thin and wan. And their friends were asked at what time they were restored thus to their speech and health? And Mr. Pacy did affirm, That within less than half an hour after the witches were convicted, they were all of them restored, and slept well that night, feeling no pain; only Susan Chandler felt a pain like pricking of pins in her stomach.

After, they were all of them brought down to the court, but Ann Durent was so fearful to behold them, that she desired she might not see them. The other two continued in the court, and they affirmed in the face of the country, and before the witches themselves, what before hath been deposed by their friends and relations; the prisoners not much contradicting them. In conclusion, the judge and all the court were fully satisfied with the verdict, and thereupon gave judgment against the witches that they should be hanged.

They were much urged to confess, but would not.

That morning we departed for Cambridge, but no reprieve was granted: And they were executed on Monday the 17th of March following, but they confessed nothing.

220. The Trial of Mr. BENJAMIN KEACH, at the Assizes at Aylsbury, in Buckinghamshire, for a Libel: 17 CHARLES II. A. D. 1665.

BENJAMIN Keach of Winslow, in the county of Bucks, having wrote a little book, entitled, "The Child's Instructor; or, A New and Easy Primer:" in which were contained several things contrary to the doctrine and ceremonies of the church of England; as, That infants ought not to be baptized; That laymen may preach the Gospel; That Christ shall reign personally upon the earth in the latter day, &c. He had no sooner got it printed, and some of them sent down to him, but one Mr. Strafford, a justice of the peace for that county, received information of it. Whereupon, taking a constable with him, he went in quest of the said books; and coming to the house of Mr. Keach, found and seized several of them, bound Mr. Keach over to answer for it at the next assizes in a recognizance of 100*l.* and two sureties with him in 50*l.* each.

The next Assize holden for the said county was at Aylsbury on the 8th and 9th of October 1664, Lord Chief Justice Hyde being Judge. On the 1st of which days, in the forenoon, Mr. Keach was called upon; who answering to his name, was brought to the bar, and examined as follows:

Judge. Did you write this book? [Holding out one of the Primers in his hand.]

Keach. I writ most of it.

Judge. What have you to do to take other men's trades out of their hands? I believe you can preach as well as write books. Thus it is to let you, and such as you are, have the Scripture to wrest to your own destruction. You have made in your book a new Creed: I have seen three Creeds before; but I never saw a fourth till you made one.

Keach. I have not made a Creed, but a confession of the Christian faith.

Judge. Well, that is a Creed then.

Keach. Your lordship said you had never seen but three Creeds; but thousands of Christians have made a confession of their faith.

After this the Judge observed to the Court several things which were written in the said book, concerning Baptism and the Ministers of the Gospel, which were contrary to the Liturgy of the Church of England, and so a breach of the Act of Uniformity.

Keach. My lord, as to those things—

Judge. You shall not preach here, nor give the reasons of your damnable doctrine,* to seduce and infect his majesty's subjects. These are not things for such as you are to meddle with, and to pretend to write books of divinity; but I will try you for it before I sleep.

After this he gave directions to the Clerk to draw up the Indictment; and the witnesses were sworn, and ordered to stand by the Clerk till the Indictment was finished, and then to go with it to the grand inquest.

* Upon the cruelty, brutality, and illegality of the conduct of Chief Justice Hyde in this Trial, see the observations of Mr. Dunning (afterwards lord Ashburton) in his Speech in the House of Commons, December 6th 1770. See Cobb. Parl. Hist.

Judge. Gentlemen of the Grand Jury, I shall send you presently a bill against one that hath taken upon him to write a new Primer for the instruction of your children: He is a base and dangerous fellow; and if this be suffered, children by learning of it will become such as he is, and therefore I hope you will do your duty.

The Indictment being long, took so much time to draw it up, that the Trial did not come on till the next day.

The next day, the Court being set, the Grand Jury found the bill, and brought it in indorsed Billa vera.

Clerk. Benjamin Keach, come to the bar.

Mr. Keach comes to the bar.

Clerk. Hear your Charge. 'Thou art here indicted by the name of Benjamin Keach, of the parish of Winslow, in the county of Bucks: For that thou being a seditious, heretical, and schismatical person, evilly and maliciously disposed, and disaffected to his majesty's government, and the government of the Church of England, didst maliciously and wickedly, on the 1st day of May, in the 16th year of the reign of our sovereign lord the king, write, print, and publish, or cause to be written, printed, and published, one seditious and venomous book, entitled, "The Child's Instructor; or, A New and Easy Primer;" wherein are contained by way of Question and Answer, these damnable positions, contrary to the book of Common Prayer, and the Liturgy of the Church of England: That is to say, in one place you have thus written: "2. Who are the right subjects of baptism? A. Believers, or godly men and women only, who can make confession of their faith and repentance." And in another place you have maliciously and wickedly written these words; "2. How shall it then go with the Saints? A. O, very well. It is the day they have longed for: Then they shall hear that sentence, Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you; and so shall they reign with Christ on the earth a thousand years, even on Mount Sion, in New Jerusalem; for there will Christ's throne be, on which they must sit down with him." Then follows this Question, with the Answer thereto, in these plain English words: "2. When shall the wicked and the fallen angels, which be the Devils, be judged? A. When the thousand years shall be expired, then shall the rest of the devils be raised, and then shall be the general and last judgment, then shall all the rest of the dead and devils be judged by Christ and his glorified saints; and they being arraigned and judged, the wicked shall be condemned, and cast by angels into the lake of fire, there to be burned for ever and ever.'

'In another place thou hast wickedly and maliciously written these plain English words:

'2. Why may not infants be received into the Church now, as they were under the law? A. Because the fleshly seed is cast out: Though God under that dispensation did receive infants in a lineal way by generation, yet he that hath the key of David, that openeth and no man shutteth, that shutteth and no man openeth, hath shut up that way into the Church; and hath opened the door of regeneration, receiving in none but believers. 2. What then is the state of infants? A. Infants that die are members of the kingdom of Glory, though they be not members of the visible Church. 2. Do they then that bring in infants in a fleshly and lineal way, err from the way of truth? A. Yea, they do; for they make not God's holy word their rule, but do presume to open a door that Christ hath shut, and none ought to open.' And also in another place thou hast wickedly and maliciously composed "A short Confession of the Christian Faith;" wherein thou hast affirmed this concerning the second person in the Blessed Trinity, in these plain English words: 'I also believe that he rose again the third day from the dead, and ascended into Heaven above, and there now sitteth on the right hand of God the Father; and from thence he shall come again at the appointed time of the Father to reign personally upon the earth, and to be judge of the quick and dead.' And in another place thou hast wickedly and maliciously affirmed these things concerning true Gospel-Ministers, in these plain English words following: 'Christ hath not chosen the wise and prudent man after the flesh, not great doctors and rabbies; Not many mighty and noble, saith Paul, are called: but rather the poor and despised, even tradesmen, and such-like, as was Matthew, Peter, Andrew, Paul, and others. And Christ's true ministers have not their learning and wisdom from men, or from universities, or human schools for human learning. Arts and sciences are not essential to making of a true minister, but the gifts of God, which cannot be bought with silver and gold; and also as they have freely received the gift, so they do freely administer: They do not preach for hire, for gain and filthy lucre: They are not like the false teachers, who look for gain from their quarter; who eat the fat, and clothe themselves with the wool, and kill them that are fed; those that put not into their mouths, they prepare war against: Also they are not Lords over God's heritage, they rule them not by force and cruelty, neither have they power to force and compel men to believe and obey their doctrines, but are only to persuade and intreat; for this is the way of the Gospel, as Christ taught them.'

'And many other things hast thou seditiously, wickedly, and maliciously written in the said book, to the great displeasure of Almighty God, the scandal of the liturgy of the church of England, the disaffection of the king's people to his majesty's government, the danger of 'the peace of this kingdom, to the evil example of others, and contrary to the statute in that case made and provided. How say you, Benjamin Keach; are you Guilty, or Not Guilty?'

Keach. The Indictment is so very long, that I cannot remember half of it, nor have I been accustomed to plead to Indictments: therefore I desire a copy of it, and liberty to confer with counsel about it, in order to put in my exceptions, and then I shall plead to it.

Judge. It is your intention, I perceive, to delay your trial to the next assize.

Keach. No, my lord, I have no design by this to delay my trial.

Judge. I will not deny you what is your right, but you must first plead to your Indictment, and afterwards you shall have a copy of it.

Keach. I desire I may have a copy of it before I plead, in order to put in my Exceptions against it.

Judge. You shall not have it, before you plead Guilty or Not Guilty.

Keach. It is what has been granted to others.

Judge. You shall not have it first; and if you refuse to plead Guilty or Not Guilty, I shall take it pro confesso, and give judgment against you accordingly.

Keach. Not Guilty, my lord.

Judge. Now you may have a copy of your Indictment, and I will give you an hour's time to consider of it.

Keach. If I may have no longer time, I don't desire any.

Judge. I have something else to do than wait upon you; you are not a person fit to go abroad till next Assize, and you will think it hard if I should commit you to gaol till then: but because you shall not say but that you were offered fair, if you will find sufficient sureties for your appearance at the next assize, and for your good behaviour till then, you shall not be tried till then.

Keach. My lord, I am content to be tried now.

Judge. Go on then, a God's name.

Clerk. Gentlemen of the Jury, answer to your names, &c.

Then the Jury were sworn, well and truly to try the traverse between the king's majesty and the prisoner at the bar.

Judge. Clerk, read the Indictment. [He reads it.]

Gentlemen of the Jury, the prisoner at the bar has pleaded Not Guilty, and your charge is to inquire whether he be guilty or not.

Then the Witnesses were sworn, who were Neal and Whitehall.

Neal deposed, That justice Strafford sent for him to his house; when he came there, the justice sent him back again for his staff of authority; which being done, he went with the justice to one Moody's stall, and asked for some Primmers which he had; he answered, that he had none. That from thence they went to Mr. Keach's house, where first they saw his wife, who told them he was in an inward room. They asked her, if there were not some Prim-mers in the house? She said, there was, and about thirty were brought forth and delivered to them.

Then Justice Strafford himself was also examined: he said, That he found the Primmers now before the Court in Benj. Keach's house, and seized them; and that the prisoner at the bar had confessed before him, that he writ and composed the said book.

Then a Copy of the prisoner's Examination before the said justice, signed with his own hand, was produced and read; wherein was contained, That the prisoner being asked whether he was the author or writer of the said Book? answered, Yes, he was. And further declared, That he delivered a part of the copy to one Oviat a printer at London, since dead; and that the rest of the copy he sent up by another hand, but that he knew not who printed it: That about forty of them were sent down to him, of which he had dispersed about twelve, and that the price was five-pence each book.

After this the Judge called for a Common-Prayer-Book, and laid it before him, and ordered one of the Primmers to be given to the gentlemen of the Jury, and bid them look on those parts where the leaves were turned down.

Judge. Clerk, read those sentences in the Indictment, which are taken out of the book, that the Jury may turn to them, and see that the said positions are contained in the book.

Clerk. 'Q. Who are the right subjects of 'Baptism? A. Believers or godly men and 'women only, who can make confession of 'their faith and repentance.'

Judge. This is contrary to the book of Common-Prayer, for that appoints infants to be baptised, as well as men and women. [Here he read several places in the Liturgy, wherein the baptising of infants is enjoined and directed.]

Clerk reads. 'Q. How shall it then go with 'the saints? A. Oh, very well! it is the day 'that they have longed for: then they shall 'hear that sentence, Come, ye blessed of my 'Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you: 'And so shall they reign with Christ on earth 'a thousand years, &c.'

Judge. This is contrary to the Creed in the Book of Common-Prayer, and is an old heresy, which was cast out of the Church a thousand years ago, and was likewise condemned by the Council of Constance about 500 years ago, and hath lain dead ever since, till now this rascal hath revived it.

Clerk reads. 'Q. Why may not infants be 'received into the Church now, as they were 'under the law? A. Because the fleshly seed is 'cast out, &c. Q. What then is the state of 'infants? A. Infants that die, are members of 'the kingdom of Glory, though they be not 'members of the visible Church. Q. Do 'they then that bring in infants by a fleshly 'lineal way, err from the truth? A. Yea, they 'do; for they make not God's holy word their 'rule, but do presume to open a door that 'Christ hath shut, and none ought to open.'

Judge. This also is contrary to the book of Common-Prayer, which appoints infants to be received into the Church, and directs the priest to say, when he hath sprinkled the child, 'We receive this child into the congregation of Christ's flock.' And whereas he says that infants that die are members of the kingdom of Glory, though not of the visible Church, he speaks this of infants in general, and so the child of a Turk or Heathen is made equal with the child of a Christian: But the Church hath otherwise determined; that is, if an infant die after baptism, and before it hath actually sinned, it is saved, because original sin is washed away in baptism. Read on.

Clerk. Also in another place thou hast wickedly and maliciously composed, 'A short Confession of faith,' in which thou hast affirmed thus, concerning the second person in the blessed Trinity, in these plain English words; 'I also believe that he rose again the third day from the dead, and ascended into heaven, and there now sitteth at the right hand of God the Father; and from thence he shall come again at the appointed time of the Father, to reign personally upon the earth, and to be the judge of the quick and the dead.'

Judge. This is contrary to our Creed: for whereas he saith, 'From thence he shall come again at the appointed time of the Father, to reign personally upon the earth, and to be judge both of the quick and the dead;' our Creed only saith, 'From thence he shall come to judge both the quick and the dead.'

Clerk. And in another place thou hast wickedly and maliciously affirmed these things concerning true Gospel-Ministers, in these plain English words following: 'Christ hath not chosen the wise and prudent men after the flesh, not great doctors and rabbies; Not many mighty and noble, saith Paul, are called, &c. as above.'

Judge. This also is contrary to the Book of Common-Prayer: for whereas the position in the Indictment saith, Christ hath not chosen great rabbies and doctors, but rather the poor, and despised, and tradesmen; the Book of Common-Prayer doth admit of such. [Here he read some passages concerning the qualification of Ministers, and their manner of Consecration.] Because Christ, when he was upon the earth, made choice of tradesmen to be his disciples; therefore this fellow would have ministers to be such now; taylors, and pedlars, and tinkers, and such fellows as he is: But it is otherwise now, as appears from the manner in which the Church has appointed them to be chosen, ordained, and consecrated.

The Judge having thus gone through the Indictment, the prisoner began to speak in his defence.

Keach. As to the doctrines——

Judge. You shall not speak here, except to the matter of fact: that is to say, whether you writ this book or not.

Keach. I desire liberty to speak to the particulars in my Indictment, and those things that have——

Judge. You shall not be suffered to give the reasons for your damnable doctrine here, to seduce the king's subjects.

Keach. Is my religion so bad, that I may not be allowed to speak?

Judge. I know your religion, you are a Fifth Monarchy Man; and you can preach, as well as write books; and you will preach here, if I would let you: but I shall take such order as you shall do no more mischief.

Keach. I did not write all the book, for there is an epistle to it written by another hand; neither can it be proved that I writ all that is put into the Indictment.

Judge. It is all one whether you writ it yourself, or dictated to another to write it: but it appears by your examination under your own hand, that you wrote it all.

Keach. Because I writ the major part of it, I was contented to let it go with the word all in my examination before justice Strafford; but I cannot in conscience say I wrote it all: nor is it proved that I published it.

Judge. Yes, you did; for Moody had six books of you.

Keach. I did neither sell them, nor deliver them to him.

Judge. He had them at your house, and it is not likely he should take them without your consent.

Keach. I do not say he had them without my consent.

Judge. It is all one, then, as if you delivered them.

Here the Judge summed up the Evidence, and gave his Charge to the Jury; but this the Annaeusensis has omitted.

The Jury being withdrawn, staid for some hours: at length one of the officers who attended them came in.

Officer. My lord, the Jury about the Primers cannot agree.

Judge. But they must agree.

Officer. They desire to know whether one of them may not come and speak with your lordship, about something whereof they are in doubt.

Judge. Yes, privately: [And then ordered one to come to him on the bench.]

Then the officer called one, and he was set upon the clerk's table, and the Judge and he whispered together a great while; and it was observed, that the Judge having his hands upon his shoulders, would frequently shake him as he spake to him. Upon this person's returning, the whole Jury quickly came in, and being according to custom called over by their names, the clerk proceeded.

Clerk. Are you agreed in your verdict?

Jury. Yes, yes.

Clerk. Who shall speak for you?

Jury. Our Foreman.

Clerk. How say you, is Benjamin Keach Guilty of the matters contained in the Indictment against him, or Not Guilty?

Foreman. Guilty in part.

Clerk. Of what part?

Foreman. There is something contained in the Indictment, which is not in the book.

Clerk. What is that?

Foreman. In the Indictment he is charged with these words, 'When the thousand years shall be expired, then shall all the rest of the devils be raised;' but in the book it is, 'Then shall the rest of the dead be raised.*'

Clerk. Is he guilty of all the rest of the Indictment, that Sentence excepted?

One of the Jury. I cannot in conscience find him Guilty, because the words in the Indictment and the Book do not agree.

Judge. That is only through a mistake of the clerk's, and in that sentence only; and you may find him guilty of all, that Sentence excepted: but why did you come in before you were agreed?

Foreman. We thought we had been agreed.

Judge. You must go out again, and agree; and as for you, that say you cannot in conscience find him guilty, if you say so again, without giving reasons for it, I shall take an order with you.

Then the Jury withdrew, and in a little time returned again.

Clerk. Are you agreed in your verdict?

Jury. Yes.

Clerk. How say you, is Benjamin Keach Guilty of the matters charged in the Indictment against him, or Not Guilty?

Foreman. Guilty of the Indictment; that sentence, wherein 'devils' is inserted instead of 'dead,' only excepted.

Upon this, Benjamin Keach was called to the bar, and the Judge proceeded to pass Sentence upon him as follows:

Judge. Benjamin Keach, you are here convicted of writing and publishing a seditious and scandalous Book, for which the court's judgment is this, and the court doth award, That you shall go to gaol for a fortnight, without bail or mainprise; and the next Saturday to stand upon the pillory at Ailsbury for the space of two hours, from eleven o'clock to one, with a Paper upon your head with this inscription, "For writing, printing, and publishing a schismatical Book, intitled, The Child's Instructor, or a New and Easy Primmer." And the next Thursday to stand in the same manner, and for the same time, in the market of Winslow; and there your Book shall be openly burnt before your face by the common hangman, in disgrace of you and your doctrine. And you shall forfeit to the king's majesty the sum of 40*l.* and shall remain in gaol until you find sureties for your good behaviour and appearance at the next assizes, there to renounce your doctrine, and make such public submission as shall be enjoined you. Take him away, keeper.

Keach. I hope I shall never renounce those truths which I have written in that Book.

Clerk. My Lord, he says he hopes he shall never repent.

But the Judge taking no notice, the gaoler took him away.

According to the Sentence passed upon him, he was kept close prisoner till the Saturday following, and then about eleven o'clock was carried to the pillory at Ailsbury; where he stood full two hours to a minute, was denied the liberty of speaking to the spectators, and had his hands as well as his head carefully kept in the pillory the whole time. On the Thursday following he stood in the same manner and for the same time at Winslow, the town where he lived, and had his Book burnt before him. After this, upon paying his fine, and giving sufficient security for his good behaviour, he was set at liberty; but was never brought to make a recantation.

* Where one is indicted for writing a libel secundum tenorem sequentem, or for forging a deed so and so described, any the least variance between the libel recited, or deed described, and those given in evidence, is fatal. But where the substance only of a libel is set forth in Latin, it is sufficient if the libel be proved to have the same sense as is set forth. Hawk. Pl. C. Book 2. c. 46. s. 36. In manner and form following, that is to say, do not require an exact recital. See, as to the tenor and effect following; and as to the kind and degree of variance that is fatal, and as to the danger of Judges indulging in solution of variances, the authorities referred to in Leach's edition of Hawkins, ubi sup.

221. The CASE of the Jurisdiction of the House of Peers, between THOMAS SKINNER, Merchant, and the East-India Company: 18 CHARLES II. A. D. 1666.

[Of this Case the fullest account which has been found in print, is contained in a small book published in the year 1669, under the title of "The Grand Question concerning the Judicature of the House of Peers, stated and argued." The Report which is here given of the Case, has been extracted chiefly from a copy of that Work, obligingly imparted by the very learned Mr. Hargrave, who has published a concise but very perspicuous abridgment of this Case, in that most valuable repository of legal knowledge, upon the subject of this Case and other matters connected with it, his "Introductory Preface" to lord Hale's "Jurisdiction of the Lords' House of Parliament." See also in Mr. Hargrave's "Judicial Arguments and Collections," (vol. 1, p. 1, vol. 2, p. 183.) his very full and elaborate Opinions on the Cases of Bond and Butler, who were fined and imprisoned by the Irish House of Lords, and of Perry, who was fined and imprisoned by the English House of Lords. This Case of Skinner and the East India Company, was also noticed by Mr. Clifford in Flower's Case.]

SOON after his majesty's happy Restoration, one Thomas Skinner preferred a Petition to him in council, purporting 'Great oppressions and spoils sustained by him in the Indies from the East India Company, robbing him of a ship and goods of a great value, dispossessing him of a plantation he had there, a dwelling house and warehouse at Jamby, and an island called Barella (which he had bought of that king) assaulting his person to the danger of his life, and several other injuries done him; For which he prayed the king's justice to appoint a court, constable and marshal to hear and determine those matters, they not being otherwise determinable by the ordinary course of law, or to put it into any other way for just relief.' After some years attendance and solicitation and several Petitions of this poor man's, the king at last refers it to certain lords, viz. the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Privy Seal and the lord Ashley, to call all parties before them, and compose the matter if they could; the Order of Reference runs thus
